When the old Academy House passed into the hands of the Warrington Corporation, its ultimate fate seemed, for a time, to hang in the balance. Then Mr. William Long, with commendable public spirit, came forward with a scheme for using it in the interests of the intellectual and artistic life of the town. A small committee of guarantors was organised, and the house is now held on lease for the purposes of "the Warrington Society"—a name wide enough for whatever developments Time may bring. New paint, clean windows, fresh and dainty curtains, have quickly worked a transformation in its outward appearance. It has a distinctly comfortable, old-world look about it; and rumour says that the colossal statue of Oliver Cromwell, just presented to the town by Mr. Monks, is to mount guard in close proximity to the ancient home of Nonconformist learning. But it is time that we stepped inside. Not long ago dust and cobwebs and mouldering paint held undisputed sway. Our hearts misgave us a little as we wondered whether anything could banish its ancient mustiness and restore it to beautiful human uses once more. Now all is changed. As we enter, we see all the appointments, on a small scale, of an attractive club. The rooms are bright and cheerful. The old panelling shines with mellow light, and the colouring of the fresco work above one of the mantelpieces is rich and soft with the touch of Time. The furniture, too, specially chosen for its age and appropriate style, helps to strengthen the illusion of ancient peace. Though let me hasten to add, as one who hopes to spend some quiet hours in these quaint chairs, that the comfort of the modern man has not been forgotten! On the left of the entrance hall is the reading-room, where there is already a nucleus of portraits and other historical memorials; opposite to it a small coffee-room; and beyond, the smoking-room; while upstairs there is a large panelled room which can be used for meetings of various literary and other societies, which in time may find in the Old Academy a fitting home.

On the evening of Wednesday, April 5th, Mr. and Mrs. Long held a reception of intending members and their lady friends. Great pleasure was expressed on all sides that this interesting relic of the past has been reserved from the hand of the destroyer, and made habitable and attractive once more. At 8.30 a truce was called to conversation while a short inaugural meeting was held. Mr. Long welcomed his guests in a few genial words, and expressed the hope that the Old Academy might be in the future the centre from which waves of influence should radiate, to remind us in the midst of our commercial activity that there are higher things for which men ought to live. The Rev. W. H. Drummond, as representing the old Dissenting interest in the town, followed with a short historical sketch of the Academy, and its place in the history of English education at a time when Nonconformists were excluded from the old Universities. He mentioned the names of its noted tutors, Taylor, Aikin, Priestley, Enfield; and pointed out the connecting link between the Academy of 1757 and Manchester College, Oxford, of to-day. The next speaker was our Warrington idealist, Mr. Arthur Bennett, the indefatigable secretary of the movement. He was jubilant over the fulfilment of a cherished dream, and pointed out how the new society, free from all bonds of sect and party, and pledged to the fellowship of culture may help to shape the Warrington of the future. It must again be our boast that—

"Souls are rip'ned in our northern sky."

The Rev. E. C. E. Carleton, vicar of Holy Trinity Church, Mr. Alderman Henry Roberts, and Mr. F. Monks each added a few words of congratulation and of hopefulness for the future; and we then broke up to view the rooms and to partake of good cheer of a more material kind. As we leave its hospitable walls to pen these few lines for the Press, a fragrant odour is beginning to diffuse itself from the open door of one of the rooms. The Old Academy has passed within the sacred precincts of clubland! Under these new conditions may it once more help to further the interests of literature and art, and the broad human culture which springs from the fellowship of differing minds.

WE have been interested to receive the following note from Milan:—"Sir,—On Thursday last, the commemoration day of the institution of the Eucharist, my friend Don Miraglia, Bishop-elect of Piacenza, restored the communion cup to the laity in his church, denominated the 'Oratorio di San Paolo,' enforcing thereby the scriptural doctrine, I heard him preach more than once, that 'Christ has made us all kings and priests before God.' God bless the good Bishop and his people.—FERDINANDO BRACCIFORTI."

PRINCIPAL CAIRD'S SERMONS.*

THIS is a remarkable volume of sermons, full of suggestive thoughts eloquently and lucidly expressed. The first question usually asked about sermons emanating from an orthodox source is, What is the theological position? That is a comparatively unimportant question: sermons must be judged by their power of appeal to the spiritual life, not by the colour of their theology. At the same time these sermons are interesting and noteworthy from the theological point of view. Preached in the Glasgow University pulpit by the Principal of that University, they are an important sign of the times. They might all have been preached in our pulpits without rousing any serious objections, much less any opposition. This is not said in their praise: the quality of sermon is not to be gauged by deciding whether or not they could be preached to Unitarians without exciting doctrinal controversy. Nevertheless, the theological position evidenced in these sermons is significant. There is nothing in which orthodoxy is more clearly at issue with us than in the doctrine of the forgiveness of sin. They think we are shallow in saying that we believe God naturally forgives sin when a man repents, just as a father forgives his son. Hermann, whose book on "Communion with God" is probably the best exponent of modern orthodoxy, has some striking remarks on the subject. "If the work of Jesus be seriously considered it will rather make the impression that the Divine forgiveness of sins is not a matter of course, but is something utterly marvellous." "It is a foolish fancy that the mere doctrine of the father-like love of God can help the troubled sinner." "It is impossible that God can forgive as a mere matter of course." Principal Caird's belief on this point is identical with our own. "Can repentance and forgiveness or restoration to God's favour ever be dissociated? Is there any other condition of forgiveness than repentance? . . . When you examine carefully what you mean by the words you will see that the idea of repentance is only another aspect of the idea of forgiveness, that repentance is just forgiveness with a different name; so that to say of any soul that is filled with sorrow for its sins that it can remain unforgiven, or that its forgiveness may be delayed for some other reason, is to utter what is really a contradiction in terms—a contradiction as great as to speak of the vanishing of darkness without the approach of light, or of the earth becoming nearer to the sun without the sun becoming nearer to the earth." Nothing could be clearer than this. There is no need for any mediator in such a faith.

Principal Caird's catholicity is seen in such sentences as the following:—"There is springing up in many devout minds the conviction that the principle of Christian fellowship cannot be an intellectual one, that that which makes Christians one must be something deeper and more comprehensive than agreement in a long-drawn system of doctrines. Whatever that be which makes a man a Christian, it should unite him to all Christians, to all good and religious men." "The irresistible conviction is winning its way into all candid and tolerant minds that the essential spirit of religion may exist under wide theological divergencies, and that though good men may differ, and differ greatly in doctrinal forms of belief, there is something deeper which unites them. The essence of religion is something more catholic than its creeds."

But these sermons are most remarkable, not for their theological liberality, but for their suggestiveness and originality of thought.

Here, for instance, in a sermon on "Evil Working through Good," is a striking and unusual treatment of evil as perverted good. "There is another and subtler way in which the moral law, or the moral element in man's nature to which it appeals, may be so perverted as to work ruin and death instead of life to the soul, and that is by infusing a new intensity into our vices and our sins. Sensuality and selfishness, the love of the world and the things of the world, is in man, so to speak, the love of God and of goodness run wild. Evil inclinations and desires would never be so intense, would never have in them the ruinous passionate ardour and force which characterises them, if it were not that we are ever trying to create a fictitious heaven out of them. Finite and transient though they be, they owe their persistent attraction to this, that our imagination tricks them out with a false capacity of delight which often no experience of failure serves to dissipate. It is the very infinitude of our nature that makes it possible for us to paint the idols of time and sense with an imaginary glory, and to waste on them a spurious and disproportionate devotion. Our lowest vices catch a false glow and fascination from the virtues they mimic. The passionate self-surrender with which so many give themselves to the pursuit of riches, is the morbid action of a nature formed for devotion to an infinite object of which money is to its unconscious votary the base and miserable, but in many respects deceptive, imitation."

That is not only a wise but a deeply religious interpretation of sin. It sees in evil-doing not mere bestiality, not the depravity of human nature, but it finds even in selfishness and lust a witness to the divine origin of man and the greatness of the soul.

It is usually possible to find in a volume of sermons, however varied the subjects, some dominant idea, some key-note to which everything is related. The dominant idea, for instance, in Mr. Stopford Brooke's recent volume, "The Gospel of Joy," seems to us an appeal to a prosperous comfort-loving world to "remember the things that belong unto their peace." The world of convention, artificiality, and selfishness is too much with us, hiding real life with its joy and its love from our sight. In these sermons of Principal Caird's, the dominant idea is the responsibility of men to one another, the impossibility of any man entering heaven or hell alone. This thought is expressed most clearly in two sermons—one on "Corporate Immortality," the other on "The Law of Competition." "All existences," he says, "rise in the scale of nobleness just in proportion as they are incapable of individual perfection." "Individual happiness, individual perfection, are never attained; but it is the very greatness and glory of man's nature to be incapable of it." The most depraved of men might use the words of the writer of Hebrews, and say of the greatest saints: "They without us shall not be made perfect." The way to salvation is by saving others. No saint wishes it on any other terms. He would desire to see everyone in heaven before himself, like a captain being the last to leave the sinking ship, the last to set foot upon the promised land. A competitive scramble, whether for things of heaven or things of earth, is utterly opposed to the law of spiritual life. "It is of the very essence of a world of moral and spiritual intelligences to be absolutely exclusive of any such laws as that of natural selection and survival of the fittest and strongest—to be, on the contrary, a world in which the strong shall find scope for their strength, the fittest shall manifest their fitness, in the preservation, the restoration, the salvation of the weak." "To care for our own souls without caring for the souls of others, still more to do so at the expense of the souls of others, is an absolute impossibility." "In the spiritual world the paradox holds true that what you have is not only not lost by giving it to others, but cannot truly become yours until you have given it away."

One last quotation must be permitted, representing the preacher's thoughts of human nature, for a man's conception of human nature is quite as significant of his religion as his thought of God. "We are compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses to the suppressed splendour that lurks in this poor nature of ours. There are latent resources in the least and lowest specimens of humanity which make it brother, and might make it peer and equal of the brightest spirit that ever breathed mortal breath. Yea, with reverence be it said, the very greatness of him who was emphatically son of man was a greatness in which all men may participate. And if you would form some faint conception of what human society may one day become, think of a world in which the common life of all shall rise to the level of what the noblest and best of the sons of men at their highest moments of intellectual and moral exaltation have ever reached. Can imagination in its highest soarings surpass that which I believe to be a hope based on most sober and solid grounds of fact—the hope of a future in which every human being shall be wise with the wisdom of the wisest, and holy with the goodness of the best?"

But no mere extracts can do any justice to the thought, and still less to the power of appeal in these sermons. This volume is worthy to be placed as a classic in the same category with the sermons of Newman, Robertson, and Martineau. They are sermons, not only to be read, but to be studied. They can hardly fail to strengthen the moral and spiritual life of any reader. For a minister they suggest many thoughts, many new ways of dealing with old truths. They do something even more valuable. They inspire a preacher, jaded and discouraged by his own ineffectiveness, and inclined from his own experiences to think little of the power of preaching. They make him realise how great and noble a power true preaching has, and stir him to renewed efforts to win some small portion of that power himself. H. Gow.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THE Contemporary of this month opens with an article by Canon Gore on "The English Church Union Declaration," showing this to be in keeping with the position from the first taken up by the Union, and urging that if "the Niagara" of Disestablishment is to be avoided, the Church, by the re-establishment of reformed Church Courts, must be allowed her legitimate liberties. Dr. Salmon, Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, deals with the Irish University Question, strongly criticising Mr. Balfour's proposal, and maintaining the unsectarian efficiency of his own college. The waste of public money on the endowment of new Universities which are not needed is deprecated, especially while so much is now required for the proper maintenance of the teaching of science. A pathetic interest attaches to the clever and timely article on "Servants and Served," by the late Mrs. Haweis, which was dictated to her husband only two days before her death. Writing on "The Old Age Pension Movement," which has made such progress in the last few months, Mr. Vaughan Nash pleads for Mr. Charles Booth's scheme as containing the best hope of a practical issue.

In the Nineteenth Century Sir Spencer Walpole also writes on "Old Age Pensions," making a suggestion that as the saving capacity of the poor through the Post Office is shown to be so great, and as a man of sixty-five can now purchase an immediate annuity of 2s. 6d. a week for £62 16s. 8d., Government might undertake in such cases to double the amount of the annuity when purchased. Hundreds of thousands of working people have this amount at their command, and in other cases employers might help their old servants to it. The difficulties involved are discussed in the light of the New Zealand Act of last year.

Dr. Arabella Kenealy, in an article on "Woman as an Athlete," utters a warning which ought not to be neglected. The development of muscle is shown to be not an unmixed gain. The "bicycle face," the face of muscular tension, is not the most beautiful, and that is but a sign of a great deal more that goes with it, in the health and the true functions of womanhood.

"Nature can but be disgusted with our modern rendering of baby. So sorry a poor creature the baby of this nineteenth century is, indeed, that he cannot assimilate milk. All the resources of the dietist and chemist are taxed to appease the abnormal requirements of his capricious, incompetent stomach. His mother cannot feed him. Those artificial puffings and pads of the modiste (required by the new muscular development of the enthusiastic cyclist) are but pitiful insult to his natural needs."

An article on "The Natural Decline of Warfare," by Mr. Alexander Sutherland, traces step by step the progress made from the frightful barbarities of our forefathers to the present day, and estimates that if in 400 years war is abolished, that will be what might be expected from the rate of progress hitherto observed. But the growth of human sympathies may be accelerated, and there seems good hope that we may not have to wait so long for the reign of peace.

of a strong believer in the Church, pointing to the contradictions and incompetence of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and affirming the spiritual right of the Church in matters of doctrine and ritual, with which the Royal supremacy, even under Elizabeth, did not presume to interfere. Mr. H. W. Hoare continues his very interesting account of the English Bible, from the Great Bible of 1539 to the Authorised Version of 1611.

In the Fortnightly Review Mr. V. Tchertkoff writes with strong disapproval of the present Peace Demonstration, holding with Tolstoy and the Doukhoborts that the only remedy for the evils of war is total abstinence from any participation in it, or in the support of armies. Considering the retrograde character of the Russian Government, as shown in the cruel treatment of the Doukhoborts and others, including the people of Finland, he resents the praise that is lavished on the Tsar, and holds that it is only mischievous, concealing and drawing away attention from the real evils that ought to be faced. "Romanism in Fiction," by W. Sichel, is an interesting study of Newman's "Loss and Gain," "Lothair," "John Inglesant," "Helbeck of Bannisdale," and other well-known novels, drawing the conclusion that Rome is "obstinate, the same worldly, the same spiritual Rome," and that as she has ceased to be Catholic, having no hope of conquering England, being disestablished in Italy and disendowed in France, her fate is to become a sect. An anonymous article on "Lawlessness in the Church" makes a strong plea for the proper regulation of confession, but indignantly protests against the hearing of children's confessions by the priest. To the article by Mr. O. J. Simon, on "The Unity of the Religious Idea," we have referred in another column.

In the National Review will be found the Address on King Alfred recently delivered at the Royal Institution by Sir Frederick Pollock, and an article on the Established Church by Lord Hugh Cecil, dealing with the inconsistency between the present authority of the Privy Council and the inherent right of the Church to decide matters of doctrine, and also with the Royal Supremacy, which is quite a different thing since the Tudors and Stuarts ceased to rule personally by "divine right." His plea is for Courts which will command the allegiance of all Churchmen.

The Westminster also deals with the crisis in the Church in an article by Mr. Arthur Oldham on "The Primate, the Press, and the People"; while Mr. Dudley S. A. Cosby writes on "The Christianity of the Church of England," as shown in the crisis. His ideal is of a social, humane and scientific Church, in which men will do Christ's will and not teach it alone. The new reformation must free the Church from State patronage, and dogma, and gold; then there will be a ring of truth in the word Christianity.

I COULD not live, couldst thou? to hear a truth

Cry loudly in the heart, and strangle it. Were this the end, no other life beyond, Better to perish thus, our dust unurned (So it might nourish still a living flower), Rather than breathe such breath as hourly kills

The truth that blooms within.

THE UNITARIAN NAME.

SIR,—The letter of Mr. Vickery seems to impel me to carry out the impulse I first felt upon reading Mr. Charlesworth's remarks—namely, to write and assure him that the climate of London is not so wintry as he assumed, but there are many who sympathise in his belief that religious truth can best be cultivated in perfect freedom of the spirit, and that, therefore, a dogmatic name to our churches and institutions is a mistake.

You may be weary of the discussion upon names, but the fact that it is continually renewed proves that there is more in it than some imagine.

Say what we will, Unitarianism stands for dogma, and will always do so in the popular mind. The association of the name with open trusts is an anomaly, but the principle of freedom we derive not from Unitarianism, but from the old Presbyterians, who adopted it not knowing whither it might lead them and their children. To argue, as Mr. Vickery does, that the word Unitarian does not bind congregations any more than the word Presbyterian, is certainly unsound, for the former stands for dogma or nothing, while the latter simply implies a form of church government.

Let me say a word for the ministers that come under Mr. Vickery's condemnation, and who are guilty of "subtleties which the average man or woman neither understands nor appreciates." The fact is that any one whose thoughts are continually occupied on religious problems soon sees that the sharp lines which divide systems cannot be maintained. There are truths in all or they would not exist. God hides Himself in inscrutable mystery, and the best and most devout of us can but touch the hem of His garment; and while freedom to face the problems of life, unfettered by pledges, is a charter to be most precious prized, the demand that they should label themselves anew, and that by a name which seems to imply that they have penetrated a mystery which is in its nature insoluble, comes to many who have released themselves from old fetters with a shock of surprise.

The word Unitarian originated in a time when the Bible was considered the sole source of revelation to which both sides appealed. Now that the basis of faith is shifting its ground, the name is misleading. It implies to the outside world that we believe in salvation through dogma, and that ours is the only true one, and that we do not wish anybody to worship with us who will not accept our teaching; thus it not only conceals, but misrepresents what I conceive to be our real bond of union—namely, the love of truth in the spirit of freedom and sympathy of spiritual aspiration.

The word, too, has its inconveniences. It lays all the stress upon one aspect of religious thought. I have a Unitarian friend who contends that the doctrine of immortality is no essential part of the faith, and he grows restless when the topic is broached. Now, for my part, this doctrine is fundamental and of far more importance to the race than the question whether God is one or three in one. Now I do not wish to be labelled with his unbelief, nor he with my belief, and yet to this danger we are exposed so long as we use the same dogmatic name; but if we worship together in a Free Church, then our position is made clear to all.

I must not make this letter too long, but I have indicated some reasons, I trust, why one who has felt very loyal to the name for a quarter of a century now feels that there is a better thing than Unitarianism; and that is, trying to live with all men in charity and seeking to find a common basis of agreement in all the faiths.

Sir, there is a danger lest we isolate ourselves unnecessarily and fail to take note of the great movement in all the Churches. The old dogmas are disappearing, say what we will. During this Lent I have heard universal redemption preached from Westminster Abbey pulpit, and Socialism under the dome of St. Pauls, while the religious press is full of the new spirit, and, as I read the sign of the times, the Church of the twentieth century will be neither Unitarian nor Trinitarian, as we understand the words.

The great want of the age is Free Churches, and we might have the glory of establishing them if we used our opportunities aright. The bazaar proposed for next year might be the starting-point, and the dream of our venerated leader who is yet with us be realised.

Only two or three weeks ago the resignation of two influential ministers was announced because their teachings were too free for their congregations. Where are these men to go? They would join with us probably in freeing religion from the bondage of creeds, but they might not accept the name Unitarian; that would be to bind themselves anew, and possibly misrepresent them.

No; we want a broader platform—Churches founded on love to God and love to man, and let definitions take care of themselves. E. CAPLETON.

SIR,—In my humble judgment, you do well to reopen your columns to this vexed question. It is by no means settled yet, nor is it likely to be whilst thousands amongst us hold the opinions and convictions so well and temperately stated by your correspondent, Mr. W. Vickery, and stand stunned and perplexed at the quotation you give as coming from the revered source it does. So many of us have for years been taught to hold this simply descriptive name as embodying truths for which they have personally suffered, and for which martyrs have died. All at once comes something like a mandate, couched in strong, but somewhat conflicting language, that the name must be abandoned without another in any way so admirably descriptive being indicated as likely to take its place. It is presumed that we are primarily a body of Christians meeting together for the worship of God, and mutually to encourage each other in 'good works,' but so are scores of other congregations beside us and around us, and they all have some descriptive name simply to prevent confusion to inquiring strangers. When it comes, however, to the one chapel, perhaps, in a town which stands for its distinguishing principles, marking it out as holding a different phase of faith from the rest, down must come its notice board, and strangers be left to wander in unawares to a nondescript, and probably, in their opinion, a very heretical meeting-house.

But the point I should be so glad to have solved is this, and I do not think I stand alone in this matter by many thousands: Why, if I, as an individual Unitarian, am a "sneak and a coward," if I do not confess it, are 20, 50 or 100 individuals holding the like convictions to ignore the name when they meet for worship collectively? Does denial by numbers make them less "sneaks and cowards"? If so, Unity is no longer strength but weakness.

Doubtless it is my fault, but how, with only limited common-sense am I to follow the philosophy of the next sentence you quote: that I, with others, continuing to hold substantially the same name and principles as our forefathers who may have worshipped in the same building for a century or more, am "a traitor to my spiritual ancestry, and a deserter to the camp of its persecutors," because I seek by simple announcement to notify to all whom it may concern that here a congregation of Unitarian Christians meet for worship and freely invite all who wish to attend that service, to do so. Does this deserve to be anathematized? Kindly enlighten my darkness and lift me from the clouds of obscurity. I. M. WADE.

[The forefathers who built many of our old chapels were Trinitarians, not Unitarians. But they handed down the chapels to succeeding generations unbound to their special form of theology, so that the congregations worshipping in them have been and still are free to follow truth alone. The chapels, therefore, may not be bound to a Unitarian any more than they were before bound to a Trinitarian theology, but are held simply as dedicated to the worship of God. What Dr. Martineau urges is that, while as Unitarians we are bound to confess our Unitarianism, whether we do it singly or in fifties or hundreds, as Unitarians united in a worshipping society we ought scrupulously to abstain from applying the name, which denotes our special form of doctrine, to the chapel which is held on an open trust, or to the congregation, which also accepts the principle of open religious fellowship, what Dr. Martineau speaks of as "Our Catholic Communion."—ED. INQ.]

HELPFUL SERVICES.

SIR,—The letter on "Helpful Services" in this week's INQUIRER appears, as you say in your editorial note, to be greatly exaggerated. My experience is that in point of brightness the services compare favourably with any other. The sermons I have had the pleasure to listen to were, in my humble opinion, better than any I have heard elsewhere. I have heard preachers of all denominations wax eloquent and develope a Welsh "hwyl" while dwelling on future rewards to be looked forward to in another world, as a sort of compensation for leading a religious life in this; and I have also heard them thunder forth the threats of punishment, from an outraged God, for disobedience to His will. This caught on in the past, and still catches on, but less than formerly. However, shorn of "future gain," and "present fear," their sermons would be poor indeed. The Fatherhood of God, brotherhood of man, with the essentials "Love" and "Duty" form a nobler theme by far, and cannot fail in the end to appeal to all classes of hearers.

Doubtless there are "Unitarians in belief" in all the various sects. I well remember an elderly deacon in a Baptist Chapel in Wales, who never alluded to, or spoke of Jesus but as "his elder brother," meaning thereby "wiser brother." He was an Unitarian. But Unitarians in other folds may be left where they are.

Not so the Unitarians who form the vast bulk of our population, but who do not themselves know that they are Unitarians, and that there does exist even for them a kindred society in which they could feel at home, and unite with others in worshipping the Father, whom they trust implicitly without at present making any outward profession. Is sufficient being done to get hold of these?

Can you expect a thoroughly hearty service from either minister or congregation when the house is half empty, as many Unitarians chapels are?

Too much is expected of, and left to the minister to perform. Casual visitors are not taken in hand by members of the congregation, and asked to come again. A visitor drops in to hear your service, he is gone before the minister descends from the pulpit, and yet he has been allowed to go without a further invitation. They manage these things better elsewhere, hence their success. It is true that a leaflet may have been placed in his hands to say that he was perfectly welcome—but what of it, it is not the human voice divine; if printed matter were as efficacious as the spoken word, what necessity for a sermon?

Then, again, I am afraid that very little effort is made to bring in outsiders. If each Unitarian took it upon himself as a duty to bring in more hearers, then the cause for complaint would disappear, and the ministers who now struggle bravely would be endowed with fresh life and vigour. T. J. PITT.

MORAL FREEDOM AND FOREKNOWLEDGE.

SIR,—In his review of the current philosophical magazines Mr. Upton touches a problem of the deepest interest—that of the relation of sin and human moral responsibility to the order and perfection of God. The difficulty is so great and solemn that I have hesitated before asking you to insert a reference to it in your correspondence columns; but it is one, nevertheless, for which every Theist is called upon to find some solution satisfactory to himself, whether he is able to phrase his answer in technical terms of philosophy or not.

Mr. Upton criticises the Hegelian idealist view, which sacrifices the independence of our moral decisions to the perfection of the divine order. He quotes Professor Ritchie:—"If we picture God as making man with freewill and then looking on to see what happens, ignorant of the result, there is conceivably a more powerful and more prescient being who knows what will happen as the result of the first God's action. This latter being is therefore God." In order to avoid the inference that our moral responsibility is an illusion, Mr. Upton suggests that God "has voluntarily limited in some degree His own prescience," and asks, "which is the more desirable and perfect universe—that in which the flaw is the absence of moral responsibility, or that in which sin is a real discord, thwarting God's will?"

The answer to this question, it seems to me, must be that the word "desirable" raises an impertinent issue, and that neither conception is that of a perfect universe. We must seek for some solution which will enable us to dispense with fiction. Either we must reconcile God's absolute perfection with the reality of free moral choice, or else admit their incompatibility. I cannot perceive that Mr. Upton's comment removes the difficulty which Professor Ritchie so clearly states, while it certainly creates new difficulties. If God is not all-prescient—it matters not how His prescience has become impaired—there is a conceivably more prescient being. The conception, again, of self-limited omnipotence seems to contravene the second law of thought; and, if it could be established, what would be the relation of God's second state to His former state? Has perfect omnipotence disappeared from existence? If so, for ever? If not, whence is omnipotence to re-emerge? Or are there now two Gods, the one a limited emanation from the other?

All these distresses appear to arise from the discussion of the problem in terms of time. Mr. Upton says (I italicise), "so far as we are able to see it was . . . impossible that God should give to man freedom, and yet at the same time should foresee how in every instance he would use this freedom." Yes, so far as we are able to see; but I submit that human freedom and divine prescience do not combine into a self-evident absurdity, as do divine omniscience and divine ignorance. In the latter case we are able to perceive that there is no possible reconciliation of the two ideas; in the former we are simply unable to conceive the nature or process of the reconciliation. We cannot allow the former combination of attributes without denying the validity of our mental processes; we cannot deny the second without assuming that our mental processes are adequate to All Being. It simply does not follow, because certain phenomena, known collectively as "the future," are beyond the range of our sense-perception and memory, that therefore they are beyond the range of God's knowledge. When we speak of God's "prescience" we are reading our own mental condition, our category of time-extension, into that of which we speak. Surely, then, the idea of time with which we have been familiar since Kant's "Kritik" reached this country, together with an equally familiar interpretation of the divine epithet "eternal," will afford us a solution of Professor Ritchie's problem which is at once more modest and more logical—more satisfying, in Mr. Upton's words, both to our intellectual and moral faculties—than that which Mr. Upton himself propounds.

E. W. LUMMIS.

A FRIENDLY HINT.

SIR,—I am a constant reader, and, to a very great extent, an admirer of our journal. I, however, having—in the course of a long career of a varied kind—been proprietor and editor of a publication, know something of the cares and troubles of those positions. When I turn from the intellectual section of THE INQUIRER, it is always with a sense of feeling better for having perused it. When, however, I reach its advertisement columns I feel annoyed by the scarcity of what may be termed its bone and muscle,—advertisements. Surely, Sir, there ought always to be at least two pages more of these than are usually to be found in the paper. It must be from lack of thought on the part of our co-religionists that more support of this kind is not accorded. It is my belief that very many readers of THE INQUIRER would find it advantageous to themselves to advertise therein, and I know it would be far more encouraging to the proprietary and editorial departments were they to do so.

[We ought not, perhaps, to be too modest, and therefore print our correspondent's letter, for which we are much obliged. It is undoubtedly true that only on a full tide of advertisements can a paper like THE INQUIRER be borne into the haven of such financial prosperity as is to be desired.—ED. INQ.]

THE Preachers' Plan of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association for the present quarter contains the following note on "Brotherhood among the Churches":—

"In addition to their rationalistic theology and freedom from creeds and tests, the above-named churches have one other feature in common—they all have to struggle hard in order to maintain their own existence.

"Isolated and not generally popular, they have for the most part to be content with days of small things, to feel themselves to be as those born into an age not ready to receive them, to endeavour to flourish on the reward usually bestowed upon prophets, and to extract what comfort they can from the thought of the coming day whose dawn they herald.

"There is not denied them the precious privilege of companionship amongst themselves, and it most surely behoves those, who by the nature of the case are cut off from much communion with the larger religious world, to draw very close to each other in bonds of fellowship and love. Every one of the above eleven churches should be in actual contact; sympathy should exist between them all and manifest itself in every practical form; no difficulty, no new enterprise, no cause of rejoicing which affects one of the communities should be considered a matter of no concern to any of the others: we are bound together by everything that separates us from the other ecclesiastic organisations, and so it becomes our duty, as well as a prime necessity of our case, to share a common life and 'build each other up.'"

EPPS'S COCAINE.—Cocoa-Nib Extract (Tea-like).—The choicest roasted nibs (broken up beans) of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—"Cocaine," a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now, with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—James Epps and Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.

LIGHT IN THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW.

THE days are gone when I can look to earth—

My fleshly part is falling to decay;
But if I feel some pain at my new birth,
It shall not take my cheerful faith away.

There is a vale of sorrow for us all;
The holy ones of God in every age
Rejoice to suffer at their Father's call,
And finish thus their earthly pilgrimage.

I've sometimes feared, dear Lord, this vale for me,

And wondered how my heart itself would bear;

I knew not, Lord, how tender Thou would'st be,

Or what fresh springs of comfort would be there.

O 'tis a glorious thing on God to lean—

Almost, methinks, it is the only joy;

It is a vision bright of things unseen,

The rest of love is peace without alloy.

THOMAS SADLER.

OBITUARY.

MR. WILLIAM SCRIVENER.

THE congregation of the Free Christian Church, Clarence-road, N.W., have lost in Mr. Scrivener a faithful friend. It was one of his chief pleasures regularly to attend the Sunday morning service, and in the sanctuary which he loved so well he will be sadly missed. Coming to London over fifty years ago, by energy and intelligence Mr. Scrivener rapidly made his way in business, and for many years has been head of the firm of W. Scrivener and Co., contractors and builders. A man of unusually fine presence and physique, a few months ago symptoms of a painful internal malady appeared, from which his recovery was known to be hopeless. He died at his residence, Hildrop-road, N., at midnight on Sunday, March 26, in his 74th year. On the following Thursday, in the presence of a sympathetic gathering of relatives, friends and employés, an impressive service was conducted in the Free Christian Church by the Rev. Alexander Farquharson, after which the interment took place at Highgate Cemetery. By his death a good and honourable life has closed.

MRS. GEORGE MILLER.

ON Good Friday, our Bedford congregation lost one of its most ardent supporters by the death of Mrs. George Miller, wife of the esteemed secretary of the congregation. From the day of the first service in the town, held in 1872, Mrs. Miller never missed attending service when able to do so; she was most constant and devoted, and considered it a keen disappointment ever to miss being present. For some years she had not been strong, but was able to be present as late as March 12, since which date influenza seized her, and on Friday morning she passed away. The funeral took place on Tuesday, in Bedford Cemetery, the touching and simple service being conducted by Mr. Rowland Hill. The large number of friends present testified to the wide esteem felt for the deceased lady and the sorrowing family.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"If any man cometh unto me, and hateth not his own father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple."
—Luke xiv. 26.

THAT sounds a very hard saying, but we must bear in mind that Eastern people use strong words to express their meaning; and I think you will soon understand what Jesus meant.

His meaning was, that where a thing is right to do we must do it, whatever it costs us, and whoever tries to hold us back from doing it. Not one of those dearest to us is to weigh with us against the highest and best that we see to do.

Do you know the story of the rich young man who came to Jesus? (You can read it in Matt. xix. 16.) Perhaps he had heard Jesus speaking to the people, and seen him blessing the children, and had had his eyes opened to see the possibilities of a wonderfully high and holy life before him, to which he longed to attain. But he was very rich, and Jesus saw that he loved his wealth, and was selfish in it. Jesus first tells him to keep the Commandments (amongst which is "Honour thy father and thy mother," and "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself"); and when the young man says, "All these have I kept from my youth up," Jesus loved him, but said, "One thing thou lackest, go thy way, sell whatsoever thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven: and come, take up the cross, and follow me." "And he was sad at that saying, and went away grieved, for he had great possessions." He had not thought of this. Give up his wealth? He was not prepared for that. It was too much for him, so he turned sorrowfully away.

But those who desire to be God's true children, to come to Jesus and go with him as his disciples, must yield themselves altogether, and hold back nothing. Very often we long to be quite good, to do right always; and we mean to be so: but just when we think we are going to succeed, we find, like the rich young man, that there is a great sacrifice that we ought to make, and we feel that it is just too much, we can't make it, and we hope that God will not mind, and we refuse it. But we have seen it and known it, and we know in our hearts that we have done less than the best we knew. "His own life also"—even that we must be ready to give up; and yet we could not make the sacrifice that we ought to have made. Then we have not really as much love as we believed for what is right: we love something else even better. Then we cannot be disciples of Jesus.

A little story that I have read remains in my memory, though I forget where I read it. A very little boy had been hearing from his mother stories about the martyrs, and how they gave up all that they loved best for love of truth and right. He thought it beautiful, and that he would like to be like the martyrs, and would try to be so. He had one treasure that he loved above all the rest—and this was an accordion, on which he could play music. A little friend came to play with him, and he thought he would give all his favourite toys for his friend to play with, and to choose from; but when he remembered his accordion he felt that he could not part with that; he knew that the martyrs gave up all that they loved best; but, perhaps, nothing was quite so dear as his accordion; so he thrust it away out of sight, to the back of the cupboard behind the other toys, and hoped the little boy would not see it. But when all had been turned out and admired, the accordion was found, and the little boy wanted it most of all. Teddy snatched it from him and burst out crying, and they both cried till Teddy's mother came; and when he sobbed out all his story, and how he had wanted to be like the martyrs, she managed to comfort them both, and I think she helped him to give it to his friend.

A very different story is one that is told of the French Revolution, when, in the terrible time that was called the Reign of Terror, people were hurried to prison, and then to death on mere suspicion, and died without a hope of rescue. An elderly man was thus thrown one night into a dark foul prison, and found himself amongst a number of other prisoners whom he could scarcely see by the light of a wretched lamp. After he had been there some time, and his eyes grew used to the dimness, he could see his companions better; and he watched them, and his eyes passed from one to another, till at last they were stopped at the sight of a young man asleep on a rough bed. It was his own son. He had been put into the prison before his father, and would therefore probably be called out to execution before him. Loizerolles was horrified. He did not wake him, for he thought it might be his last sleep on earth: he sat by him and watched, and hoped he would not wake to see his father there. Then he found a relief to his agony in a thought that gave him just a hope of life for his son. Was not his son named after him? Would not the names of those to go to execution be called in the morning? Who would know the difference between the two men with the same name, if only the son slept on? How he longed for the morning! How he longed for that dreadful list to be called, that he might go first, and leave his son a chance to live! At last it came. What a noise the man made, as he called the names: Loizerolles' heart beat with fear—but not for himself—only lest his son should wake. When the name was called the father promptly answered and came forward, and the son slept on. The doors closed. The band of prisoners called were taken away and executed, and the father had his wish: the son was saved, for the Reign of Terror was over, and he was set free.

The steersman who sticks to the burning ship till he has run it into port, or perished in the attempt; the captain who sees every person under his care put into the boats before he leaves the sinking ship; the boy who jumps into the water to save a drowning child—each of these is urged forward by something that calls him more strongly even than father or mother, or wife, or child: he forsakes all to obey the call, and flings even his own life into God's hands: he withholds nothing, but rushes forward to the call. This is what Jesus means by those words about "hating" all else compared with the highest duty that we can see. When we have once seen anything good or great that we can do, we are bound to do it, and not to flinch, even though it wrings from us great sacrifices. One of the commands given to the Israelites was, that when they made a sacrifice it was to be "without blemish." That is what our sacrifices must be: we must not make a partial or damaged sacrifice, but a complete one.

We are often told that if we do right we shall be happy; but you can easily see that though it may bring us a certain peace to feel that we have not been unfaithful, yet there must often be terrible pain in doing what is right; but that makes no difference in our duty: we must do the right, and not count the cost, but leave the consequences to God. He will not ask of us more than we can bear; and His love will hold us up and guide us, however sad and dark the way may seem.

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

THE report of the Children's Flower Fund, from which we quoted last week, included the following interesting list of flowers sent by a lady from Abergavenny. It will be noticed that by sending leaves and berries when the flowers were over she was able to continue the supply of boxes to her schools until the middle of October. Leaves of trees are most acceptable and useful to the schools, many of the children having no knowledge at all of the different kinds of trees:—

- Mar. 14.—Palm, catkins, dog mercury celandines.
- " 21.—Daffodils and ferns.
- April 4.—Anemones, coltsfoot, primroses.
- " 25.—Marsh marigolds.
- May 3.—Primroses, ladies' smock, sprays of oak in blossom.
- " 9.—Cowslips, bluebells, buttercups.
- " 16.—Cowslips, orchises, bluebells, bird cherry.
- " 23.—Solomon's seal, angels and arch-angels, wayfaring tree, campion, blue bugle.
- " 31.—Bird's nest and tway blade orchises, woodruffe, sanicle, forget-me-not, adder's tongue fern, oak apples, clover.
- June 13.—Moon daisies, yellow iris, ragged robin, bird's foot trefoil, elder blossom, roots of ferns, &c.
- " 20.—Dogwood, wild roses, wild guelder rose.
- " 27.—Wild roses, moon daisies, quaker and other grasses.
- July 4.—Foxgloves, baby beech trees
- " 11.—Vicia Cracca (meadow vetch), yarrow, St. John's wort, yellow vetch, yellow rattle, heal-all, knapweed, meadow-sweet, meadow cranes' bill, Scotch fir and larch with this and last year's cones on.
- Sept. 5.—Nuts and a castor oil plant.
- " 12.—Oak sprays with acorns, ragwort, wild guelder rose berries.
- " 19.—Sprays of hazel nuts, beech nuts, elder berries.
- " 26.—Blackberry sprays, nuts, hips and haws.
- Oct. 3.—Horse chestnuts, bryony, wild clematis.
- " 10.—Walnuts, Scotch firs with cones, spray of apples, larch with cones.
- " 16.—English sweet chestnut, hornbeam, holly.

Miss M. S. Beard, 20, Christchurch-road, Hampstead, London, N.W., will be glad to receive subscriptions, and also the names of any who are willing to undertake to send flowers.

THE UNITY OF RELIGION.

THE breaking down of religious antipathies, and the drawing together in genuine sympathy of members of different religious communities, is one of the most striking and the most hopeful signs of the progress of humanity in the present generation. Underlying all differences of belief we feel more and more deeply that there is a unity of spiritual life, a recognition of the one eternal God, and that to live in the strength of that acknowledgment of God, in obedience to His holy will, is the very essence of religion, common to all alike. Our endeavour is no longer to prove the falseness of the religion found in other communities than our own, but to enter with sympathy into the inward life of others, to see what elements of spiritual truth they may have grasped, and, in the light of such fuller knowledge as our broadening sympathies may bring, to gain for ourselves and for the world, if it may be, a larger measure of the truth of God.

With this feeling we can have only the most cordial welcome for the promise contained in an article in this month's Fortnightly Review, by Mr. OSWALD JOHN SIMON, on "The Unity of the Religious Idea." This article contains a further exposition of Mr. SIMON's ideal of a modern "Jewish Theistic Church" and its mission to the world, of which he wrote in a previous number of the same review in October, 1896, and subsequently in the Jewish Quarterly Review.

Christendom, Mr. SIMON holds, has been unable to think of God without a mediator in human form, and he quotes, as fairly representing the Christian attitude, a sentence from the Spectator, in an article criticising his first paper, to the effect that "God without the human life, which most perfectly represents Him, is something like a vast abstraction, a Being to be described by negatives." Against this conception Mr. SIMON sets the religious experience for many generations, both before and after the time of CHRIST, of the Jewish people, whose witness to the world is that it is possible to conceive God without representation in human form. Deeply convinced of this spiritual truth, and of its significance for all mankind, he urges that the people of Israel, through a long hereditary realisation of the Divine Spirit, are best fitted to unite all races in the worship of the Supreme, and to disseminate enthusiasm for righteousness.

The centuries of Jewish history which have intervened from the time that the New Testament was edited and published have produced a new history of religious faith in the secluded sanctuary of the Synagogue itself. The immanence of the Divine Spirit, the measure of the Divine love, and the durability of spiritual life and of self-containment, have borne in this later Jewish history tests more remarkable and more convincing than any narrative of miracle working. Can it be possible that the long ages of Jewish history, through those dreary centuries which followed the decline of the Roman Empire until the French Revolution, have borne no fruit of fresh testimony to the eternal truths which have been implanted upon the heart of Israel? Can Israel not speak with the authority of a matured experience about the deepest truths which human faith has to tell of the Divine Constancy? That distinguished spokesman of the Jewish Faith—the second Isaiah—had related long since the story of his people's growth and tribulation. There is not a sentence in the memorable fifty-third chapter of Isaiah which does not bear the reality of a life-like picture—a true key to a mysterious tragedy. The history of the Jews during the nineteen centuries which have ensued since their dispersion is nothing less than a tragedy, mysterious, however, only to those who do not know its spiritual secret.

What form the active missionary effort of the Jewish Theistic Church would take we cannot say, but we should earnestly welcome any further knowledge of the inward religious life of the Synagogue, and any demonstration of its spiritual power. "Everything which was narrow and local," Mr. SIMON says, "has gone from Israel, leaving only what is universal"; and when it comes to be more fully expounded we should expect that the message of the Jewish Church would prove to be practically identical with that of the religion of Jesus.

This being so, we are somewhat puzzled by one passage in Mr. SIMON's article, where he speaks of the sentence from the Spectator quoted above, as to the universal demand for a mediator, as "absolutely true of the whole world of Christendom," and adds that "the growth of Unitarianism which is derived from Christianity does not dispel the impression"—which leads to the conclusion that the Synagogue is the "one human witness of the possibility of conceiving God without representation in human form." This seems to us inconsistent with Mr. SIMON's subsequent acknowledgment of "a kind of spiritual partnership between the Jews and the Unitarians," and with the following passage:—

The name of Christian is still claimed by that thoughtful and highly-spiritual body known as the Unitarians. The religious influence of Dr. James Martineau is one which has enormously increased within the last ten years, and which is likely still further to grow. I purposely use the expression religious influence, because I mean much more than his moral influence. The spiritual help which the volumes of that great writer are giving to multitudes of persons who are not avowedly Unitarians is a striking proof that men may cling to God and to all the ethical ideals of the Gospels and the Epistles of St. Paul and of other apostles, when they no longer accept the doctrines of the Trinity and of the Incarnation upon which they are based. The followers of Dr. Martineau do not experience that God is "inconceivable," and only to be described in negatives. The immanence of the Divine Spirit is nowhere more intelligible than in the teaching of this eminent Unitarian.

From this we should conclude that there are others besides Jews who are teachers of this profounder spiritual truth, and indeed Mr. SIMON says in so many words: "We (the people of Israel) rejoice to see our work taken up by others; but the fact that it is taken up by others cannot absolve us from doing it ourselves."

And for our own part we must say that Mr. SIMON does not seem at all to do justice to the spiritual character of Christian teaching. The doctrine of the Incarnation implied in the Spectator sentence does not mean that God can only be "represented in human form," and the doctrine of the Divine Immanence is certainly held by a large number of devout Christians who are not Unitarians. Another criticism we ought not to omit in passing, is of a sentence of Mr. SIMON's, quoted above, in which he seems to say that the Gospels and Epistles are "based" on the doctrines of the Trinity and of the Incarnation. This surely is a complete inversion of the history of those doctrines.

At the same time, as we have already said, we can have only the most cordial welcome for any religious message that may come to us from the Synagogue. We do not think that the Christian world will be led back into the fold of Israel, nor that there is any need for such a return. But the spiritual teaching of the Synagogue may well blend with the spiritual teaching of the Christian Church, for the perfecting of that ideal of the Kingdom of God which is inseparable from the religion of Jesus.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING AT MOSSLEY.

THE fifty-fourth annual meeting was held at Mossley on Good Friday, unfortunately in unpropitious weather. There was a continuous drizzle during the greater part of the day, which deterred a considerable number of friends from joining in the proceedings. As it was, the chapel was well filled for the morning service, conducted by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., of Bolton.

Taking for his text "He that observeth the wind shall not sow, and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap" (Ecclesiastes xi. 4), Mr. Street spoke of "Religious Timorousness," especially with reference to the training of children. Childhood, he said, was the great seed-time of human life, and the solemn duty of sowing the good seed of honour and integrity, of gentleness and love, of purity and truthfulness, rested on all who were entrusted with the care of the children. Much of the responsibility rested on Sunday-school teachers, but far more on the parents in the home. Often it was no more than an unworthy timidity that sealed the lips of father or mother. They feared to speak, because it was difficult, or they dreaded the consequences. But the consequences of a cowardly silence were much more to be feared than those of timely and necessary speech. Both in morals and religion much weary wandering into a far country might be saved the inexperienced wayfarer if those who were responsible for setting him on his journey would only furnish him with information, marking out the trustworthy roads and warning him against the pitfalls and dangers they themselves had long since learnt to know and avoid. A little more courage and conviction on the parents' part, and a little more of the sense of responsibility for the moral and spiritual welfare of the children, would save them from an unprofitable excursion into the realm of superstition or of sin, and from being crippled in mind and soul during the richest and most promising years of life. No parent had a right to cast his child adrift on the sea of thought without at least giving him the benefit of compass and rudder, oars and sails, and imparting all such knowledge as he himself had found helpful in the voyage of life. If parents did not give the right direction to their children's lives, others would be sure to give them some direction, and very likely a direction they could not approve. Many people admitted the duty to give a moral bias to their children, who yet would not give them a religious bias, as though religion were a thing that grew up of itself and needed no training. But if their free faith was worth anything to themselves, they must teach it to their children and not suffer them to drift into apathy or be drawn into superstition. The religious education of children was a duty of the most sacred importance, laid first on the parents, and then on the Sunday School teacher. The dawning faculties of the soul must be assisted by such aids to faith as the mature experience of parent or teacher supplied. The central truths of religion, very few, but supremely important, must be unfolded and explained; and at the same time every indication of growing independence of thought and character should be hailed with joy and heartily encouraged.

A child's spiritual life might be permanently stunted by unwise and unrighteous training. There were many people who never learnt to walk alone in religion, but clung to dogmas which crippled rather than helped their true inward life. The task of the Sunday-school in their Free Churches was to educate rather than to instruct, to draw out the inborn faculties implanted by God, so that they might respond to the appeal which the facts of life made to them, to cultivate the sentiments and affections so as to make them harmonise with the eternal truths represented by the thought of God and man, to set free the well-spring of the soul's inner life. But the Sunday-school teacher and the minister would succeed but slenderly, unless the first principles were established at home, and the parent by word and example led the way.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The afternoon business meeting was presided over by Mr. CUTHBERT C. GRUNDY. After the singing of a hymn, the CHAIRMAN moved the following resolution:—

That the Manchester District Sunday School Association, representing seventy-eight Sunday schools in Annual Meeting assembled—being deeply convinced that the time has fully come when the Governments of the Nations should seriously endeavour to seek, by international discussion, the most effectual means of securing to all peoples the benefits of a real and durable peace, and of putting an end to the progressive development of the present armaments—desires to strengthen Her Majesty's Ministers in their expressed intention of giving energetic and hearty support to the Peace Proposals of His Imperial Majesty the Tsar of Russia, and hereby authorises a copy of this resolution to be sent to Lord Salisbury.

In support of it he said the pecuniary aspect of the question was not the most important aspect, but nevertheless it ought to engage their very serious attention. The expenditure on naval and military matters had been growing at an enormous rate during the last thirty years. If the same rate of increase prevailed one shuddered to think of the burden that would be laid upon the country thirty years hence. The time had surely come when, instead of resorting to war, arbitration should be made use of. If it were impossible altogether to do away with combat between nations, it should, at any rate, be the case that war is the last resort. It was said that this Conference would probably be a failure. With that they had nothing to do. Whether the Conference accomplished what was desired or not, it was their bounden duty to support the Conference.

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT seconded the resolution, was which carried unanimously.

THE REPORT.

The report of the Committee recorded a continuation of varied work on behalf of the associated schools. The hearty appreciation of the advantages offered by the seaside home, and its usefulness in many cases of weakness, especially during the summer months, had led to the suggestion that a holiday home might be established in the country, primarily for teachers and scholars connected with the affiliated schools and unions. The question was first considered by the Seaside Home Sub-Committee in August last, and sprang from a suggestion made by the Rev. W. R. Shanks at a meeting of the ex-General Purposes Committee in March, 1898, which ran as follows:—"That it is desirable to form camping-out parties in the summer amongst the scholars in our schools." At the General Committee meeting in September last a discussion arose on the question of camping parties and boys' brigades, the outcome of which was that the secretaries were requested to invite suggestions from anyone interested in such movements, and to summon a special meeting of the General Committee to deliberate on these suggestions. On Oct. 18 last a Conference of organisers of holiday parties from their schools and others interested was held, and the following recommendation was passed:—"That it is desirable the Association should urge upon the schools the advisability of arranging for joint holidays for the scholars and teachers, and that the Association should consider the practicability of assisting the schools by providing a suitable holiday house or by making some other arrangements of a similar character, and that a sub-committee be appointed to consider the matter and to report." A special meeting of the General Committee was held on Oct. 25 to consider the recommendation of the Conference. The recommendation was adopted, and a sub-committee was appointed to the scheme. The first meeting of the Holiday Home Sub-Committee was held on Nov. 25, at which the Rev. C. Peach expressed the opinion, gained by practical acquaintance with the locality, that the village of Great Hucklow, about five miles from Hope Station (Midland Railway) or Miller's Dale Station (Midland Railway), would be a most desirable village in which to establish a holiday home. The Sub-committee were pleased to receive from the Rev. Lawrence Scott the offer of a plot of land in that village, on which more or less dilapidated buildings now stand, for the purpose of erecting thereon such a home as is contemplated by the Association. The Sub-committee had been empowered to draw up a full and detailed scheme, special attention being directed to the cost of building and furnishing the proposed home. Meanwhile the Association desired to thank the Rev. Lawrence Scott for his handsome offer, and would be glad to hear from the School Committees how far they would be prepared to support this movement. It was interesting to remember that so early as 1856-7 the desirability of founding a home for destitute orphans received the consideration of the Committee (of which only three members remained—namely, the Revs. John Wright, B.A., Jeffrey Worthington, B.A., and Mr. R. D. Darbishire, B.A.). Circulars were issued to all the affiliated schools "suggesting the formation in each school of a fund for the benefit of the destitute orphans connected therewith." This showed the broad basis of the work of the Association, which had developed, after a lapse of forty years, in the establishment of the seaside home. The suggestion was made that the managers of schools should now adopt the plan of forming joint parties of teachers and scholars, and should be the means of helping their young people to the enjoyment of a summer holiday amongst country sights and sounds, and away from the excitements and bustle of crowded holiday resorts.

The year's work embraced the following schemes—namely:—

- (a) The publication of another Number of Hymns and Choral Songs (Third Series, No. 9).
- (b) The arrangement of musical settings to the Children's Services, already published.
- (c) The continuation of the Examination Scheme.
- (d) The Temperance Branch of Work.
- (e) The Visits of encouragement to Schools.
- (f) The imparting of knowledge of natural objects in connection with Rambles.
- (g) The giving of Lectures during the Winter season.
- (h) The selection of Lesson Sheets for Infant Classes.
- (i) The maintenance and management of the Seaside Home.
- (k) The holding of a Teachers' Soirée.
- (l) The compiling of Annual Statistics.

Amongst the publications promised was "Subjects for a Systematic Course of Moral Lessons in Sunday-schools," compiled by the Rev. J. Freeston, and originally published by the Manchester Unitarian Sunday School Union. The Seaside Home had been a great success. During the year 65 children have spent an aggregate of 159 weeks there. All the beds were occupied during June, July, August, September, October (two weeks) and November. The total cost for the year had been £94 14s. 9½d.; the average weekly cost per child being nearly 7s. 2d. Towards the income of £108 14s. 0d. the Sunday-schools themselves contributed £63 11s. 6d. As regards the general fund of the Association, the accounts showed an adverse balance of £12; and to continue necessary work the income of the Association must be materially increased by means of additional private and school subscriptions. The Visitors' Report showed that in the matter of discipline not one of the 45 schools visited had its "order" reported as bad. The statistics showed an increase of 51 teachers, 291 scholars (an increase of 180 over sixteen years of age); altogether there were 13,843 scholars on the books.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the Report, said he hoped some practical result would follow the consideration of a Holiday Home; for the fact of teachers and scholars going away together and sharing common interests would generate unique influences. The Examinations had been satisfactory; in no previous year had there been so few failures. There was an improvement in the Temperance work; but the summer and winter lectures were not so popular as they ought to be. Regarding the Seaside Home, he could say that Blackpool was quite a favourable place for convalescent children in the winter months. Other denominations were intent upon signalling the coming year in various ways, why should not they? If every superintendent, teacher, and scholar gave a farthing a week for one year, the total sum would amount to £700, which in the hands of the Committee could be used to good purpose. In every town and village within the district where twelve Unitarian boys and girls could be gathered together, there they ought to establish a Sunday school.

Mr. J. WIGLEY seconded the resolution, which was passed.

The officers were then re-elected as follows:—President, Mr. C. C. Grundy; treasurer, Mr. G. H. Leigh; secretaries, Mr. D. A. Little, Rev. John Moore, and Mr. Peter Higson. A large and representative Committee was also appointed.

The CHAIRMAN made some interesting remarks concerning some statistics, which were being compiled for the purpose of showing the length of years which their veteran teachers have served in Sunday-school work. A number of the present workers had been in harness over fifty consecutive years.

The Assembly welcomed representatives from kindred Associations—namely, the Rev. W. G. Cadman (Sunday School Association), Mr. J. H. Brook (Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union), and Mr. Kimberley (North Midland Association).

The Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, in supporting the vote, drew attention to the project of having a summer holiday school for teachers at Manchester College, Oxford. It was proposed that such teachers as wished to do so should spend eight or ten days in the College. The first meeting would be held in July. The holiday would not be quite of the kind teachers were accustomed to, but he was sure it would be highly enjoyable, combining study and recreation. To many teachers it would be an event in their lives to pass ten days in that beautiful college and chapel, to go on the river, and to enter into the atmosphere of that great University city.

The Rev. W. G. CADMAN, in responding to the welcome, gave a short outline of the holiday scheme, a scheme which, he thought, would prove highly advantageous to teachers, and at the same time yielding them the utmost enjoyment. The cost to a teacher for the ten days' stay would be about thirty shillings. There would be morning lectures by the professors, a common dinner at midday, and the afternoon might be occupied in looking over famous colleges, or in some other enjoyable way.

Mr. J. H. BROOK and Mr. KIMBERLEY also responded. Mr. Kimberley mentioned the interesting fact that Mr. Chamberlain was many years ago his Sunday-school teacher.

THE EVENING MEETING.

The evening meeting was presided over by Mr. John GLEDHILL, of Mossley, who, in his opening remarks, said that each of the four superintendents in the Mossley Sunday School had a record of forty years' service in Sunday-school work.

After a hearty vote of thanks had been accorded to the Mossley friends for their admirable arrangements, Miss HARRIET M. JOHNSON, of Liverpool, delivered an address on "Our Future Citizens," dealing with Temperance Reform mainly in its bearing upon the young.

In the course of her address Miss Johnson said:—

At the end of the nineteenth century in a civilised Christian land it may seem superfluous to quote the ancient prophet's words, "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge," and to make this statement before an intelligent audience of teachers may even seem an impertinence, yet it is sadly true that year after year tens of thousands of British citizens are destroyed directly by strong drink, and hundreds of thousands more perish indirectly through the same cause. This is a difficult subject to speak of to the cultured class of moderate drinkers, who always have a feeling that because they know a little about a great many things their opinion is, therefore, valuable on all questions, even on those they have never yet studied. Add to this the fact that most Unitarians have a horror of temperance tracts (as savouring of blood and fire), and the result is that as a body we lag behind all other denominations in temperance work. As an example of the ignorance on the subject of alcohol which may exist, even in doctors who have had a scientific training, I may mention a leading Liverpool doctor, who in taking his degree had passed a brilliant examination, who yet said that neither in his studies nor in his examinations had he ever a text-book or question on the subject of alcohol. He found, on questioning some forty of his brother medical men, that their experience had been the same. Doctors, like other people, are divided on this great question into those who have studied the effects of alcohol on body, mind, and soul, and those who have not yet begun to do so. But the proportion of medical men who do study it is increasing year by year. Let me give you a few facts in the words of Dr. Carter, one of our leading physicians in Liverpool. He had just been studying the last Blue Book issued by the Registrar-General which states (page xxiv):—"The mortality directly referred to intemperance in 1896 was 91 per million among males, and 52 per million among females, these rates being considerably in excess of the mean rates in the ten years immediately preceding."

Dr. Carter remarks that we have "no exaggeration or elaboration of facts here, all is businesslike and unimpassioned, the nation's account of its profit and loss of health and life being put down with all the clearness and accuracy of the profit and loss account of a responsible mercantile business. Other facts show that year by year, almost without a single break in its cruel and pitiless progression, the mortality from drunkenness has been and is increasing, and they show what is worse, and what should rouse the national conscience, or, if conscience is dead or asleep, should rouse the nation to a sense of its imminent danger, namely, that the deaths are increasing among women far more rapidly and in a far greater ratio than among men."

Dr. Carter tells us further that in the Registrar-General's returns from 1877 to 1881 the average death-rate from typhus fever was 28·4 out of every million in England and Wales. These terrible figures roused sanitarians to speak out and say such a death rate was a disgrace to the nation. They demanded a more stringent Public Health Act, got it, and as a result the deaths from typhus fell to 2 per million. In those same years (1877 to 1881) deaths directly due to alcohol were 43·3 per million, yet no legislation was demanded, and that rate has steadily risen to 91 per million in 1896. It seems impossible to think that any of the boys and girls in our Sunday classes should be among those hosts who are destroyed for lack of knowledge of this common "Enemy of the Race," but prison statistics, which have lately been looked up, reveal the following facts. Of 10,000 prisoners in England and Wales, whose antecedents could be traced, 6,500 had averaged 2½ years each at some Sunday school. Of 15,000 who had passed through Glasgow gaol in a year, more than three-fourths had been Sunday scholars, and drink was the chief cause of their downfall. Holloway had 21,000 prisoners one year, of whom more than half had been in Sunday schools, and nine out of ten of these had gone wrong through drink.

The worst of it is that the victims of drink are not the wastrels, but the frank, pleasant, sociable, good fellows. Surely it is a blunder for Sunday schools and churches to neglect temperance teaching. Sunday-school teachers often stand in the position of parents to the members of their class; it is their earnest wish that, with God's blessing, they may train the young people into devout, intelligent, helpful Christian citizens. If only Sunday-school teachers fully realized the fearful temptations to which their children are exposed through the drinking habits of the country, they would put aside habit and prejudice, and make any sacrifice to preserve them from ruin. The children have faith in their teachers' love and wisdom, and look to us for guidance as to which path they shall take, and we teachers are giving them an answer either by word or conduct. Surely, then, it is our duty to study the Temperance question, and let every child go out into life knowing there is a danger, and protected against it. To this end, every Sunday-school should have its Band of Hope, not as a mere appendage, but as an integral part of its work. This would also be a help to our Sunday-schools in many ways, of which I will suggest the following:—

1st.—It would do much to develop the moral courage of the scholars, for it takes a great amount of moral courage to say "No" to the first glass, in the face of example and custom and ridicule. Having learnt the practice of saying "No" in this, they will be more able to say "No" when other temptations present themselves.

2nd.—It will tend to shield them from many loose companions and bad habits.

3rd.—It will strengthen the Sunday school by providing a natural field where the elder scholars can find employment and learn the great lesson of doing some work for others. Temperance work is really a fundamental part of religious teaching, for in training our future citizens we must not neglect their need for a sound mind in a sound body. These will help to develop a healthy will-power and teach him to let his higher self be master of his lower self that he may be a free-will citizen of the Kingdom of Heaven.

Miss JOHNSON then referred to the further duty of seeing to the environment in which the children have to grow up, and spoke on the lines of her recently published pamphlet, "Our Future Citizens,"* describing what has been done to protect children from the contaminating influences of the public-house, and quoting the opinion of doctors, various public authorities, women workers and licensed victuallers themselves. The pamphlet concludes as follows:—"If ever it should be necessary for some future Gibbon to write the 'Decline and Fall' of the British Empire, which God forbid, it will be the record of barbarian ravagers within rather than without the Empire, for a nation may breed its own over-running barbarians. Not vast territories nor weight of ironclads will save our country, but the honour of its men and the courage of its women. To this end a race of well-born children must be reared with sane minds in sound bodies.

"Investigation into the terrible moral and physical evils caused by allowing young people at the most excitable and reckless age to frequent public-houses, reveals the immediate need in England for protection by law of at least all under the age of eighteen.

"Eighteen is the best defined age marking the distinction between a 'child' and an 'adult,' and we notice that in the Bill for Child Protection, now before the Legislative Council at Adelaide, the word 'child' is defined to mean 'a boy or girl under the age or apparent age of eighteen years.'

"Eighteen is the age in Russia, Norway, and Sweden, under which young people are prohibited from entering public-houses. In Canada and the United States the age is twenty-one.

"Is it nothing to you all ye that pass by?" Such was the pathetic lament of the Hebrew poet of old when his fellow-countrymen passed the ruins of their Temple without concern. That was only a temple of stone, but each of these young souls is a living temple of God, to be kept pure and holy. Can there be a sadder sight than that presented by the yearly ruin of thousands of these temples of God? Is it nothing to you all ye that pass by—you, Christian men and women of civilised England, who have learnt of Christ that One is our Father in Heaven, and that all we are brethren? Let us no longer "pass by on the other side," but rather hold out a helping hand to those who are in need, denying ourselves for them in the spirit of the Christ."

Concluding her address, Miss JOHNSON moved:—

That this meeting of the Manchester District Sunday School Association, realising the grave evils both physical and moral arising from the practice of young people frequenting public-houses, would respectfully urge the Home Secretary to promote such legislation as shall prohibit all sale of alcoholic beverages to young people under eighteen years of age, thus giving the same protection to young people in England as is given in Russia, Norway and Sweden. This meeting also reminds the Home Secretary that in Canada and the United States such protection is extended up to the age of twenty-one years.

Mr. WIGLEY, of Pendleton, seconded the resolution. He said that the Temperance question was one which could not and ought not to be excluded from the Sunday school. He was glad to hear that Liverpool had roused up, for it was only a few years ago when it dealt in free licences—gave them to anyone who applied for them. He thought that the advertised subject had only been indirectly dealt with—namely, "Our Future Citizens." The two prevailing characteristics of men and women of the working-class were Ignorance and Indifference. Often the voter did not know the difference between red and blue, and a glass of beer would fetch him one way or the other. God has laid down a law as to the well-being of life, and boys and girls should be taught it. Our great and chief work is to arouse their thought and conscience. Much has already resulted from public education. Juvenile crime and other crime—even intemperance—has been reduced. The working-class is too unreflective and indifferent. Their thought and conscience must be stimulated. There are some very burning questions right in the front of us in the present time, concerning Wealth, Poverty, Crime, and Premature Death, and we must direct attention to them. Our scholars must be taught something of the privileges and political duties of citizens. The future interests of this country will be committed to their charge, and they must be adequately equipped. Sunday-school history has already a bright record. Co-operation had its rise in it, also mechanics' institutes, penny banks, &c. Let the teachers realise that they are trustees under God, and determine to hand on their trust improved.

Messrs. S. Taylor, Herford Lawton, Fogg, Roecroft, and Newby, and the Revs. B. C. Constable, W. C. Hall, W. H. Drummond, and J. J. Wright joined in the discussion.

After a vote of thanks to Miss Johnson for her paper, a hymn was sung, and the meeting was brought to a close.

Notwithstanding the inclement weather, the attendances were very good; while the friends at Mossley are to be congratulated upon their prompt and efficient catering. The work of the Association is in a healthy and vigorous condition, and, from the remarks made by President and Secretaries, it is clear that it will be still further developed in the near future.

STAND CHAPEL.

THE history of the older congregations in our religious community is often rich in varied interest, going back as many of them do to the earliest days of Nonconformity, and having numbered among their ministers many notable men. There are separate histories of a considerable number of these congregations, and it is much to be wished that as far as possible the records of everyone of them should be preserved in an available published form. Among the most valuable of such histories, published some time ago, are Mr. John Taylor's account of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, continued by his son Mr. Edward Taylor in 1848; the Rev. Benjamin Carpenter's account of Presbyterianism in Nottingham and the neighbourhood, and of the High Pavement Chapel, originally contributed to the Christian Reformer, and after the author's death, re-published by the Rev. J. J. Tayler; and the Rev. Charles Wicksteed's account of Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, in his lectures on "The Memory of the Just," in 1847, when the old chapel was giving place to the present building. Of more recent histories the most notable is the Rev. Alexander Gordon's masterly account of Dukinfield Chapel, and we have also histories of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and several others. A Bicentenary naturally prompts to the telling of the story, if it has not already been told, and such was the origin of the "Memorials of Stand Chapel,"* first published in 1893, to which our attention has recently been called—a little book which should be added to the collection of everyone interested in our congregations.

The early history of Stand Chapel is somewhat obscure, but the formation of a congregation at that particular place seems to have been due to the fact that, six miles from Manchester and Bolton alike, it was beyond the range of the Five Mile Act, and though Stand was "a lonely spot," being not even a village, there were several influential Puritan families in the immediate neighbourhood. The first gatherings for worship, before the passing of the Toleration Act, were held in private houses, or in a barn, and it was during the ministry of the Rev. Robert Eaton, that in 1693 the chapel was first built, on land leased from the trustees of the Stand Grammar School. Of Robert Eaton Mr. Herford gives an interesting account. Born in 1630, he was educated at Cambridge but took his Master's degree at Oxford in the Commonwealth time. He was among the ejected of 1662, giving up a perpetual curacy he held near Warrington, and for some years was chaplain to Lord Delamere, at Dunham Park. He then settled in Manchester, and in 1772 took out a licence for the holding of religious services in his own house in Deansgate. There, in October of that year, the first ordination among Nonconformists was held, since the passing of the Act of 1662, Oliver Heywood, John Angier, of Denton, Henry Newcome, and Henry Finch taking part with him in the service. Eaton continued to live in Manchester during his ministry at Stand, and until his death in 1701, when he was succeeded at Stand by his son Samuel.

The history of the congregation was uneventful, and followed the lines of many other of the older congregations, unbound by doctrinal trusts. During the eighteenth century the movement of thought proceeded, the Calvinism of the founders being gradually abandoned, and distinctive Unitarian teaching at last prevailing.

At Stand it was the Rev. Richard Aubrey, who was minister from 1788 to 1793, who first preached definite Unitarianism; so that, in 1791, a large minority of the congregation, of more orthodox sentiment, seceded, and founded a Congregational Church.

In the present century the ministers have been:—

Thomas Smith...	1793-1811
Arthur Dean ...	1811-1831
Thomas May ...	1831-1841
Philip Pearsall Carpenter	1841-1846
John Cropper ...	1846-1866
William Croke Squier ...	1867-1885
Robert Travers Herford...	1885

During Philip Carpenter's ministry the Sunday-school was revived, and among the teachers, both morning and afternoon, was Travers Madge. The account of the school, which follows that of the chapel, is of special interest. It was among the earliest Sunday-schools established in this country, dating back at least as early as 1783, when Mr. Nathaniel Philips opened a school in his warehouse at Whitefield, subsequently transferred to Stand Chapel. The school was, therefore, contemporaneous, if not prior to the work of Robert Raikes at Gloucester.

Among the trustees of the chapel, of whom Mr. Herford also gives an interesting account, we meet repeatedly with the names of Gaskell, Crompton, Philips, Walker, Kay, Hibbert, Robinson, Taylor, Wood, and Grundy. Of these, Mark Philips and George William Wood, both appointed to the Trust in 1815, were leaders of the movement in support of the Dissenters' Chapels Bill of 1844. Mr. Wood had been Chairman of the Dissenters' Committee, and on his sudden death in 1843, Mr. Philips succeeded to the post. Such men have been the strength of liberal Nonconformity for generations, and those who have inherited from them liberties gained in hard-fought battles, do well to hold their memory in honour, while in their own day they strive to be faithful to the same high trusts. As a stimulus to such faithfulness, the records contained in Mr. Herford's little book, and others of the kind, are of great service.

So we should live, that every hour
May die as dies the natural flower—
A self-reviving thing of power;
That every thought and every deed
May hold within itself the seed
Of future good and future meed:
Esteeming sorrow, whose employ
Is to develop, not destroy,
Far better than a barren joy.

Lord Houghton.

MERCIES RENEWED.

I SORROWED that the golden day was dead,

Its light no more the country-side adorning;

But whilst I grieved, behold! the East grew red

With morning.

I sighed that merry Spring was forced to go,

And drop the wreaths that did so well become her;

But whilst I murmured at her absence—lo,

'Twas Summer.

I mourned because the daffodils were killed,

By burning skies that scorched my early posies;

But while for these I pined, my hands were filled

With roses.

Half broken-hearted I bewailed the end

Of friendship, than which none had once seemed nearer;

But whilst I wept, I found a closer Friend,

And dearer.

Thus I learned old pleasures are estranged

Only that something better may be given,

Until, at last, we find this earth exchanged

For Heaven.

EMERSON.

BY THE REV. WILLIAM BINNS.

WE recently reported briefly a lecture by the Rev. William Binns on "Emerson," of whom he spoke as "the finest genius produced by the American people, in freshness, freedom, and the straightforward course in which he walked in communion with the Universal Soul."

We are glad now to be able to give a further report of the greater part of the lecture, for which we are indebted to the Blackpool Times.

Emerson's originality, said Mr. Binns, consists in his getting nearer the fountain-head and the springs of thought than ordinary men. He is the richest-souled American in his knowledge of world literature. All religious philosophies and nations are abiding guests at his intellectual fireside. With many people the literature and history of the past are simply an inheritance. When we use it we draw cheques on the bank of unconscious memory, and contribute little more of our own than our signatures to the cheques, and the amount we draw. But Emerson does more than simply draw cheques. It is with him, though in a less degree, as it was with Shakespeare. He adds a special personal value of his own; he makes pence into shillings, shillings into sovereigns, and mints new money such as never saw daylight before. Shakespeare had a philosopher's stone, and transmutes the baser metals into gold. Emerson also had this philosopher's stone, but he does not use it with the spontaneousness or the easy omnipotence of Shakespeare. He labours more with it, and keeps polishing it up. Still he is the most original of Americans, always remembering that the best human originality consists in getting nearer the inspiration of the Almighty.

We see Emerson most fully in his books, and reading a series of extracts would reveal him better than telling what I think about him. But his books everybody can see. Nowadays there is a hunger and thirst for biographical details. It is quite legitimate, and I shall try to satisfy it; leaving you to read his marvellous writings at your own homes. A long and honourable genealogy belongs to him, going back to one of the English barons of Bulkeley, in Chester, who helped to secure Magna Charta. Another ancestor was a co-worker with Cromwell; a son of his, Peter Bulkeley, was a Church clergyman silenced by Archbishop Laud. This Peter, and some of his congregation, emigrated to America in 1634. They called the place where they settled "Concord," a significant name, and the origin of the present famous town of Concord. Peter preached there, and his son Edward after him. A daughter of Edward married the Rev. Joseph Emerson, who came from the English York, or Durham. Ralph Waldo Emerson was born of this ancestry on May 25, 1803. In his later years, he asks, "How can a man escape from his ancestry?" He did not escape. Who would wish for a finer ancestry than Magna Charta barons, Cromwellian patriots, and exiled Puritans? From the Peter Bulkeley silenced by Archbishop Laud, down to Ralph Waldo Emerson, they were a family of preachers. His own father was a co-worker with Dr. Channing. He himself was educated for the ministry at Harvard. Outside his theological studies his favourite authors were Shakespeare and Montaigne, and he used to read Sir Walter Scott's novels far on into the night.

When he was twenty-six, he became co-pastor with the Rev. Henry Ware, a Boston Unitarian minister; but he soon left the regular ministry. He had then no heresies such as are now common to all Unitarian ministers, but he disliked the bread and wine used at the Communion service. He thought the true communion should be purely spiritual, and should be shown outwardly, not by eating and drinking, ourselves, but by satisfying the needs of others. Henceforth he devoted himself to writing and lecturing, although he preached occasionally for Unitarian friends as long as he was able to appear in public. In 1838 he gave his famous lecture on "The Christian Teacher," at Harvard. It is an interpretation of Christianity which commends itself more and more to the religious soul of mankind, and said what Carlyle was saying at the same time in Fraser's Magazine, and was received with universal condemnation, except, as Carlyle says, "by an Irish Catholic priest, and a Mr. Emerson of Concord." When he visited England, he spent a delightful day with the inspired Scotch Dyspeptic at Craigen Puttock, and paid a pilgrim's devotional visit to Wordsworth at Rydal Mount.

His life flowed on uneventfully. He never grew rich; such men as he never do grow rich; but he always earned enough to live on in comfort. When the war between the North and South broke out he was a tongue of fire, and kindled into flame the laggard sympathies of over-careful politicians. Both by speech and pen, he worked for the emancipation of the negroes. He never talked much on religious subjects in private, but when he did his remarks were weighty. Almost his last pulpit utterance was a sermon on the death of Theodore Parker, a spirit kindred to his own, but more volcanic in his nature. In his old age he suffered from a curious infirmity: he was unable to recall the names of things, and had to describe them by their uses. Thus he would call a chair "that which supports the human frame," and a plough "the implement that cultivates the soil." He used to laugh and joke about what he styled his "naughty memory," but he could not remember the words "chair" and "plough" when he wanted them. In his eightieth year he died. Some people said that he did not possess saving faith, and were afraid that his lot in the next life would be disagreeable. Of course, he was outside the self-designated Evangelical Free Churches, but he was a genuine saint of the Church of God. Father Taylor, an honest Boston missionary, said:—"If Emerson goes to hell, he will change the climate, and emigration will set that way."

In 1873, Professor Tyndall said:—"The first time I knew Waldo Emerson was when, years ago, I picked up at a stall a copy of his 'Nature.' I read it with delight, and I have never ceased to read it; and if anyone can be said to have given the impulse to my mind, it is Emerson; whatever I have done, the world owes to him." On the fly-leaf of the little volume he wrote, "Purchased by inspiration;" and he might have added, "Written by inspiration." It indicates the doctrine of Evolution in these suggestive lines:—

Striving to be the man, the worm
Mounts through all the spires of form.

In theology, Emerson was a Theist with very Pantheistic leanings; indeed, in the essay on "The Oversoul" there are many sayings almost as Pantheistic as Spinoza, and some of the outbursts of St. Paul. He often appeared to be inconsistent, but such apparent inconsistency is unavoidable with glowing minds. The real consistency which we require is the development of the whole life in the diversified manifestations of one idea. In philosophy it may be that Emerson often lost man in God, the Finite in the Infinite, and free will in necessity, but in practice he found again what he had lost in philosophy, as we all do in our turn. He is a stimulant to thought. People come like new creatures from the essays on "History," "Self Reliance," "Compensation," and "Nature." His "Representative Men" makes them free of the world's foremost society. His whole personality creates a deeper reverence for mankind and for God, the Eternal Divine fact, towards whom we struggle our way. I have preferred to describe the man rather than to describe his writings. He was a lover of God, and loved by God, and such a man as Christ would have taken to his heart. He fulfilled what he tells us is part of a man's business in life—

To hold fast the simple sense,
And speak the speech of innocence;
And with heart, and body, and blood,
To make his bosom counsel good.
He that feeds men serveth few,
He serves all that dare be true.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Aberdare.—The annual tea party and concert in connection with the Highland-place Church, held on Thursday week, was a decided success. At the concert Mr. Rees Llewellyn, the present High Constable of Aberdare, presided, supported by the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, Col. Thos. Phillips (treasurer) and L. N. Williams (secretary). A varied programme of music was rendered by a number of friends.

Bournemouth.—Sunday, March 26, will long be remembered by members of the Bournemouth Church, as quite a record was created in point of numbers, about 350 members and visitors being present to hear the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke. Many of those present stood through the whole service, others being accommodated with seats in the vestry and on the platform; quite 100 went away, as they could not find even standing room. About fifty friends came over from Poole and Ringwood. Mr. Brooke preached a very eloquent and impressive sermon on "Love and Trust." At the close of the service a large number of Mr. Brooke's tracts were distributed.

Chatham.—The Rev. G. S. Hitchcock has been elected at the head of the poll a member of the Medway Board of Guardians, under whom, while in the Church of England, he acted as Workhouse Chaplain.

Choppington.—On Good Friday a special memorial service was held in this church, when the minister in charge, the Rev. Arthur Harvie, preached on "Rev. Robert Spears, a Unitarian Apostle." The sermon concluded as follows:—"His exact place will never be filled, because there is no need it should, but we may hope that his spirit of zeal for the fundamental truths of Unitarianism—the Unity and Fatherhood of God, and the brotherhood and sonship of Man—will never be lacking in our midst. Unitarians can boast many names famous in the world's records, and count amongst their company leaders in science, literature, and politics who have reflected glory upon the denomination; but when we come to recount the inner history of this movement which has done and yet will do so much for mankind, when the details of its propagation through the latter part of this century come to be told, a very high place, perchance the highest, will be allotted to its devout apostle Robert Spears."

Cirencester.—Eastertide was kept here by a commemoration service on March 30. On Good Friday the annual tea and social meeting was held, which many helpers, rendering willing service at the tables, and song and music, made a great success. On Easter Sunday the Rev. Henry Austin preached in the morning on "Nature's Indications of Human Immortality"; and in the evening on "Is Man worthy of Immortality?" the text being "I am the resurrection and the life."

Darlington (Appointment).—The Rev. H. Bodell Smith, who is at present officiating at Devonport, has accepted a cordial invitation to become the minister of the Unitarian Church in this town.

Dean Row.—A congregational soirée, the last of a series of social evenings and lectures which have been taking place during the winter, was held in the schools on Saturday evening, March 25. Mr. J. Holme Nicholson took the chair; and amongst other guests were the Rev. J. C. Odgers, former pastor, and Mrs. Odgers. Music, instrumental and vocal, was contributed by various friends, and was much appreciated; as was also the opportunity afforded for meeting old and scattered friends. Speeches were made by the Rev. J. C. Odgers, the Rev. J. Felstead and the Chairman; and these, with conversation, and tea, and photographs, helped to pass a successful evening, in spite of inauspicious weather.

Devonport.—Christ Church was on Wednesday, the 29th ult., very prettily decorated by Miss Oram (of London) in honour of the wedding of Harold Ashton, only son of the Rev. T. B. Broadrick (District minister), of Bridgewater, to Kate Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Mr. F. J. Jeffery, of Devonport. The ceremony was performed by the father of the bridegroom, assisted by the Rev. Wm. Agar, of Sidmouth, Miss Merivale kindly presiding at the organ. A large number of the members of the congregation and other friends were present.

Glasgow: South St. Mungo-street.—The Literary Society held its closing social meeting on Thursday, March 23, when Mr. W. G. McLeod presided over a company of between eighty and ninety persons. After tea a varied programme of songs, readings and violin selections was gone through, and two hours were then devoted to dancing. The annual business meeting of the society was held on Thursday, March 30, Mr. W. G. McLeod, the president, again in the chair. The secretary read a satisfactory report. The attendance at the meetings had averaged twenty-one, a number far in advance of the attendance of recent years. The treasurer reported a balance on hand, and the officers and committee for the ensuing year were appointed. A committee was also appointed to organise Saturday afternoon rambles during the spring and summer months.

Kidderminster.—During the past "Lenten Season" the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans conducted a Confirmation class on Monday evenings, at which the book entitled "Our Unitarian Faith," by J. T. Marriott, was read and discussed. The same book was also read and discussed at our Young Men's Adult Class on Sunday afternoons. As a result of this, on Thursday, the eve of Good Friday, March 30, a Confirmation service was held, which was conducted entirely by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, of Oxford, who gave a very impressive address, in which he drew attention to the anniversary they were celebrating that evening of the Lord's last supper with his disciples, emphasising the lesson of the occasion in the words "I have overcome the world." Professor Carpenter dwelt upon the necessity of the feeling of close communion and filial relationship with God in order to be able to resist temptation, overcome disappointments and discouragements, and find in every tribulation the Divine Light of Love. At the close of the service the Lord's Supper was administered, in which the Rev. A. W. Timmis (of Stourbridge) and Mr. Evans assisted. The service throughout was of a most helpful and inspiring character. There was a good congregation, and thirty young men and women were confirmed and welcomed into the Church.

Leeds: Mill Hill.—On the Thursday evening before Good Friday the communion service was held, continuing the unbroken custom of forty years, in observing the anniversary of the Last Supper. In the Record of March, 1859, the Rev. Thomas Hincks announced that the service would be held on that evening at Mill Hill, adding, "Though new to us, this is a cherished custom in some of our Unitarian churches." The Basinghall-street Day Schools are to be given up at Midsummer, the character of the neighbourhood having changed, and the School Board now supplying more effectively the need which forty years ago this undenominational school was established to meet. The Education Committee of the Leeds Industrial Co-operative Society have ordered 2,000 copies of Mr. Hargrove's sermon on "Industrial Peace," in last month's Mill Hill Pulpit.

Liscard.—On Sunday evening, March 26, the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas concluded a well-attended course of four lectures on the Ritualist controversy. His subjects were: "The Origin and Growth of the Tractarian Movement," "The Use and Abuse of Ritual," "Sacredotalism: The Root Evil," "The New Reformation: The Way Out of the Controversy." In dealing with the last subject he began by setting forth the principles of the Old or Lutheran Reformation. Luther had at first asserted the rights of reason, but then set up the Bible in the place of authority formerly held by the Pope. Those who cried to-day "Back to the Old Reformation" must be either ignorant or panic-stricken. The true cry was not "back" but "forward—forward to the New Reformation." Four hundred years of moral, intellectual, spiritual development could not be made to count for nothing. The growth of the critical spirit could not be kicked away as a poisonous fungus. It was impossible to retreat, cowardly to halt, dishonest to temporise, imperative to advance. The New Reformation would recognise the simple but revolutionary truth that the ideal of Christ was not "the Church," but the Kingdom of God. It would come not to destroy, but to fulfil. Church and Bible would be brought to the bar of Religion, not Religion to the bar of Church and Bible. The Catholicism of the Church would be swallowed up in the Higher Catholicism of the Kingdom of God. Life and all its vast mysterious issues lay within that Kingdom. Our politics, local, social, imperial; our private and public callings; commerce and industry, no less than charity and philanthropy—all these must be directed towards making real the kingdom. In so far as there was an external authority at all—it was the authority of the constituents of the kingdom—the authority of God in the corporate reason and conscience of mankind. Thus we had a way out for political action which was not secular nor yet ecclesiastical, but simply religious. The New Reformation must first take place in the intellect and soul of individuals and society before it could be externally and politically realised. The Old Reformation was partial and incomplete. We could no longer find an Infallible Pope rolled up in the sacred pages of the Scriptures nor yet in the history of organised Church Catholicism. Both authorities had hopelessly broken down under the strain put upon them. We must abandon the search for absolute Infallibility. There was no such thing; for Revelation was not sealed and knowledge grew "from more to more." Dr. Fairbairn had nobly said, "True Catholicism must be as comprehensive as the action of God; whatever is less but expresses the particularism of man." The average attendance at the four lectures was 185.

London: Brixton.—Efrat-road Chapel was completely filled on Easter Sunday morning, when the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached. The service was conducted by the Rev. James Harwood. Taking for his text Ezekiel's Vision of the Valley of dead bones, Mr. Brooke said that it was the vision of a people's resurrection, seen by the prophet even in the hour of the desolation of Jerusalem, because of his faith in goodness and righteousness as indestructible. It was the same vision Christ had on the Cross when his cause seemed to be destroyed. The prophet knows that spiritual life is indestructible, and when that faith takes hold upon the people they are saved. In the present age covetousness was destroying the people, but there were still those who believed in higher life. They could be true to the spiritual ideal of Jesus, and through them would come a resurrection of the whole people, and, finally, of all mankind.

Loughborough.—The services in the workhouse have for some time past been voluntarily conducted by the Nonconformist ministers of the town, the guardians declining to appoint a chaplain, and the clergy of the Church of England declining to co-operate with Nonconformists. The plan of services was arranged by the Ministers' "Fraternal," but the Rev. H. E. Haycock, the Unitarian minister, was excluded. This exclusion having been objected to, Mr. Haycock's name has now been added to the list of those who are to conduct the services.

Portsmouth: St. Thomas's-street.—The annual congregational tea meeting was held on Good Friday. There was a good attendance, one table being solely occupied by members of the Portsmouth P.S.A. The chapel was decorated with spring flowers. After tea a selection of vocal and instrumental music was given by the choir and friends, the whole being well rendered. Mr. T. Bond, who presided, thanked all who had so well provided for the enjoyment of the evening; it was a pleasure to them to find several new friends also interesting themselves in making the work in which they were engaged more effective for good by their constancy and mutual help—so much depending upon the spirit in which good work is done, as well as having faith in the ultimate triumph of truth and righteousness.

Saffron Walden.—On Good Friday the 62nd annual tea and public meeting were held at the General Baptist Chapel. The Rev. J. A. Brinkworth presided over the meeting, when a varied programme of 25 sections was rendered with good effect. A friend of Mr. Brinkworth's, Mr. Marshall, from the State of Michigan, America, gave an address. The chapel was full, and a pleasant evening was enjoyed by all.

South Shields.—The anniversary services were conducted in Unity Church on Sunday last by Mr. L. Worstenholme, of Middlesbrough, who delivered two excellent discourses to fairly large congregations. On Easter Tuesday the annual tea took place in the schoolroom, after which a public meeting was held, when addresses were delivered by the Revs. A. H. Harvie and Shadforth, Messrs. Slater, Coysh and others. Music was rendered by the choir. The gatherings were very successful and encouraging.

Stockport.—On Sunday week the Rev. B. C. Constable completed a series of five Sunday evening discourses on "Rational Religion, in the Light of the New Evangelical Free Church Catechism," embracing the Bible, the Trinity and the Deity of Jesus, Salvation, Miracles, and the Hereafter. The evening attendance was thereby considerably increased, and a report in the local press of the discourse on the Bible called forth letters which, as usual, contained not a single argument, but merely assertions and abuse, to which Mr. Constable wrote letters in reply. On Thursday, 23rd ult., Lieut. Colonel H. Turner gave an interesting lantern exhibition in the schoolroom on "A Visit to Norway," together with slides illustrating a visit to Llangollen, and also a series illustrating some of Dickens's leading characters. The lantern was kindly lent by Mr. Oliver Coppock, and worked by Mr. H. N. Cooper. There was, unfortunately, only a small audience, but the exhibition was much enjoyed.

DEPTFORD CHAPEL, Church Street.

AN URGENT APPEAL.

The condition of the roof of the above Chapel has long been a source of grave anxiety to the congregation, and the damage done by recent gales reveals the need of its entire and immediate reconstruction. The Vestries adjoining the Chapel are also beyond repair, and must be removed.

It is proposed to reconstruct the Chapel roof, and to replace the Vestries by an Iron room, which would afford increased and much needed accommodation for Sunday School and other purposes.

A good work is being done in the neighbourhood, which is densely populated by the very poor, and the congregation is wholly composed of poor but earnest persons who are unable to do more than meet the incidental expenses of public worship.

An urgent appeal for funds is made by the congregation that the work, which will involve an outlay of about £230, may be undertaken at once, as arrangements must be made to meet for worship elsewhere.

The Provincial Assembly of London and South Eastern Counties have, with the full sanction and approval of the London District Unitarian Society, promised the sum of £25 from the St. Alban's Fund, when the amount raised reaches £150.

Donations or promises will be thankfully received by the Treasurer of the Fund, G. W. CHITTY, Esq. (President of the Provincial Assembly of London and S. E. Counties), Mildura, Park Avenue, Dover; or by the Minister, the Rev. A. J. MARCHANT, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E., by whom they will be acknowledged.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

NEXT Friday will complete another year of Dr. Martineau's wonderful life. Friends throughout the country and in many lands will be glad to know how well he is. At ninety-four the strength of eighty, when he was still publishing his great works, is not to be expected, but seldom has a beautiful old age been so little burdened as it is for him. He is able to drive out nearly every day and to enjoy the growing beauty and brightness of this spring-time. But we will venture to repeat our warning of last year, and earnestly plead with friends not to overwhelm the household with flowers and letters of congratulation. For our beloved Teacher it should be a day of quietness, in the most intimate circle of his home. Neither he nor they need to be assured of the overflowing gratitude and veneration and affection which silently encompass him.

MANY of our readers will have heard, with the utmost satisfaction, that the Aberdeen University has recognised the literary labours of Miss A. Swanwick by conferring upon her the honorary degree of LL.D. The following extract is from the Aberdeen Daily Free Press, giving an account of the ceremony on April 7. Professor Pirie, introducing Miss Swanwick, said :—"The honorary degree will be conferred, in absence, on Miss Anna Swanwick, a distinguished authoress in two departments of literature. She was one of the workers—of whom Thomas Carlyle is the most famous—who, about the middle of the century, set about familiarising the people of this country with the masterpieces of German literature. Her chief work in this department was a translation of Faust, published 1850. She is not less distinguished as a Greek scholar, having translated in 1865 the 'Æschylean Trilogy.' In 1873 appeared her great work, a verse translation of the whole of 'Æschylus'—a rendering which has not yet been surpassed in its kind. She has also done much, by her example and influence, to establish ladies' colleges in England, and generally to raise the standard of female education. In recognition of these valuable services, the Senate has resolved to confer on Miss A. Swanwick the title of Doctor of Laws."

A FAREWELL reception was given recently in Edinburgh to Dr. Sophia Jex Blake, on her retirement from medical practice. The reception was given by the Marchioness of Bute and others interested in the Edinburgh Hospital and Dispensary for Women and Children; a resolution of congratulation on a great work accomplished, and of regretful farewell, was proposed by Emeritus Professor Masson, and seconded by Dr. Peel Ritchie. It was Dr. Jex Blake who led the fight in this country for the admission of women to training and University degrees in medicine. Admitted in 1869 as an undergraduate in medicine to the University of Edinburgh, opposition prevented her and fellow-students who had joined her from completing their course. In 1874 Miss Jex Blake, with her companions, founded the London School of Medicine for Women, and three years later, after successful examination, received the diploma of the Irish College of Physicians, which thus led the way in the recognition of women. In 1878 Dr. Jex Blake returned to Edinburgh, and opened a dispensary for women and children. Since 1886 she has been Dean of the Edinburgh School of Medicine for Women, which is now recognised by the University.

The April number of Concord contains an interesting collection of opinions on the results of the Peace Crusade, from leaders in the movement. Mr. W. T. Stead, who published the last number of his War against War on March 31, writes :—"I have come out of the campaign with very little hope that anything practical will be done at once in the way of an arrest of armaments. My chief hope lies in the recognition by all nations that the time has come when something must be done to establish an international centre, whatever that centre may be. At first it might be a board of peacemakers, developing by steady stages into a board of conciliation, then into a court of arbitration, and ultimately into an international tribunal, whose authority would be enforced by the armies and navies of all Powers who took part in its deliberations."

THE Centenary of the Church Missionary Society has been celebrated this week by services in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, and great meeting in the Albert Hall and Exeter Hall. On April 12, 1799, a meeting of twenty-five persons was held in a tavern in Aldersgate-street, when it was resolved : "That it is a duty highly incumbent upon every Christian to propagate the knowledge of the Gospel among the heathen." The bishops at first looked coldly on the movement, but now the Society has thousands of agents in many lands, and its income last year was £322,972.

THE Manchester Labour Church has issued an appeal on behalf of workers in the Potteries, which is endorsed by the Dean of Manchester, Archdeacon Wilson, Father Bernard Vaughan, Lady Dilke, Miss Gertrude Tuckwell, Mr. Harry Rawson, Canon Hicks, Dr. Emrys Jones, the Revs. Dr. Mackennal, Dr. Maclaren, S. A. Steinthal, C. Peach, and others. The terrible evils resulting from the use of raw lead for the glaze of pottery are now clearly demonstrated, and have been acknowledged by the Home Secretary.

"Mr. Tennant, M.P. for Berwickshire, in bringing the matter before the House of Commons July 29, exhibited a sample from Messrs. Minton's works glazed without lead, and which the manager of the works declared was as good for all practical purposes as any glazed with it. In the same debate, Mr. Woodall, M.P. for Hanley, and a pottery manufacturer, said : 'It has been known for some time that fritted lead instead of raw lead for glazing was, if not quite, at least comparatively innocuous.' Dr. Prendergast, of Hanley, says 'That he has been informed by the manager of a Continental pottery that they fritt together all the ingredients of the glaze and that in his works lead poisoning was unknown.' Sir Sir Henry Taylor, chairman of the Possil Park White Lead Co., Glasgow, says : 'There is a complete remedy for the evil of lead-poisoning. The reason why lead-poisoning continues is that prejudice, ignorance, and apathy, and the influence and ramifications of an old-fashioned trade are hard matters to fight, while purchasers in general attach very little importance to non-poisonous properties or the health of the workers.'"

MANY proposals have been made to counteract the evils named—better sanitary arrangements; strong Parliamentary legislation; effective inspection of Potteries—all of which would no doubt do much to alleviate the present evils. But it is feared no measure will meet with complete success unless it has the sincere co-operation of all who buy the earthenware so needful in our daily life. Let the purchaser demand only goods glazed with non-poisonous materials, and the manufacturer will soon find it to his interest to produce them. The appeal concludes by urging upon the Government that the following reforms should be effected:—Extend the Workmen's Compensation Act to Injury from Lead-Poisoning. Let the State, and not the employer, pay the examining doctor. Appoint a woman factory inspector for the Potteries. Prohibit the employment of young workers under eighteen—as is the case of the White Lead Works. Insist upon the use of glazes in which raw lead is not introduced.

THE discovery last August of the new planet "Eros" is described in the current number of the Nineteenth Century. This little planet, with a diameter of probably less than twenty miles, is our nearest neighbour in the solar system, except the moon, and was discovered unexpectedly by Herr Witt, at the Urania Observatory at Berlin, while making some other observation by means of a photographic plate. "Nearest neighbour" towards the end of next year will mean a distance of about thirty-one millions of miles between the earth and Eros, and that is the nearest it will come for the next twenty-four years. The great value of this discovery is that it gives us a new point for measurements in space, and will enable the distance between our earth and the sun to be determined with far greater accuracy than before. Following on this discovery comes news from America of a ninth satellite to Saturn, discovered by Professor W. H. Pickering, who states that it is shown on four photographs; is of the fifteenth magnitude; has a period of about seventeen months; and is the most distant satellite from its primary at present known in the solar system, circulating at $7\frac{1}{2}$ millions of miles from Saturn.

THE success of the experiment in telegraphing across the Channel without a wire gives rise to many curious speculations. It seems that a message sent out from a point of wire on the English coast was received at a similar point on the French coast near Boulogne, and was read with as much exactness and as easily as if a wire had extended right across the intervening thirty-two miles. It has also been found that fog does not interfere with the transmission, so that the new discovery may be of service on the coast when other signals fail. If, however, a stationary point of attachment is not necessary for the receipt of a message, it would be awkward, since caves-dropping ships might be able to pick up confidential messages that were passing across the sea. It will be interesting to learn whether such a message makes for itself one invisible line through the ether, or is simply diffused through space to be picked up by any capable wire on the other side or anywhere within its circle, for in the latter case there could be no privacy, except by code; and if such a means of communication became general, what a Babel there might be at any critical moment! One can imagine a confusion of French and English arriving at some wire, and at last a shout of indignation (if you can shout by telegraph), "Will you be quiet, I want to get my message through?" From another point of view, the new telegraphy may prove, like thought-reading, a strong incentive to people to keep their minds at least respectable, since there are so many sharp-sighted daws about.

WRITING from Rome to the Athenæum, Mrs. Humphry Ward tells of the proposal to erect a statue to Henri Frédéric Amiel, the author of the "Journal Intime," in one of the public squares of Geneva. "There are," says Mrs. Ward, "certainly many readers on both sides of the Atlantic who owe much to the 'Journal Intime'—to its sad courage, its delicacy of thought and feeling." The book has had a wide diffusion, and has found its way to the sympathy of many differing minds, so that substantial help towards this commemoration should be forthcoming. Subscriptions may be sent to Professor F. F. Roget, Président de la Commission Amiel, the University, Geneva, Switzerland.

It is announced that the Liberation Society's annual meetings will be held on Wednesday, May 3. Lord Battersea is to preside at the City Temple meeting, and Mr. Henry J. Wilson, M.P., at the Council Meeting. It is suggested by the Committee that as last year many ministers of Free Churches preached on a given Sunday on "The Spirituality of Christ's Kingdom," so this year one of the services on either April 30 or May 7 should be devoted to the religious aspects of the Disestablishment Movement.

THE Rev. C. J. SNEATH, late curate of St. Paul's, Balsall-heath, near Birmingham, whose secession from the Church of England was recently announced, is a man of great determination, who made his way into the Church through the greatest difficulties. Although nearly blind, he learned to read, and was for many years lay-reader in the church before taking orders, and was held in high esteem throughout the district. Last Sunday Mr. Sneath began to hold services at the Moseley and Balsall-heath Institute. Adopting the name "Our Father's Church," he announces as the principles of the church the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and the leadership of Jesus.

MR. ARTHUR BACHE MATTHEWS, of 556, Stratford-road, Spark-hill, Birmingham, asks us to say that he has been appointed secretary of the Associated Members' Branch of the "Christian Church Society." The basis of the Branch is stated to be:—

To promote the recognition of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ as an absolutely unique and spiritually all-sufficient revelation of the nature of God. Associate-Members are all those who, while not living near a local Branch, still wish to deepen their own devotional life in union with other Liberal Christians; and who send their names to the Secretaries. The Associate-Members receive the badge and manual, and subscribe one shilling or more annually. The object of the Society is: "To promote in all its members holiness of life and work for God."

THE watchfulness of the Literary Guide has noted two expressions in articles recently contributed to THE INQUIRER, which it regards as neither reasonable nor just to other modes of thought. We are glad of any warning that may guard us against even the suspicion of unfairness, into which, in referring to views which we do not share, it is only too easy to slip. The most serious objection is taken to the expression "blatant, helpless infidelity" connected with the name of Richard Carlile. The Literary Guide says that in Carlile's days "a man who advocated Rationalism in religious matters might be excused if he was somewhat blatant," but adds that to speak of such a man or of his principles as "helpless" is a gross misuse of language, since sturdy self-reliance was a prominent feature in his character. The term might be applied to a man's views without any slight upon his character, but our contributor admits that the whole expression was used with too little consideration.

SIR MONIER MONIER-WILLIAMS, Professor of Sanscrit in the University of Oxford, died at Cannes on Monday in his eightieth year—a victim of influenza. Born at Bombay, Monier-Williams was educated at Kings' College and Haileybury. In 1860 he was appointed to his Professorship, and was founder of the Indian Institute at Oxford, which was begun in 1883. Twenty years he spent over his great Sanscrit dictionary.

ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH.—I.

ALTHOUGH it is doubtless true that a poet is born—not made, yet even poets are not exempt from the changing and moulding power of circumstances. If the poet's talent—if I may adopt the well-known saying of Goethe—is best nurtured in quietness, his character, like that of any other man, is wrought in the throng of the world. And on some these formative influences from without are more powerful than on others. Their souls are sensitive and sure to be quickly affected by the experiences through which they pass, even though they may be strong enough to master them. Perhaps in no poet of equal power do we see so clearly as in Clough the traces which the intellectual conflicts of his youth had left upon his mind and character. If, on the one hand, we are inclined to wish that he had oftener been able to escape into a larger and serener world where not even the echoes of theological controversy should be heard; yet, on the other hand, none who have been perplexed as he was will fail to feel grateful to one who not only has often given lovely poetic form to what is apt to be so unlovely, but also has shown again and again how the tumult of the intellect may be but the stormy surface of the soul in whose depth is the calm of a child-like simplicity and a faithful and loving heart.

Arthur Hugh Clough was born at Liverpool on Jan. 1, 1819; but from the time he was four till the time he was nine years old, his home was in America at Charlestown. Perhaps we may attribute to the ocean voyages and the seaside life of these early years the beginning of that love for the sea which is manifested in some of his best poems, and supplied some of his most striking images. How full of the sensations of a sea voyage is that early poem, "Qua cursum ventus," which describes so pathetically the estrangement which, without any fault of their own, may come upon two brother-souls!

But O blithe breeze! and O great seas,
Though ne'er, that earliest parting past,
On your wide plain they join again,
Together lead them home at last.
One port, methought, alike they sought,
One purpose hold where'er they fare,—
O bounding breeze, O rushing seas!
At last, at last, unite them there!

And in later years, when other journeys mari magno had been added to those of his childhood, he is always well inspired, I think, when he speaks of the sea:

The contemplation of the mighty main,
The vaulted heavens above, and under these,
The black ship working through the dusky seas.

In 1828 the little boy of nine returned to England and was sent to school at Chester, and a few months later became a pupil of Dr. Arnold at Rugby. To spend eight years at Rugby, under the great headmaster, must have exerted a great influence upon the character of any boy. But upon such a nature as Clough's the influence was probably exceptionally great. We see from his school-boy letters how thoroughly the noble Christian ideal of school-life which Arnold was constantly setting before his boys had taken possession of this favourite pupil. Already in his sixteenth year he wishes to make "the improvement of the school" his first object, and three months later he writes: "I verily believe my whole being is soaked through with the wishing, and hoping, and striving to do the school good, or rather to keep it up and hinder it from falling in this, I do think, very critical time." Perhaps Arnold's severe standard of duty and aspiration, which, for most boys, was an unmixed good, may have produced in Clough a habit of introspection and self-examination not altogether wholesome at his age. There may be a grain of truth in the language which Clough puts into the mouth of the old-fashioned uncle in the humorous epilogue to "Dipsychus":—"As for my own nephews, they seem to me a sort of hob-badehoy cherub, too big to be innocent, and too simple for anything else. They're full of the notion of the world being so wicked, and of their taking a higher line, as they call it. I only fear they'll never take any line at all."

In October, 1837, after "having gained," as Dr. Arnold told him in public, "every honour which Rugby could bestow, and done the highest credit to his school at the University," he commenced his residence at Oxford as scholar of Balliol. If his boyhood had been passed under the spell of Dr. Arnold's noble character, he was now plunged into a society which was swayed by a not less mighty personality. Many pens have described the strange power which Dr. Newman was wielding in Oxford at the time. Matthew Arnold, for instance, has told us of the charm exercised by his eloquence and earnestness in the pulpit of St. Mary's. But it was not in the pulpit only that Newman made his influence felt. "In pamphlets, reviews, and verses," we are told, "he was continually pouring forth eloquent appeals to every kind of motive that could influence men's minds." It was impossible that Clough should not have been affected by this turmoil. For a time at least he was inclined to become a follower of the great leader, all the more that Ward, one of Newman's ablest and most ardent disciples, was his intimate friend. But it was only for a time. The movement which Newman led was itself a strong reaction from the liberalism in religion which had begun to set in from Germany, and when Clough and others who had begun by yielding to the attraction of the doctrines of Catholic authority which Newman preached were at length unable to assent, they in their turn were subject to a violent reaction towards those liberal ideas which had been the prime cause of all the tumult. There can be no doubt that it was a misfortune for many young men at Oxford, and especially for such a sensitive and conscientious mind as Clough's, to have been forced to take part in the bewildering theological controversy, when he ought to have been peacefully devoting himself to reading. He himself felt the strain. Writing to a Cambridge friend, he says: "I truly hope to escape the vortex of philosophism and discussion (whereof Ward is the centre), as it is the most exhausting exercise in the world; and I assure you I quite makarize you at Cambridge for your liberty from it." But it is a mistake to suppose that what is called "the Oxford Movement" dominated the University. Much of the best life at Oxford at the time had little knowledge of it and less interest in it. And, even in the case of those whom it influenced greatly, it was but a small part of what Oxford had to give.

It is probable that the "philosophism and discussion"—which, after all, he could not escape—had much to do with his losing his first class to the disappointment of many friends, especially of Dr. Arnold. However, in 1842, less than a year after taking his degree, Clough was elected fellow of Oriel, and in the following year was appointed tutor. It seemed as if a quiet and happy career was opening before him. For he had a great gift of teaching and a wonderful power of making himself beloved by his pupils. Many of his pupils have testified to this. One says: "When I recall those days, the one thing that comes back upon me most, even more than the wisdom and loftiness and suggestiveness of his conversation, is his unselfishness and tender kindness. Many must have told you what a gift he had for making people personally fond of him: I can use no other word. For myself, I owe him more than I can ever tell, for the seed of just and noble thoughts sown, for the pure and lofty type of character set before me; but the feeling of personal attachment is the strongest of all."

It was while he was fellow of Oriel that he spent three long vacations among the mountains as tutor to a reading party—the first at Grasmere and the others in Scotland, experiences which were to provide him material for his first long poem, "The Bothie of Tober-na-vuolich." But before that poem was written, in 1848, he had resigned his tutorship, and before it was published his fellowship also. For a long time he had felt his position at Oxford more and more of a bondage. He was precluded from giving expression to some of his deepest thoughts, and he began to long for freedom. How he had thus repressed himself through respect for the convictions of those around him may be seen from the following quotation from a letter written in April, 1848: "Up here at Oxford, I keep in general company very quiet, inasmuch that I heard yesterday that people not unfrequently take me for some time after introduction to be no less than a Puseyite; but, at the same time, I could sometimes be provoked to send out a flood of lava boiling hot amidst their flowery ecclesiastical fields and parterres. Very likely living in this state of suppressed volcanic action makes one more exasperated than one should be when any sort of a crater presents itself. Nevertheless, there is wisdom in withholding." And, in a letter written a few weeks earlier, after speaking of the revolutionary movements with which many parts of Europe were being agitated, he says: "Well, and when shall I see you again? . . . Will you hire yourself out as a common labourer? I hope not; but one may do worse, undoubtedly; 'tis, at any rate, honest than being a teacher of the Thirty-nine Articles. I rejoice to see before me the end of my servitude; yea, even as the weary foot-traveller rejoices at the sight of his evening hostelry, though there still lies a length of dusty road between." So "he went forth not knowing whither he went," rejoicing in his freedom, but with many regrets for the ties of friendship which must be strained or broken by his departure. In the volume of poems called "Ambarvalia," which appeared in 1849, the joint production of himself and an old schoolfellow, there are three touching poems by Clough which speak of the partings of friends. I have already quoted from "Qua cursum ventus." I may here give the shortest of the three, called "Sic itur."

As, at a railway junction, men
Who came together, taking then
One the train up, one down, again

Meet never! Ah, much more as they
Who take one street's two sides, and say
Hard parting words, but walk one way:

Though moving other mates between,
While carts and coaches intervene,
Each to the other goes unseen;

Yet seldom, surely, shall there lack Knowledge they walk not back to back,
But with an unity of track,

Where common dangers each attend,
And common hopes their guidance lend
To light them to the self-same end.

Whether he then shall cross to thee,
Or thou go thither, or it be
Some midway point, ye yet shall see

Each other, yet again shall meet.
Ah, joy! when with the closing street, Forgivingly at last ye greet!

J. R. WILSON.

LITERATURE.

ABSOLUTE WORTH IN MORALS.*

THIS book professes to supplement the defects of Kant's system of morals. Kant's ethical philosophy appears, in a sense, to leave morals hanging in the air. It deduces moral obligation from the mere conception of a moral law. "First in the whole history of philosophy," says Krueger, "he excludes on principle, and with painful exactness, all questions of happiness from the fundamental problem of morals." The first of his great ethical works begins with the declaration—"There is nothing in the world, there is even nothing conceivable outside of it, which can be reckoned good without limitation, but a good will. Moral good is to be distinguished from all other good by this alone, that it must be reckoned unconditionally good, and has its worth in every possible experience." This is the great merit of Kant's doctrine. It denies that ought can be resolved into or find a substitute in the phrase; it will be better for you, or it will produce more happiness in the long run. It repudiates every attempt to create morality out of elements which are themselves unmoral. But, in his repugnance to what he calls heteronomy in morals, he, perhaps, went too far in the opposite direction, and leaves out of account the emotional nature of man. The morality of the metaphysic of ethics appears to be adapted to beings who are actuated solely by reverence for law, which commands our respect by its innate authority, and the universality of its sway.

His successors who reject the eudæmonistic doctrines, which it seems are rife in modern Germany, think that his neglect of psychology is accountable for the faults that can be found with his doctrine, and this writer among others professes to found morals on a psychological study of worth. This is evidently a hopeful undertaking, for the notion of worth introduces a hierarchy of motives, and it is the perception of the different values of motives that makes us moral agents. It is not merely as rational beings that we are moral, but as beings endowed with a faculty of distinguishing between the worth and worthlessness of different motives that actuate us.

But this work of Krueger's does not seem to us to fulfil the promise it makes. His definition of worth is rather vague: "Worth is distinguished from momentary desire by its relative constancy." Constancy does not here mean duration of the desire, but the permanent connection between desire and a certain state of mind. It means something like association of ideas; on the recurrence of certain mental states the dormant desire will start into life. Or it may be defined, he says again, as a disposition to certain desires. Every striving, or effort of the will, has the tendency to grow into a feeling of worth or a value which we put on the thing striven for; it leaves behind it, not merely an image in the memory, but also a disposition of desire, on the ground of which, on the return of the state of things previously existing in consciousness, the will directs itself anew to the original object of its striving. By means of this tendency of human nature, we desire not merely what we reckon pleasant, but what has for us become worthy. Through this fact the life of the will wins, so to speak, a third dimension, if we reckon the intensity and duration of the pleasure expected from time to time as its two original dimensions. "It is an erroneous assumption," he proceeds, "of logical eudæmonism that feelings are distinguished only by their intensity and duration; they are also further distinguished, as I believe, in a quite peculiar way, by the breadth and depth of their origin in the Personality—that is, by the multiplicity and permanence of the relations in which their object stands to the system of our estimates or feelings of worth. But, he adds, there are no innate estimates." The sense of worth arises from an experience of satisfaction of desire. But if there is no immediate perception of a different value of desires, surely satisfaction would follow every successful striving, and dissatisfaction every failure.

He rejects Kant's Categorical Imperative, partly on the ground of the ambiguity of the German word Soll, which does not exist in our English word ought, and partly because, as he affirms, it has never been proved that we can, as Kant thinks, decide for what is demanded by conscience in opposition to momentary desire. But surely this can be proved, as far as anything which is the object of the individual consciousness can be proved. A man may feel a temptation to obey a sudden impulse, and yet reject the temptation. Of course the fact that it is a temptation, implies that the man has previously reflected on similar impulses and stamped them as wrong. Wrong at first means—this motive is less worthy than another; and this implies, in spite of Krueger's elaborate psychology, that there is a natural hierarchy of motives, and man has the power of perceiving a higher and a lower among them.

We do not learn from this little treatise, after all, how we come to have these estimates of motives; whether we perceive the worth of emotions directly and immediately, in which case Kant's Categorical Imperative arises not from the notion of law, but from the moral constitution of our nature, or, as it rather seems we must infer from certain statements of the author, from associations which, if they had been different, would have given us totally different standards of judging. He denies that moral judgments are concerned with single actions. Why not say they are not concerned with actions at all, except so far as they reveal the motive behind them? On the other hand, he affirms that it is the whole of the character, or what he calls the willing personality, that is to be judged; and as that is unknowable, we have a better authority than any system of psychology for saying that it is just this, that we must not judge lest we only pronounce judgment on ourselves in attempting to do so. The highest good, he says, is the development of the function of worth, which seems very like a circumlocution for Kant's good will or a mutilated conception of it. There is no absolute morality and, he adds, no conceivably perfect man, which last statement is true or false according as you understand it; false, if it means that a man can never live in perfect obedience to the highest and noblest impulses and aims; true, if it means that for such a man there would still be endless growth in perfection.

On the whole we must look elsewhere for what Krueger promises. A psychology that would supplement Kant, as we understand it, would investigate our emotions, and on the ground of their relative worth and dignity arrange them in an ascending scale of authority. This is what Dr. Martineau has done, and to him especially among modern philosophers belongs the merit and the honour of founding morals on this impregnable foundation.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Ruling Elder: His Place, and Work, and Hope, and his Relation to the Synagogue, by R. King, A.B., author of a "Primer of the Church History of Ireland," is a strange book. Its purpose is to prove that the laity have no authority in the Church, but are bound to submit themselves to the clergy providentially put at their head, the supreme authority of the clergy being deduced from the New Testament, and especially from St. Paul's method of putting the ruling power over newly-formed groups of churches into the hands of Timothy and others. Mr. King suggests a "Prayer for Penitent Select Vestrymen, &c.," which it is impossible to suppose was written otherwise than seriously, but which is certainly the most astonishing composition of its kind we have ever met with. The penitent is to ask Christ, as "head over all things in the Church," to "receive mercifully, with Thy tender pity and compassion, this acknowledgment of the deplorable and senseless folly, the stupidity and perverseness, the intolerable arrogance and unjustifiable presumption of Thy poor, ignorant, unworthy servant, in daring to meddle with matters too high for me," and so on. We learn, from an earlier page, that the person who is to offer this sort of petition may be "an honest country bloke" (!). . . highly intelligent on pigs and oats, but, according to Mr. King with no right to any opinion at all about religious matters. Some of the weaknesses of Non-conforming communities are skilfully brought out, but Mr. King's tone does not commend him as a counsellor. It never occurs to him that, even granting the correctness of his Scriptural hypothesis, different methods may be appropriate for the appointment of ministers in settled Christian communities from those which were necessary when the new religion was first winning converts in heathen lands. And we should be more reconciled to his occasional outbursts of fervent piety, if his magazine of vituperation were less richly stored. Were it worth while, much might be quoted in illustrations. One specimen may suffice: "the most utterly shameless and hardened effrontery" of those who "speak of 'the Catholics' as forming an entirely distinct and separate community." There is comparative mildness in describing Harnack as "impudent"; and it is with a glow of pleasure that we read that Dean Stanley was "a writer of some eminence." Perhaps this is enough of Mr. King. (D. Nutt, 2s. 6d.)

The New Leviathan; or, the World at Peace, by J. A. Farrer, is an essay in praise of cosmopolitanism. The evils of race antipathy and national selfishness are emphasised, but too little, in our view, is made of a natural and honourable patriotism. The author looks for the growth of international societies pledged to the refusal of military service to hasten the abolition of war, and his conclusion is, that "when cosmopolitanism has become a living faith, professed by all men, militarism, deprived of its sustenance, will cease to be a scourge to mankind. In the polity of the New Leviathan the soldier will only exist for services beneficial to the community, and that community will be co-extensive with the area of the civilised world. (Elliot Stock. 2s. 6d.)

Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace on Sanitation and Small-pox—A reply by Walter Lloyd, is a reprint of the article contributed by Mr. Lloyd to the Westminster Review last November. (The Jenner Society, Gloucester. 2d.)

Christianity and Sacerdotalism: a Message for the Times, by James Harwood, B.A., states very clearly the distinction between the sacerdotal and the prophetic conceptions of religion, and shows how little ground there is in the early history of the Church for the present claims of the priest. It is a healthy message. (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street. 1d.)

Mr. A. W. Matthews has issued a collection of etchings of Unitarian Churches of Middlesex, made from his own sketches. They are not uniformly successful, but are all interesting. The plates can be had separately, and perhaps some enthusiast will buy them up in the interest of the forth-coming bazaar. (To be had at the Unitarian Book Shop, 63, City-road, 2s. 6d., or single plates 3d.)

EPPS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epps has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled—"JAMES EPPS and Co. HUNGARIAN LETTER.

YOUR correspondent was never in such great trouble and anxiety about how to fulfil his duty as within the last five months. You are aware of those great political troubles and difficulties which almost tore to pieces the western part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. You will also have heard of the ex-lex state of the Hungarian Parliament, where during this time the minority dominated with the sharp weapon of obstruction. It was very hard to do justice to such a furious attempt looked upon from outside, considering that it went so far as to prevent Parliament from settling the Budget for the year.

Thank God, now there is an end to all this. The 1st of March brought us peace, hope, and also love. Now, we may see that the Opposition was in an utter fury, above all, against the person of Baron Bánffy, the Prime Minister. This curious case is to be explained by the result of the last Parliamentary election, when Baron Bánffy almost wiped out the whole Opposition by using such instruments as are indeed very objectionable. The best men, mostly the leaders of the Opposition, were beaten in their surest places. One of their most fiery speakers, M. Ugrou, who was formerly elected in two or three places, could nowhere get in at this time. All this was morally degrading to the people and disheartening to the leaders. Another serious thing must be added to this. It was thought, and perhaps not without reason, that the Premier favoured too much Austrian interest, and would lose the present good opportunity of shaking off Austrian supremacy, which was a great obstacle in the way of the progress of Hungary's commercial and industrial progress. To this may be added that the clerical party, which is becoming very strong over here, got its support mostly from Vienna.

Now, fortunately, there is an end to all this. One of the cleverest of Hungarian statesmen, the pupil and heir of Terencz Deák, Kálmán Széll, succeeded in gaining the King's favour and bringing together almost all the different parties. He created peace in a month's time, and on March 1 re-entered Parliament as Prime Minister with a new Ministry. Everybody is full of hope that a new era will begin in the life and work of Hungary.

As for us Unitarians, the change is a kind of success, because one of our men, Gabriel Daniel, son of our Chief Curator, was elected vice-president to the House of Commons. He is the first Unitarian who has succeeded in taking such a high position in Parliament. In our Church a very busy work is going on. The last Chief Consistory decided that the Church shall be reorganised on modern principles, so that each body of directors shall be constructed, in so far as possible, of elected members. This principle was carried out in 1873 for the congregations. Now the districts or deaneries, the Representative and the Chief or Synodical Consistories, are under consideration. The members of the Consistory are to be about thirty, those of the Chief Consistory about 200, and, beside the bishop, there will be a secretary, whose duty will be to refer subjects to the Consistory. It is very likely that in the month of June an extra meeting of the Chief Consistory will be held. In August we shall have our quadrennial Synod, which is held in the country. We shall hold it in the same district, and very likely in the same town, where twenty years ago the Revs. Alexander Gordon and Andrew Chalmers favoured us with their visit. We should be very glad if this time even more of our friends from England would come. A bond of union is very precious if it is felt, but it is more so if it sometimes manifests itself in facts to be seen and touched. Pray make up your mind to take your summer excursions to the mountains of picturesque Transylvania. G. BOROS.

MORAL FREEDOM AND FOREKNOWLEDGE.

SIR,—I gather from Mr. Lummis's letter that he believes in the real freedom of the human will, and that, therefore, he entirely differs from Professor Ritchie. Professor Ritchie, as a Hegelian, holds that it is neither conceivable nor possible that a man in seasons of temptation should decide otherwise than he actually does decide. Hence Professor Ritchie has no problem to solve; for if man's soul has no moral freedom there is not the slightest difficulty in understanding how God foresees all the issues of human conduct. But Mr. Lummis, as a professed Libertarian, has the same problem to solve that I have, but he dissents from my mode of solving it. He appears to agree with me that in moments of temptation man possesses a power of free choice between equally possible self-determinations, but he holds at the same time that God, who gives this power of free choice, possesses some faculty, which we neither possess nor can conceive of, by which He is able to foresee in every instance how this power of free choice will be exercised. Mr. Lummis writes:—

"It simply does not follow, because certain phenomena, known collectively as 'the future,' are beyond the range of our sense-perception and memory, that therefore they are beyond the range of God's knowledge. When we speak of God's 'prescience,' we are reading our own mental condition, our category of time-extension, into that of which we speak." On this I would remark that the giving of real freedom of moral choice, while retaining at the same time ability to foresee how that power will be exercised, is not only beyond the range "of our sense-perception and memory," but appears in the light of human reason to be intrinsically inconceivable and impossible. If, however, Mr. Lummis asserts that a mode of foresight which seems to us to be essentially impossible is actually possessed by God, I certainly cannot prove its non-existence; but at the same time I must say that at present I see no sufficient ground for taking up so extreme an agnostic position as is implied in assuming that God's inner life is so entirely different from ours that what seems to us essentially impossible and irrational, is for Him both possible and rational. Nor can I see that the introduction of the wholly unintelligible and inconceivable dogma that God's thought and life exist out of relation to Time—a dogma which is repudiated not only by such thinkers as Lotze, Dr. Martineau, and Professor W. James, but also by some eminent Hegelians as well—throws the slightest light upon the question at issue between Mr. Lummis and me. The effect of this dogma, so far as I know, has always been to undermine and destroy the belief in man's true moral freedom, and in the possibility of real inter-personal relations between God and the human soul. The interesting feature in Mr. Lummis's letter is that it shows that he is evidently at present trying to hold this conception of the merely relative character of Time along with a belief in genuine moral freedom. I venture to think, however, that he will increasingly find that these two conceptions lodge very uncomfortably together in his inner life, and that one of them is continually tending to extrude the other. One of his ears is drinking in the witcheries of Absolute Idealism, while through his other ear his moral consciousness is urging claims of free-will and genuine moral responsibility.

But it is, after all, a comparatively unimportant question whether God foresees, or whether He waits to see, the issue of the moral crises in our lives. The really important question is, Is Free-will, or the power of choice between alternative possibilities, an ultimate reality, or is it, as both the Hegelians and the Spencerians hold, a mere psychological illusion? I rejoice to think that, at present at all events, the Libertarians may fairly claim the support of Mr. Lummis's clear thinking for their side of the question.

SUMMER EXCURSIONS.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND UNITARIAN WORKERS UNION.

SIR,—I have now the pleasure of informing your readers that the arrangements with Pension Alpina, Grindelwald, are complete.

There will be three excursions leaving London and Manchester by the Great Eastern Railway Company's service on Friday evenings, July 21, Aug. 4, and Aug. 18. The route will be viâ Harwich, Antwerp, Brussels, and Bâle. The excursions will be conducted respectively by Mr. Shrubsole, F.G.S., the Rev. W. H. Drummond, of Warrington, and the Rev. J. E. Stronge, of Kilburn.

A great many names have already been given in. Applications should be made directed to the Hon. Secretary, "Summer Excursions," 13, Christchurch-road, Hampstead, N.W.

The house at Grindelwald is delightfully situated, with a grand view of the snow mountains, the Eiger, the Mettenberg, and the glaciers. There are cool verandahs where tired workers can sit and refresh eyes and brain, a pretty garden with a fountain.

Indoors, a kind landlady and man cook will be found anxious to please various tastes; and when the tourists have recovered from their fatigue, Mr. Shrubsole and others will be found ready to conduct them far afield—to places of geological and botanical interest, to lovely points of view, and on to the glaciers.

"EVANGELICAL."

SIR,—It is, I suppose, rather a poor business disputing about names, but the complaint of Mr. Armstrong, that our orthodox "friends," in assuming the name of "Evangelicals," usurp a title to which we have a better right, has been so often repeated, that it seems to deserve a moment's consideration. Mr. Armstrong thinks they should be called "Epistolarians" rather than "Evangelicals," but he seems to have overlooked the fact that gospel is a thoroughly Pauline word, and that it occurs far more frequently in the epistles than in the gospels, where, indeed, it is comparatively rare. When, or by whom, the biographies of Jesus were first called gospels, we do not know, but at any rate it is certain that Paul used the word of his message of salvation long before any of them came into existence; nor, as employed by the Evangelists, has it any different meaning. But, no doubt, Mr. Armstrong's point is that the original gospel, or message, of Jesus was very different from that of Paul, or of Paul's later interpreters. Is this, however, so very clear? Of course, I quite think, as Mr. Armstrong evidently does, that a great many things have been attributed to Jesus which he never really spoke; but, then, our orthodox friends do not think so; and taking the gospels as they stand (I would add, even after carrying the process of elimination as far as is critically legitimate), the message of Jesus would seem to be much the same as Paul's—namely, deliverance from the wrath of God, for all who should repent and follow Christ: I do not say deliverance through Christ's blood, only because I think it is fairly open to question whether Jesus really spoke the words ascribed to him at the Supper. For my part, then, I must think that the name evangelical—the true antithesis to which I take to be Popish—is, in its usual application, historically, and on every ground, perfectly justifiable.

A HYMN OF ADORATION.

O LORD most High, Creator, wonderful
Thy glorious might is shown in great and small;

Adoring worlds obey Thy blessed rule,
And laud Thy holy name, supreme o'er all.

We, too, our lowly tribute here would bring,
And join with all who to Thy glory sing.

To Thee, O Lord, doth mercy great belong;
All other goodness hath its source in Thine;

O heavenly Brightness, would that our poor song
Could less unfitly tell of love divine.

Yet must we sing, though all in vain we try,
To lift our hearts and voices up so high.

A name Thou hast which doth our hearts express,
And Christ has taught us we may say that name.

O heavenly Father—our unworthiness,
Our sins, our weakness, ignorance and shame,

Which else might make us feel Thee far away,
Claim now a Father's pity when we pray.

OBITUARY.

MRS. EDWARD TALBOT.

ON Saturday last there were laid to rest in the little graveyard of the Tenterden Chapel the remains of one of the oldest and most respected members of the Unitarian faith in that town. Ellin Peach Talbot was a daughter of Lieutenant Linthorne, R.N., and granddaughter of Captain Linthorne, R.N., who married into the ancient family of Dayly, of Poole, Dorset. Her mother, Maria Buchler, was descended from Edward Buchler, one of Cromwell's chaplains, ejected from Calbourne, Hants, in 1662. All her early connections were with the west of England, and among her most valued friends was the Rev. Samuel Martin, of Trowbridge. She was married to the Rev. Edward Talbot, of Tenterden, on April 2, 1851, at Effra-road Chapel, Brixton, by Dr. Joseph Hutton. Soon after her husband's death she removed to Manchester, leaving the town she loved so well for her children's sake, and in order to secure for them greater advantages than it could afford. It was a great comfort to her that when they were grown up she was able to return to her old friends, and to resume her place as a faithful member of the Tenterden congregation. She passed away, suddenly and painlessly, on April 5, and her great wish was realised that she might be buried in the same grave with her husband. The funeral service was conducted by the Rev. Felix Taylor in the presence of numerous friends and relatives.

MR. EDWARD COBB.

WE regret to have to announce the death of Mr. Edward Cobb, of Lewes, and formerly of Banbury, which took place on April 4 in his ninety-third year. Fifty years ago Mr. Cobb was one of the most prominent residents of Banbury. He filled the office of Mayor in 1846 and again in 1850. He was one of the founders of the Mechanics' Institute, and in its early days acted as secretary and treasurer. During his long life he took much interest in the institute, and as late as last October, Mr. T. W. Boss, the librarian, received a letter from him stating that it was with the greatest pleasure and delight he read the report of the annual meeting in the Guardian. He was the means of having the powers of the Public Health Act applied in the borough—a task which was by no means easy of accomplishment. He was the first chairman of the Banbury Local Board of Health. Mr. Samuelson (now Sir Bernhard) was a member of the Board at the time, and he is now the only survivor of those who comprised the first Board. Mr. Cobb was one of the originators of the British School, and in every social movement in the town he took a leading part. He was formerly Acting Trustee of Christ Church Chapel, Horse Fair, and took a deep interest in it until his death. Every Christmas he and Mrs. Cobb sent gifts for the Sunday-school children, and while in Banbury his life was characterised by many beneficent acts. He was, we believe, a partner in the Bucks and Oxon Bank up to the time he left Banbury, about forty years ago. Since leaving Banbury he has resided at Bath and Lewes. He married a daughter of the Rev. H. H. Piper, who was then minister at Christ Church Chapel.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Hebrew Theism," by F. W. Newman.
Call to God's Service.

CONSECRATE yourselves to God, all ye youths and maidens !
Ere the world benumb your fresh feeling or sin harden your conscience.
Know that others have found God, as ye have not yet found Him ;
But seek ye after Him, and ye shall find Him also :
Delight yourselves in Him, and He shall give you the desire of your hearts.
Seek Him in the open fields or in the shrouded wood,
Under the evening sky or in the solitary chamber.
Take with you words, and turn to Him and say :
"Oh, Author of our spirits, Perfecter of souls,
With Thee strength dwelleth in repose, and no passions are in discord ;
But the passions of youth are untamed, and we do but move toward perfection,
And Desire often seduces from Goodness, or Ease deters from Duty.
Yet wisely were we made by Thee, and Thy Will must be best for us ;
Early to submit were our prudence, and sweetly to obey our happiness ;
And when we know that we seek Thy will, we know that we become Thy servants.
Lo ! here we resign all baser desire, we consecrate ourselves to be Thine.
We will struggle to be as Thou approvest ; to be pure, as Thou art pure, Unwarped by perverse passion, unspoiled by selfishness,
Active for every good work, sympathising with every good cause,
Haters and scornors of the wrong, lovers of good and of good men.
So will we aspire to Thee, that we may be Thine now and alway,
To live before Thy open eye, and to die into Thy secret bosom."
Speak to Him thus, or to this effect, knowing that He reads all your heart ;
Knowing that His light searches your dark corners, and sees your unknown faults.
Fear not to meet His piercing gaze, shrink not from His eyes of flame,
But stand before them true-heartedly, to let them burn up your sin.
Oh, how it will cleanse your conscience and strengthen your best purposes !
How it will put to shame all unkindness, all impurity, all worldliness and pride !
Ye who admire heroism shall grow heroic, and the compassionate more tender,
And the generous more self-sacrificing, and the prudent more self-possessed.
Every virtue shall be strengthened, and every vice shall be crippled,
From the day that ye solemnly consecrate your all to the Ever-Present God.
For every impulse shall fall into its own place, and learn its due subordination,
And become the meek minister of the soul, or the pleasant amuser of its weariness,
The strong combatant for the right, or the sharp hunter after the true.
And your natures shall become enlarged, as they expand towards God :
Your insight shall be deeper and your survey broader,
Your selfishness shall become prudence, and your prudence unselfish,

Loving your neighbours, loving your country, and mankind, and the Right.
When the faithless trembles at truth, your faith shall but grow stronger,
And where the hypocrite is feeble, your sound heart shall be mighty.
Or aspire after perfection, and tell this out to God,
And ere long ye shall find Him and know His exceeding great joy.
He shall fill you of His own fulness, and visit you with His Spirit,
And He shall be your trusted Lord, and ye shall be His conscious servants, Equipped for life and careless of death, aspiring after eternity, Sighing over your own unworthiness, yet certain of Almighty Love.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

She did what she could.

You all know the story of the poor widow whom Jesus saw as he was watching the people in the outer court of the Temple at Jerusalem. As they went in they "cast money into the treasury," which was something like putting into the collection at church. The rich people gave a great deal, and some of them thought a great deal of themselves for doing it, though no doubt in those days, as in these, there were good and humble people among the rich also, who were simply glad to be able to help so much. But while Jesus was watching them, there came a poor widow, who had only two mites to give—just a farthing—and Jesus saw how much it cost her even to give that, and said to his disciples how her very humble gift was really worth more in the sight of God, because of the self-denial and the love she gave with it, than the large sums of money which cost the rich people very little.

And now I want to tell you the story of another widow, which comes to us from long ago, though not from the time of Jesus, a kind of Church fairy-tale, but with the same good and true lesson in it.

Many hundreds of years ago, while Constantinople was still a Christian city, the Emperor Justinian was ruling there. And as he looked from his palace over the city he saw many churches and other buildings among the crowded houses, but there was no church which seemed to him great and noble enough to be worthy of the worship of God. And so he determined to build one, and said that over the entrance they should put in letters of gold, "Built to God by the great Emperor Justinian."

Hundreds of workmen were set to work, great blocks of marble were brought from over the sea for the building of the church, and as the walls rose up, many beautiful things, gold and precious stones, were used to adorn it, till people said there could not be a nobler or more beautiful church ; and over the porch was carved in golden letters the inscription the Emperor had ordered.

At last everything was finished, and a great festival was arranged, when the Emperor should go in state from his palace to the opening and dedication of the church. There were crowds of people all along the streets, and the priests in their splendid robes stood upon the marble steps of the church waiting for Justinian to come to lead him in.

When the Emperor arrived with the splendid company of his officers and attendants he stopped for a moment, and with a glow of pride looked up at the great church which he had built. But as he looked he grew pale, and the people seeing the astonishment and anger in his face looked were he was looking, and there over the porch, where his inscription had been carved, were still indeed letters of gold, but what he and all the people now read was "This Church to God Euphrasia, widow, gave." What could it mean ? Who had dared to alter the inscription ? How was it possible ? The letters were cut in marble—and yesterday everyone had read, "Built to God by the great Emperor Justinian." No one could tell what it meant, nor who Euphrasia was. But as they all stood dumb with amazement an old man from among the priests drew near to the Emperor and said : "It may hap that this is not of men, but of God. Then some one in the crowd was found, who knew a woman called Euphrasia, and when she was brought before the Emperor she was more astonished than them all. A poor old grey-headed woman, living alone in her widowhood in a humble cottage down by the harbour, she had lately recovered from a grievous illness, and there were still marks of suffering from it to be seen in her face. When they questioned her, she said of course that she knew nothing of the inscription, but she told her story. During her illness linnets had come and sung at her window, cheering her solitude ; and when she was well again, in her gratitude she had been eager to do some act of kindness, but did not know what to do. Then while they were building the church, she had watched the oxen dragging the great blocks of marble up from the harbour, and in pity, as she saw how the sharp stones cut their feet, she had taken the straw from her poor mattress and scattered it on the stones to make it a little easier for them. . . . That was all. She had nothing else to give ; but she did what she could. And that was her part in building the great church to God."

As he listened to her story the Emperor was cut to the heart. His own pride, and his desire for fame, had spoilt his gift of the church to God, and had made the gift worth less than that simple-hearted gratitude and love and pity in the poor widow's heart. He bowed down in shame, humbled in his pride, and went in to the service of dedication in the church.

The story is, of course, a parable, and not history, but it may help to teach us what makes the real worth of what we give.

DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

THE Conference of Domestic Mission Workers, to be held in Liverpool during the coming week, will call fresh attention to a work of Christian faithfulness, inconspicuous indeed in the world's eyes, and yet of the very noblest. Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON recently described in these columns something of the character and significance of this work, and we may perhaps be allowed to repeat here words that were written in connection with the opening of the new buildings of the Liverpool Domestic Mission seven years ago.

It was in Boston, Mass., in the year 1826, that Dr. JOSEPH TUCKERMAN, the class-mate and life-long friend of Dr. CHANNING, began a new kind of ministry among the neglected poor, such as the churches of our fellowship had not before attempted. He was then already forty-eight years of age, and had been compelled by a failure of voice to end a long ministry in the country, and give up regular preaching. He came to Boston eager to find some other way of devoting himself to the service of his fellow-men. And in the poorest quarters of the city he found his field of work. He saw that the churches, by their established methods, did not reach the very poor, who were left entirely to evil and depressing influences, without light or hope, in the midst of a rich and enlightened Christian community. It came to him as a Divine call that he must go to these most hapless ones, that he must seek them out in their homes and take to them as a faithful minister, in the simplicity of earnest brotherly love, the message of Christian hope and encouragement, and whatever help one honest friend might give. He went at first single-handed, simply following that generous and ardent impulse, and in actual contact with the poor, amid scenes of the utmost squalor and degradation, found his zeal redoubled to be their friend. "It seemed as if a new fountain of love had been opened within him." He went strong in the faith that in every human soul some Divine capacity is hidden, and he appealed directly to that. He found with ever-growing happiness that his faith and love did meet with a response even amid the worst and apparently most hopeless conditions, and it was his continual delight to tell of the goodness, the great patience, the unselfishness, the cheerfulness, the generosity, at times the truly heroic courage, which he met with among the very poor. He not only went to the people in their homes, but, after a time, gathered them together in a humble meeting-place for religious services, constrained in spite of feeble health by his own overmastering zeal and their gladness to come and listen to his words of sympathy and hope and good cheer. His was a ministry of spiritual awakening, the more so, because it was at the same time a ministry of practical helpfulness, with constant patient ingenuity and sympathy for even the humblest daily needs.

It soon became clear to Dr. TUCKERMAN, that almost unawares he had been led into a kind of service by which incalculable good might be done for the neglected poor, and at the same time a grave reproach removed from the churches, and the message of Christian brotherhood entrusted to them be no longer a dead letter in the places where it was most needed. He saw that the churches must take up this work, must definitely institute and widely extend such a ministry of faithful men, entirely devoted to the service of the friendless and neglected; that so with the efficient power of wisdom and love they might repress the worst social evils, and redeem that moral waste, which too long had been festering upon the borders of their pleasant homes and happier lot. His example and earnest pleading did not remain unheeded. From the first he was supported by Dr. CHANNING's complete sympathy and encouragement, on the ground that "society needs new ministers and agencies for its redemption; and men inspired with self-sacrificing zeal for its redemption are God's best gifts to the world." Reports of his work reached this country, and in 1833 TUCKERMAN himself was here, in broken health, but with the zeal of this Divine mission glowing in his heart. He found our churches already stirred to a new sense of duty towards the poor in great cities, and by his presence did much to confirm them in their consecration to the work.

In March, 1832, the first Domestic Mission in this country was established in London by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, to pass three years later into the charge of an independent society. In 1833 the Manchester Domestic Mission Society was founded, and in 1836 the Liverpool Society. Bristol, Leeds, and Birmingham were also among the earliest to take up this work. Growing experience of the needs of the neglected poor has led to many fresh developments and constantly improving methods of work, but the foundation remains unaltered and unalterable in the ministry of personal friendship, in unaffected daily intercourse, and the simple offices of brotherly love.

To hold a conference of mission workers at one of the centres of their beneficent activity was a happy thought, which we trust may lead to much helpful counsel for the further development of efficient methods of work, and to a renewal of faith and consecration to this high service.

CHRIST AND COMMON PEOPLE.

IV.—THE MOTIVE OF LOVE.

THERE seems to prevail among many Unitarians a certain strange delusion: they falsely suppose that Unitarianism is a form of faith which only the educated can appreciate, and which does not readily appeal to the masses. This is a delusion, and a very strange delusion. As a matter of fact, there is no other form of faith which has ever appealed to the great masses of men so much, or aroused the uneducated so quickly and seized hold on their imagination so strongly. The greatest stirring of the common people that has ever yet been brought about, was brought about by our own greatest preacher Jesus Christ. Neither can it be doubted that it was his Unitarianism, and his declaration of faith in one God and Father of all men, which supplied him with his most powerful ground of appeal. He won men's hearts by his wonderful presentation of the Unitarian faith. He inspired men's lives, he filled their souls with joy, he brought overflowing happiness and peace to common people by showing them the goodness of the Heavenly Father, and teaching them one and all so to live that they might be like Him, so to act that they might honour and please Him, so to think as never to think anything that would offend Him, so to seek reward as to seek none other than His reward, to work for Him and for Him only, and even in their secret thoughts not even to desire anything save only that His will be done; to live for Him, to die for Him, and in Him alone and at all times to place absolute trust.

There was in Christ's teaching just this one thing—the God and Father of all to believe in, and to live accordingly. The simplicity of Christ was his Unitarianism; and no other form of faith has ever proved so capable of arousing the whole religious nature of man. In the history of the world, Unitarianism stands far and away the most powerful theology, and the one that has stirred more deeply than any other ever has done the hearts of common people. Had Jesus Christ preached the Athanasian Creed, he would not have converted the world. Even Jesus, mightiest of teachers as he was, owes something to what he taught. The truth of his teaching helped him to teach it; and the clearness of his explanations was partly the result of his explaining only what was clearly true and having nothing false to explain away. If in theology we follow Jesus, we have the natural sympathies of mankind, the ordinary intelligence of the masses of the people, and all the common-sense of humanity already on our side. Let us cease to blame our theology, and blame rather ourselves. God is as good to-day as He was in Jesus' time, but perhaps we do not make this fact as clear as he did? As children of God we are as much bound as Jesus was to love our neighbour as ourselves, but perhaps this also is not so clearly seen in our actions as it was in his? As weak and erring, as sorrowful and troubled, we are in no less need of watchfulness and prayer than Jesus was; but does our conduct always make this point of our doctrine as clear to the men of our day as his conduct made it in his day?

As religious teachers, it is not our doctrine of God that the world distrusts us for. Unitarianism, one God, one prayer, one thought, one deed, one aim in life, is never deemed heretical, and is not evil thought of by common people. Jesus' sharpest tool is ours; we have the theology he had; if it does not cut men to the quick in our hands as it did in his, let the blame rest in the right quarter. We may be faulty and feeble exponents of Unitarianism, but since the time of Jesus, it stand out in history as the most rousing form of faith which the world has ever yet known. Two thousand years of Christian enthusiasm and missionary zeal in the salvation of mankind, though half-losing and half-retaining its original fervour when pressed and cooled into the later Unitarian mould, owes all its vitality and the whole of its fire to that one spark and flame of clear Unitarian faith and fervour by which Jesus first kindled it. Let us, then, blame ourselves, not our doctrine, if we do not the like. Let us remember to our own shame the stupendous changes in the history of the world which Jesus wrought by appealing to just those simple truths which we, "going back to Christ," now preach again. Let us remember, when we make this boast, what men will expect of us, that we should "live Christ" over again, that more than all others we should touch the human heart, reveal the Divine goodness, and make manifest the Kingdom of God and His love in ourselves. Let us remember that it is to be expected that Unitarianism will have the same effect on the world now that it had when Jesus preached it, if so be there be no change in the character of the preachers. If we would go back to Christ we must take the consequence and the criticism.

We have gone back to Christ in many things. Perhaps in many somewhat unessential things. We think of God as he did, and think of Him as One; do we think of our fellow-men as he did, and think of our one duty to them? Have we gone back to Christ in the whole spirit of our lives? Have we gone back to him in the one essential, Love? We shall not do much good to those whom we do not love much. We shall not manifest God's love if we cannot manifest our own. We shall not do what we have no desire to do; we shall not save the world if we would rather save ourselves the trouble. Our pulpits will vainly preach the first commandment if our pews proclaim their objection to the second. We shall not break down the barriers of class, culture, creed, and character in religious associations, if we desire those barriers to remain and to preserve for us a dignified isolation. We certainly shall never reach the common people if our main anxiety is to get away from them; nor shall we attach them to our faith, if it is our faith that common people with their common language, common ways, and common thoughts are inferior, before God, to ourselves and must have access to Him by some less pretentious entrance to the Father's House. Neither shall we convince human beings that we love them, if we do not. Humanity responds to the love of man. Even the love of principles, of culture, refinement, righteousness and spirituality, is not love so much as merely a kind of liking and admiration. Such abstractions have no self-subsistence, and he who loves them only loves absolutely nothing. But a living soul is a self-subsisting reality, a fact not to be gainsaid, and able to respond. Love for abstractions is very helpful to oneself, but the love which wins a man is the love which loves him for his own sake. Judas Iscariot had little liking for moral principles and little understanding of those who had, and he did not hang himself because Christ loved God or loved morals, but because Christ loved Judas: he was, perhaps, the worst of all the common people that had gathered round Jesus; a traitor to his own friend; yet he was so marvellously worked on and changed by Jesus' influence, that he, the last, became the first. None can take from Judas Iscariot the place that his repentance gave him; he remains for ever the first in the line of the Christian martyrs, the first who died for that the love of Christ constrained him. It was thus that Christ taught men what love was and what its redeeming power. He showed them his own love first, and God's love after. The lesser explained the greater. "I love you myself," and, "Believe me, God loves you also" is the true order of Christian preaching. Once make manifest to all men that their lives are exceedingly precious to us, and they will listen when we speak of their being precious in God's sight also. If we would go back to Christ, we must let men see that our pride, our profit, our worldly advantage, our time, our thought, and our daily life are freely sacrificed for them and to further their interests. When even our bitterest enemies and our most treacherous friends are thus convinced that we bear them no malice, but are continually contriving their welfare and labouring in their interest, we shall have made clear our credentials, and that we have some personal knowledge of that spirit of Infinite Love whom we speak of as our God. Thus, knowing that we know God, men will listen to our message. To be loved by a good man is a very sacred thing. Christ so loved men that he inspired them with new reverence for themselves. The temple, however unclean, is the temple of God; only so does a man's impurity become a sin, polluting a shrine which to God is always sacred: Jesus showed this reverence for every living soul and taught men so. The Presence of God, which causes evil to be sin, more hallows the soul of a man than ever his own sin can pollute it. If we forget this we shall never convert men, and those who cannot reverence their fellows are outside God's will for saving them. Love, such as God's, and love such as Christ's, will teach us this reverence, will give us this motive. Thus only can we go back to Christ and become at last somewhat nearer to him than the rich young ruler who stood so close beside him and was so far away, and of whom we yet read that Jesus looking even on him "loved him."

WILFRED HARRIS.

THE GLOUCESTER BICENTENARY.

A brief account of the foundation and history of the Protestant Dissenting Meeting House in Barton-street, Gloucester, 1699, with a sketch of the life of its first minister, James Forbes, M.A., and his last letter to his congregation. To which are added an account of the state of religion in Gloucester under the Long Parliament, and some particulars concerning the life of John Biddle, M.A., the Father of English Unitarianism, sometime Master of the Crypt School in Gloucester. With extracts from documents never before published. By Walter Lloyd, minister of Barton-street Chapel. Printed for the author. Gloucester, 1899. Price one shilling.

SUCH is the comprehensive description on the title-page of a most interesting pamphlet of fifty pages, published by the Rev. Walter Lloyd in connection with the Bicentenary to be celebrated at Gloucester on Tuesday next. The record of the Barton-street congregation is of the utmost value for the right understanding of the history of Nonconformity in this country, and we are much indebted to Mr. Lloyd for this contribution to a fitting commemoration of the Bicentenary, and of the first minister of the congregation. The old meeting-house, although the interior has been modernised, stands as originally erected, with the date 1699 still engraven over the door, and the history of the congregation goes back nearly another fifty years.

The first minister was James Forbes, M.A., who was educated at Aberdeen, and came as a young man of twenty-four to Gloucester in 1654, appointed by the Common Council to a lectureship recently instituted at the Cathedral. He was to preach twice in the week, and threw himself with great zeal into his duties, so that, after one year's preaching, he says, in the farewell letter, "I had some valuable seals to my ministry." While holding this office, and some time between 1654 and 1660, at the earnest desire of some of his hearers, a separate church was organised, on the Congregational plan, with Forbes as pastor, though apparently he still retained his lectureship, and this was the origin of the Barton-street congregation. Forbes was a "preacher of Oliver's," of whom Calamy says that he was "in his judgment a strict Calvinist and Congregational, but of a catholic temper." At the Restoration he was forbidden to preach, and going up to London, narrowly escaped the dangers of the Plague and the Fire. On the Indulgence of 1672 he returned to Gloucester, but was soon silenced again, and retired to the country.

"Yet did I not stir," he says in the farewell letter, "but with the consent of the congregation; and then Providence led me to the most comfortable place I was ever in. I had a convenient house, in a serene air, and a friendly Christian neighbourhood, and a more liberal maintenance than elsewhere. Here I had five years quiet exercise of my ministry, wonderfully hid, where others, in most places around us, were in great troubles."

In 1687 he again returned to Gloucester, and soon the Toleration Act gave liberty to his congregation. Where they met during the next few years is not known, before the building of the chapel in 1699, but there is no question that Forbes was exercising a regular Congregational ministry. In the Baptismal Register of St. Michael's Church there are three entries of baptisms by him in 1696 and 1698, in which he is described respectively as "Mr. Forbes Phanatic Teacher," "an independent Holder forth," and "an independent Teacher." He died in 1712, and was succeeded by Mr. Denham, an Arminian. Before his death Forbes had lamented "a visible decay of the power of godliness; a going into factions and parties" in the congregation, and it is clear that the majority had departed from the strict Calvinism of their first minister. The consequence was a secession in 1715 of those who still held to the old doctrines, and the formation of another Congregational church, which happily to-day, in the person of its present minister and some members of the congregation, will take a friendly part in the bicentenary celebration.

The trust on which the Barton-street Meeting-house was held contained no limitations in respect of doctrine, and thus the movement of thought continued, so that before the end of the century the congregation had become Unitarian. It is interesting to note that this old congregation was distinctly "Congregational," and not "Presbyterian," in its origin, although it followed the same line of free doctrinal development.

In looking back to the old days of the Civil War and the Commonwealth at Gloucester, it is natural that Unitarians should remember John Biddle; and Mr. Lloyd has included in his pamphlet a chapter on that brave and earnest heretic, who, while master of the Free Grammar School of St. Mary de Crypt, first declared his rejection of the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. There was, however, no direct connection between Biddle and the Barton-street congregation. When Forbes came to Gloucester, Biddle had been already dismissed from his mastership; he had been in prison in London, and on his release had gathered a small congregation there. In 1654, on the publication of his "Two-fold Catechism," which was burnt by order of Parliament, followed his banishment to Scilly by the Protector (to save him from his persecutors), and in 1662 his last imprisonment and death. Forbes mentions, in his farewell letter, that when he came to Gloucester in 1654, there were a few "Socinians" who "kept themselves distinct," but the congregation which he subsequently gathered was not tainted by that heresy.

We trust that Mr. Lloyd's pamphlet will be widely read. It is a valuable addition to our collection of the histories of old chapels.

NORTH MIDLAND SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE fifty-second annual meeting of this Association was held on Easter Monday, April 3, at the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham. Amongst the ministers and delegates present were Revs. W. E. Addis, A. Bennett, John Birks, Professor J. E. Carpenter, J. Freeston, H. Gow, H. E. Haycock, E. R. Hodges, W. Lindsay, W. H. Rose, J. Kertain Smith, W. Whitaker; Miss Edith Gittins, Miss Guilford, Miss Paget, Miss Bamforth, Miss Wright; Messrs. Harrop White, S. D. Hall, C. A. Belfield, H. Freeston, Franklin Winsor, J. C. Warren, F. Price, W. Clark, F. Smyth, W. Godfrey, T. Ridge, J. W. Smith, R. Briggs, and H. Fisher Short.

At 11 A.M. the annual business meeting was held and was better attended than usual. The President, Mr. S. D. HALL, having taken the chair, the meeting opened with hymn and prayer, and after the minutes of the last annual meeting had been confirmed, the President, in the course of an interesting address bearing on the work of the Association during the year, welcomed the delegates and friends assembled, and expressed the hope that their deliberations would give an impetus to the Sunday-school work of the district.

The report of the Committee and the balance-sheet of the Treasurer were then read, and on the motion of Mr. WILLIAM CLARK (Nottingham), seconded by the Rev. A. BENNETT, they were adopted.

The report stated that the Committee, while convinced that a great deal of good work was being done, as evidenced by the increase in the number of scholars in the schools and the satisfactory tone of the reports received from the visitors and the schools, desired to call the attention of the members of the associated congregations to the fact that with the increase in the number of scholars on the books during the last five years, the number of teachers had decreased during the last three years, and appealed to them for help in the important work of Sunday-school teaching, the value of which could not be over-estimated at the present time.

There was evidence in the schools of the value of the study of the Old and New Testaments, and they were assured that the handbooks, a list of which was inserted in the annual report, were being used with advantage along with the Bible. It was noted with satisfaction that the schools at Chesterfield, Derby, Ilkeston, Leicester (Great Meeting), Nottingham (Christ Church), and Sheffield (Upper Chapel), had very materially increased in numbers, and that most of the schools had maintained their usefulness, and were full of vigour. A few schools, however, were in an unsatisfactory or languishing condition.

Appreciation was expressed of the services of the district visitors, and a welcome was offered to the Rev. W. Lindsay, recently settled at Nottingham, and the hope was expressed that under his guidance and care the school at Christ Church would make material progress. The balance-sheet showed a small balance in the treasurer's hands.

The following officers were then elected on the motion of Mr. HARROP WHITE, seconded by Miss EDITH GITTINS—namely, President, the Rev. J. K. Smith; vice-president, Mr. E. J. Chapman; treasurer, Mr. S. A. Gittins; secretary, the Rev. H. E. Haycock; auditor, Mr. W. R. Hamilton; visitors, Miss Deverill, Mr. S. D. Hall, Mr. G. Whitfield, and Mr. R. Briggs. Representative on the Committee of the Sunday School Association, Rev. H. E. Haycock.

The Rev. J. BIRKS invited the Association to hold its next meeting at Derby, and, in the name of the Association, the President accepted the invitation.

Mr. W. F. PRICE (Leicester) complained that the meetings were not sufficiently attractive to the young people, and suggested that if the Derby friends would arrange a picnic next Easter Monday it would draw a greater number of young people to the meeting.

A resolution submitted by the Rev. J. BIRKS to the effect that "the Committee of the Association be requested to take such steps as may be thought practical and desirable for the establishment of Young People's Religious Unions in the Sunday-schools of the district," led to a somewhat animated discussion. Mr. BIRKS pointed out that while we made ample provision for the social side of our young people's lives, and had our literary societies, and social unions, and sewing classes, and so forth, we had hitherto done little to cultivate the religious side of their nature, had not found them anything religious to do, and he described something of the attempts which had been made in some of our American churches to foster the religious life of young men and women by banding them together in a religious union.

Mr. J. W. SMITH seconded the resolution.

Mr. HARROP WHITE objected to the resolution on the ground that it was an interference with the liberty of the individual schools, and that it was altogether outside the province of the Association to attempt to establish such institutions in the schools; it was the work of the schools, not of the Association.

The Rev. H. Gow suggested that the Committee be requested to glean what information it could obtain about these Religious Unions and disseminate it among the Sunday-schools of the district. Eventually the resolution was withdrawn, and a resolution on the lines of the Rev. H. Gow's suggestion was adopted.

After luncheon a religious service was conducted in the chapel by the Rev. W. Lindsay, of Nottingham, and the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. Professor J. E. Carpenter, M.A., from 1 Cor. xiii. 11, "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things."

At the close of the service a collection was taken, and amounted to £4 1s. 9d.

Following the service in the chapel came a Conference in the schoolroom.

On the motion of the Rev. W. E. ADDIS, a hearty vote of thanks was given to the Rev. W. Lindsay, and to Professor Carpenter for their services in the pulpit; both acknowledged the vote.

Mr. H. FISHER SHORT (Sheffield) then read an extremely interesting and able paper on "How to Retain Our Elder Scholars," in the course of which he sketched the aims of a "Young People's Religious Union," and showed how it might be made a means of keeping our elder scholars and young people in close touch with the life of the church.

The discussion was opened by the Rev. J. BIRKS, who expressed his entire approval of all that Mr. Short had said, and his thanks to him for having brought the subject forward.

The Rev. J. K. SMITH expressed his sympathy with the aims set forth in the paper.

Professor CARPENTER saw difficulties in the way of the adoption of such a plan as was set forth; there was a difference in local customs which would tell against it. In some parts of the country the scholars were retained in the Sunday-school till they were of quite mature age; in others it was usual for them to withdraw from it early. He expressed approval of some form of dedication or confirmation service, such as he had recently conducted at Kidderminster, as providing a needful link between the school and church.

The discussion was continued by the Revs. W. LINDSAY, J. FREESTON, and H. GOW.

Mr. HARROP WHITE said he would like to learn how the difficulty was to be overcome of getting young people to attend a religious meeting week by week, read papers, and deliver prayers. His own experience was that it was the most difficult thing in the world to get them to anything of the kind.

On the motion of the Rev. J. K. SMITH, seconded by the Rev. H. E. HAYCOCK, Mr. Short was heartily thanked for his paper.

A vote of thanks was given to the retiring officers, and the Secretary, in reply, spoke in warmly appreciative terms of the work done for the Association, and the help rendered to himself personally by the President.

The Nottingham friends were thanked for their hospitality during the day, and a very enjoyable series of meetings were brought to a close.

Tea was afterwards served to the delegates and friends.

THE MINISTERS' INSTITUTE.

THE meetings of this Society were held at Manchester College, Oxford, on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday last, and were attended by about forty ministers from various parts of the country. The business meeting was held on Monday evening, the Rev. J. E. Odgers in the chair, when the minutes of the last meeting, in April, 1898, were read by the Rev. C. T. Poynting, the secretary, and confirmed. A Communion service was afterwards held in the College Chapel, conducted by the Rev. Joseph Wood.

On Tuesday morning a devotional service was conducted by the Revs. John Byles and Dr. Brooke Herford, followed by a conference in the lecture-room, under the presidency of the Rev. A. N. Blatchford, when the Rev. Ambrose Bennett read a paper on "The Seasons of the Christian Year in their Relation to the Christian Life." In the evening a social meeting was held, at which the Rev. J. E. Odgers gave a Lantern Lecture, showing a large number of views of the Catacombs at Rome, and of the ancient ecclesiastical architecture of Ravenna.

The opening service on Wednesday morning was conducted by the Revs. J. Collins Odgers and H. M. Livens, and was followed by a conference, at which the Rev. G. D. Hicks read a paper on "Mr. Bradley's Metaphysics and recent Theology." In the afternoon the meetings were brought to a close with a short valedictory service, conducted by the Rev. Dr. Drummond.

LEARN not to importune Providence like a teasing child. Selfishness towards God is as unlovely as any other kind of selfishness.—G. S. Merriam.

AN OLD CHAPEL AND ITS WORK.

HAND-LOOM weavers in 1800 did not earn wages which most trade-unions to-day would call "fair," and in the little Lancashire town of Padiham the rates provided them with neither good water nor free schooling. But Nature provided them with a fine stock of physical robustness, and with good capacity both for thought and action. As yet the mills had not darkened the air nor clouded the water, and the green-wooded hills, the pleasant streams, the birds and beasts of the field, as well as men, rejoiced in a pure, bracing atmosphere.

Their poverty did not depress them, except in times of special stress; but the peace was disturbed in the village by a more persistent enemy—and contention waxed hot and bitter over the question, Could a man be saved by Faith only, or were good works an essential element in the process of salvation? Not only the present life, but Eternity, depended upon the answer; and our modern excitement over a political election would have seemed mere childishness, while this matter, so infinitely graver, remained unsettled. Fortunately the final decision rested in an authority that was easy to consult. The "Book" was a court of appeal, beyond which no one dreamt of the possibility of going. Being practically the only literature which penetrated to so remote a region, it represented not only the highest wisdom, but all the wider enlightenment of the great perennial, outside world. But though the appeal was easy, the interpretation was difficult, and rivalled in mystery that of the Delphic oracle itself. So that in the end men's native hearts and consciences had something to do with the decision.

From such soil and circumstances as this there arose the "Unitarian-Methodist" movement, which leaves its characteristic stamp upon some half-dozen of our churches in East Lancashire. Those who began to study the Bible for proofs of justification by works found in it, like Theophilus Lindsey, the proof of one God as the Father of the Universe.

It is hardly necessary to say that they were promptly ejected from the Methodist body—indeed, even before they became Unitarian, they had been excluded for their doctrines on salvation. But, though ejected, they continued the same methods and organisation, and preachers went on circuit among the various villages where a few of the faith were gathered.

Padiham was fortunate in having two young men of exceptional zeal who undertook to preach on alternate Sundays to their fellow-believers. An upper chamber in the back of an old stone house was their chapel and schoolroom for fourteen years. The school began with seven scholars, but rapidly increased, until it was necessary to consider how to find larger premises. Some talked of building a chapel; but this was a very serious matter for men whose whole income, we are told, amounted to seven shillings a week, with a family to keep. On one occasion the quarterly collection to pay the rent only realised 7½d. One of the unpaid ministers ran home to bring the stocking with the savings towards his own rent—for the "chapel" must be paid for whether the home could be or not.

But, in spite of poverty, the scheme to build a new chapel was daringly embarked upon, and a committee was appointed to erect one at the estimated cost of £350. Slowly, but steadily, subscriptions came in out of the hard earnings of Padiham Unitarians and the neighbouring towns where the movement had spread. As soon as they had enough to begin upon, the land was bought, the foundations were dug, and the walls began to rise. But for some mysterious reason the work did not appear to progress very rapidly. At last it was discovered that, although the building went on steadily in the day, "an enemy came by night" and pulled down the newly-built walls. In fact, every imaginable form of opposition was rife, and it was only the indomitable determination of these early Unitarians that at last overcame all obstacles, and in the course of four years opened a commodious chapel and paid off a debt of £419 16s. 6d.

For over forty years the two original "ministers"—James Pollard and John Robinson—continued to preach to their fellow-worshippers, until they both died within a month of each other, in 1848. John Robinson, the younger of the two, was of a fiery temperament and preached with true Methodist fervour, on one occasion astonishing the congregation by accidentally knocking down the great pulpit Bible in his gesticulation. Evidently he produced the greater impression at the time; but it is the few characteristic sayings of old James Pollard which are remembered to this day. "My Christian friends," he used to say, "it will cost you something to be religious, but it will cost you a great deal more not to be." And when he was robbed of his watch, he remarked—in anticipation of Tolstoi—that they were welcome to it, if they thought they had a better right to it than he had.

Now, the old chapel is forsaken. The handsome new one on the top of the hill, with its graceful spire, its coloured windows, and vaulted roof, is a strange contrast to the barn-like chapel of Pollard and Robinson. But there is still work to be done in the old place, and still workers ready to do it. The resources of the working-class congregation worshipping in the new chapel are pretty well absorbed by the expenses connected with its maintenance and services; and when, some months ago, the roof of the old chapel fell in, there was much searching of heart to decide whether the expense of putting the time-honoured place into repair would be justified. It was almost decided to abandon it and sell the site, when the suggestion was made that its position was the best possible for a mission-hall. The neighbourhood has declined, and many of the saddest homes in Padiham are those surrounding the old graveyard. The neglected aspect of the whole premises has added to the dismal appearance of the neighbourhood. A Band of Hope for the children running wild, an afternoon Sunday-school, perhaps a week-night service and a few bright evenings of one sort or another during the winter would contribute an element of healthful interest to the neighbourhood, the results of which are incalculable. There is no lack of ready workers, and only £80 or £100 will be required to make capital mission premises out of the old building.

If any readers of THE INQUIRER are sufficiently interested in the past and present of the old place to be willing to help, the minister, the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed (Blackburn-road, Padiham) will be glad to receive subscriptions towards its rehabilitation, and to supply any further information in his power.

SOUTH EAST WALES UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting of this Society was held on Monday at Swansea. Service was held in the High-street Church in the afternoon, conducted by the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, and the annual sermon was preached by the Rev. J. E. Manning, of Sheffield, from the text "And all the people said Amen." The sermon dealt with the new Evangelical Catechism, and with the Ritualistic movement in the Church, marking the signs of doctrinal progress, and the need for resistance to the encroachments of the priest.

At the conclusion of the service the annual business meeting was held, Mr. J. Moy Evans, president, in the chair. The report, which was presented by Mr. John Lewis, the secretary, recorded a year of "steady progress, if not brilliant success." The statement of the treasurer, Mr. L. N. Williams, showed a small adverse balance. The officers were re-appointed, except that the Rev. D. J. Williams took the place of the Rev. Jenkyn Thomas, who has left the district, as one of the secretaries.

In the evening a public meeting was held in the church to welcome the Rev. W. J. Jones, who had recently seceded from the Calvinistic Methodist body, as minister of the Swansea congregation.

Mr. J. MOY EVANS again presided and offered a cordial welcome to the delegates of the South East Wales Society. Having then dealt with the conditions of religious life in the present time, and especially with the duty laid upon their church in face of the Ritualist danger, Mr. Evans spoke very warmly of their new minister, and of the signs of fresh activity and of hope for the future which had followed his settlement.

The Rev. J. E. Manning, on behalf of his brother ministers; Mr. C. H. Perkins, as secretary, on behalf of the congregation; Mr. W. W. Holmes, on behalf of the younger members; the Rev. R. J. Jones, as one of the oldest ministers in Wales; and Mr. L. N. Williams, on behalf of the South East Wales Society, all joined in the welcome to the Rev. W. T. Jones.

In responding, Mr. JONES acknowledged very gratefully the kind things that had been said. His crossing the channel from Calvinistic Methodism to Unitarianism had not been a passage in fair weather, neither had it been a sudden movement on his part. He had suffered greatly in the struggle to hold to the doctrines of his old church, but had found it impossible to make them fit his life. Yet in spite of what he had suffered, it had not been self-sacrifice, because the peace of mind and of conscience, the peace with God and himself had more than compensated him. With their co-operation he trusted that within those walls they would see days in which many a heart would find solace in its trouble, and many a mind would find the rock upon which it could rest for time and for eternity.

Votes of thanks to the Rev. J. E. Manning and to the Chairman brought the meeting to a close.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

SCOTLAND.

THE most recent event in the history of our Scottish churches which calls for mention is, of course, the opening of the new church at Kirkcaldy. This has already been reported in your columns, but it may be of interest to note that this is the culmination of efforts reaching back some twenty-five to thirty years. The Revs. H. Williamson and A. Webster were the first pioneers of Unitarianism in the "lang toon o' Fife." Their labours had to be suspended, and for many years the ground lay fallow. On the establishment of the McQuaker Trust—now more than ten years ago—I arranged for a series of week-evening lectures by the Revs. C. J. Street, S. F. Williams (now in India), J. Forrest, myself and others. The results were encouraging. Sunday services were commenced, and from that time to this Kirkcaldy has not been without its Unitarian service. On his appointment as McQuaker Lecturer Mr. Forrest took charge of the services, and carried them on with conspicuous success.

In 1892 the Rev. A. E. Parry, of the H.M.C., was appointed minister, and to him belongs the honour of having erected the first Unitarian Church in Kirkcaldy—and, for that matter, in the historic and "ancient kingdom of Fife." The building is neat and substantial—will hold from 150 to 200 people. It has been supplied with movable chairs, so that it can be used for church, school, or hall purposes. It is well adapted to the present needs of the congregation, and great praise is due to the architect (Mr. Arnold S. Tayler, of London) for having so accurately gauged their wants. The opening services and meetings were marked by great enthusiasm, and were very encouraging. The congregation may well take heart. They can rest assured that at last Unitarianism has found a permanent home in Kirkcaldy, and come to stay.

Aberdeen has not been quite so fortunate. It may be remembered that last year our friends there were contemplating disposing of their present church, and building a new one in a more suitable locality. Various difficulties have prevented them realising their desire; and now the congregation are seriously contemplating re-constructing their present building, and making it more adaptable to their modern requirements. Some change is urgently needed if the congregation are to make any advance. The present building has many drawbacks which hamper the work very seriously. And in the "Granite city," where pride of building (church building) has considerable play, a good cause may easily lose itself by being poorly housed. The church gives many signs of health. Just now Mr. Webster is holding a series of special services in the Trades' Hall, under the auspices of the McQuaker Trust. The attendance is upwards of 500.

I have no report of the recent doings of the Dundee church. From the information last to hand, I gather that the work is taking more and more the character of Domestic Mission work. Mr. Williamson continues his good labours among the mill and factory operatives. He is looked upon as their champion in all matters affecting their interests. And he certainly does not spare himself either time or labour if he can help their cause, "In Edinburgh," says Mr. Drummond, "things have gone on this winter very much as usual." He himself has been very active, along with some of the broad-minded ministers and citizens of Edinburgh, in establishing a Sunday Society—the existence of which might be taken as a sign that old Sabbatarianism is almost a thing of the past were it not that a Presbytery the other day censured Her Majesty for Sabbath breaking. But possibly this was only a dying kick. In Edinburgh the Sunday Society is an established fact. Two of its concerts have been given in the Old Grey Friars' (Established Church), and two in our St. Mark's. They were all very well attended.

An interesting event (perhaps outside the scope of this letter, but I may be permitted to refer to it) was the marriage, the other day, of Mr. Drummond's second daughter, Catherine Isabella Drummond, M.A., to the Rev. S. H. Mellone, M.A., D.Sc., of Holywood, Belfast. The wedding was in the church, and in Scotland that is a rare occurrence. We have marriages in halls, and marriages in hotels, and marriages in the homes, and marriages at the minister's house, and marriages before the Sheriff, and marriages over the tongs (à la "Little Minister"); but we seldom have marriages in the church. It is only the third, I understand, that Mr. Drummond has had in his church during the forty years of his ministry in Edinburgh. But it was fitting that a minister's daughter, on being married to a minister, should be married in the church. We offer our felicitations to the happy couple.

At Paisley Mr. Henderson has laboured assiduously during the winter. "Large numbers of strangers have attended the evening services in the Geo. A. Clarke Hall, all the denominations of the town being represented. Several additional families have joined the church." These are good signs.

Mr. Russell has very wisely directed his efforts, during the first year of his ministry at St. Mungo-street, towards consolidating the forces and work of the church. The result has been beneficial. He has succeeded in winning back many who had lapsed, and has gathered in others not previously connected with us. The attendance, especially at the afternoon service, has been very good. The Sunday-school has also improved; and the Young People's Club and the Women's Guild have proved of great service. These things are very encouraging. And, altogether, there is a better and healthier and more hopeful tone pervading the congregation than I have known for years.

The operations of the McQuaker Trust call for notice. In addition to the generous grants they have given to Aberdeen, Dundee, Kirkcaldy, Paisley, and St. Mungo-street, they have been active in the propagation of "Unitarian Christianity" in Scotland. Lectures have been delivered under their auspices by the Revs. A. Webster, A. E. Parry, A. C. Henderson, and E. T. Russell. The results have been varying. In the places where the lecturers were known, and with subjects of a personal or particular interest, they have had good audiences, and received an appreciative hearing. But in places where they were only partially known, and with subjects of only general interest, the result has not been encouraging. There is a striking lack of theological interest in the minds of the general public—even in Scotland. I am not sure whether we could not change our methods with advantage. Last year I suggested a preaching-van for the country districts in the summer-time. I would still press that suggestion. But in the winter, and for the more populous places, I would suggest something after the plan of an Evangelistic or Methodist missionary meeting, where three or four short, sharp, crisp, fervent addresses could be given on different aspects of Unitarianism, by as many speakers. This would tell. And for the more thinly-populated places—such as the small towns and large villages—we might try the lantern-lecture, dealing with different phases of the history of Religion. Brooke Herford's "Story of Religion in England" would particularly lend itself to this. Views could easily be secured. These suggestions I would commend to the Trustees. In addition to the lectures that have been given, a very useful postal mission work has been carried on by the Trustees. Under their auspices I inserted a two-days' advertisement in two of the leading Scotch papers at the beginning of the winter, offering certain of the Association's publications to ministers and divinity students on payment of postage. The response was gratifying. Somewhere about 130 applications were received by the secretary and myself from ministers and students of all denominations. Some ministers called upon me, and from conversations I had with them I found a remarkable sympathy with our position. These signs are encouraging. But, on the other hand, there are not wanting evidences that there is a strong swing of the pendulum backwards in the direction of evangelicalism and sacerdotalism. For these things we should be prepared.

SUBURB AND SLUM.

THE motives of philanthropic work are manifold, and have much to do with its success. "Almsgiving," said the Son of Sirach, "will make atonement for sins." But Paul, "Though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor . . . but have not love, it profiteth me nothing." No; and in the end it does not profit the poor we feed. Charity may be a boon or a bane, alike to those who give and to those who receive, according to its source and inspiration. For philanthropy does not always mean love of mankind. Self-approbation, the approbation of others, the cheap pleasure of giving when it costs us nothing to give—these feelings underlie only too much of what is called "charity." "If you give money," said Thoreau, "spend yourself with it." Alms can be given by proxy: love involves intimacy. How many charitable people think it incumbent on them to cultivate any other relation with the poor than that of master with servant or benefactor with beggar?

It is generally assumed that all who go from the suburb to the slum must be engaged in some kind of mission work. And many will say, "We have no aptitude for that: it is not our vocation." True; we cannot all be missionaries; but is it in that capacity alone that we can be useful to the poor? Or may we not with advantage go among them simply as friends, and with no more sense of merit than we have in visiting people of our own caste, letting them see that we recognise them as fellow men and women, and are genuinely interested in their welfare? It is easy to win a welcome in these cheerless homes, and when once one has done so, opportunities of service will often present themselves. The lady visitor who can turn her hand to a bit of cooking or cleaning for some lone invalid will be more gratefully received than the almsgiver; and none need fear being less respected by the poor for performing lowly tasks. These people can discern the spirit of the deed, and they revere humility. Almsgiving should only follow personal intimacy—not precede it.

Parents rightly forbid their young daughters to go about the slums unguided; but guidance and introduction are not hard to obtain, and in those gloomy streets, and the gloomier courts and alleys hidden away behind them, there are phases of human life with which it were well that the children of the rich should be familiar. Surely all who are destined to be employers of labour, who will wear clothes they did not make, and eat food they did not prepare, upon whose justice or caprice the happiness of so many will depend—surely all, and especially women, should early be taken behind the scenes, and learn to know and love the humanity of those whom they may otherwise treat as, and go far to make, machines! How much of the thoughtlessness and heartlessness of fashionable women towards the working classes may not be due to the social prejudice and ignorance in which they have been brought up! How different might be the feeling between rich and poor if the former were familiar from youth with what is good and noble in slum-life!

We flatter ourselves that we have a great deal to teach the poor; that intercourse with the suburb must be very improving to the slum; and, truly, it ought to be so. But the benefit is not all on one side. If poverty exposes the poor to temptations from which the rich are free, it also fosters in them virtues to the development of which wealth and ease are unfavourable; sincerity, simplicity, patience, fortitude, humility, unselfishness—these are the fairer fruits of adversity, and sometimes put us to shame. And what can be more salutary than to be compelled to admire and emulate the virtues of those we had deemed our inferiors? From such ground of mutual respect what happy social relations might arise?

For the conventionality of fashionable life, its selfishness, vanity, unreality—what can be a more natural antidote than free contact with the simple heroism of the poor? But few not actually engaged in charitable work care to have any personal acquaintance with the working classes. "Don't take us through any slums!" a lady was heard to say to her driver, as she stepped into a cab at the door of a small suburban villa. In that simple utterance, and the tone of it, how much of the speaker's mind and manner of life could one not read! The spirit of those who deliberately refuse to know how their fellow men and women live, and even to see where, whose "charity" provides many a worthless beggar with an extra glass of beer, while it treats the kitchen-maid downstairs as something less human than the cat—the prevalence of this caste-spirit justifies any extravagance of Socialism.

A round of slum-visits is infinitely more interesting and more profitable than an afternoon spent in elegant suburban drawing-rooms. There the smile that greets you is genuine; the thanks you get for calling are heartfelt, though you may leave no dole behind you. Those who hold themselves aloof know not of how much they deprive themselves. In the slums there are salutary lessons to learn, there is pure happiness, and the best consolation. When our own hearts are heavy there is nothing that so strengthens and soothes us as the effort we make to bring some gleam of brightness into sunless lives. All that we can do for others at such times is measured back to us a hundred-fold. The kindly look of welcome on some worn face, the unfeigned gratitude, the blessings that follow us from our slums—these are balm to the wounded spirit, and lift it above its own pain.

O brother man! fold to thy heart thy brother;
Where pity dwells, the peace of God is there;

To worship rightly is to love each other,
Each smile a hymn, each kindly deed a prayer.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.

Banbury.—At the close of service last Sunday evening, in Christ Church Chapel, a resolution was silently passed by the congregation with reference to the death of the late Edward Cobb, of Lewes, who with his family had been for many years closely associated with the chapel. The resolution, which was read by the Rev. H. Hill, expressed the sorrow with which the minister and congregation and the teachers of the Sunday-school had heard of Mr. Cobb's death, the high regard in which he was held, remembering his many acts of kindness, and concluded with an expression of sympathy with Mrs. Cobb and the members of the family.

Bedfield and Framlingham.—The work is being carried on with much to encourage. The Rev. V. D. Davis and Mr. Elliot have recently preached at both places. The Bedfield Institute closed the winter season with a public tea and entertainment. Last Sunday Mr. W. H. Shrubsole preached at Bedfield (afternoon), and Framlingham (evening), this being Mr. Shrubsole's first appearance in a Unitarian pulpit. On Monday evening, Mr. Shrubsole delivered a lecture on "America's Wonderland." The Rev. J. Holme Pilkington, M.A. (rector of Framlingham), presided, and there were present the Rev. G. Castleden, M.A. (rector of Dennington), and other leading residents in the town and neighbourhood. Nearly one hundred magnificent pictures were shown by the oxy-hydrogen light. The Chairman expressed in warm terms thanks to Mr. Shrubsole for his lecture, and to the Rev. A. Amey for introducing Mr. Shrubsole to the town.

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—During the winter months the various agencies for usefulness belonging to this church have been very active. Owing to the fact that the builders took possession of the schoolroom at the beginning of November last, in order to incorporate it with the church, the winter's work was, for the most part, done elsewhere. The Committee of the first church, Rosemary-street (the Rev. D. Walsley's), kindly lent, free of charge, the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, on three separate occasions, while the Rev. J. Cregan, of the Albert-bridge Congregational Church, with equal readiness lent his hall free of charge. At a meeting on Monday, April 10, a welcome was given to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, who was on a visit to Belfast. Addresses were given by the officers of the church and the Rev. W. J. Davies on the work that was being carried on, and Mr. Bowie gave an address on "Unitarianism." The Revs. D. Walsley and W. Weatherall also took part in the proceedings. Dealing with the condition of the building fund, Dr. Munn stated that nearly £800 had been already expended upon the church, of which sum £150 remained to be raised, while new schools would cost at least £500. The new schools are urgently needed, and contributions towards the £650 will be thankfully received and acknowledged, either by Dr. Munn, hon. treasurer, Building Fund, or the Rev. W. J. Davies (hon. sec.), Mountpottinger, Belfast.

Gateshead.—On Tuesday evening a successful social meeting was held, under the presidency of the Rev. A. Harvie. The Revs. C. Hargrove and F. Walters were present, and gave encouraging addresses.

King's Lynn.—Anniversary sermons were preached last Sunday by the Rev. Geo. Lansdown. Through the inclemency of the weather the attendance was rather small, but those who were present fully appreciated the discourses, which treated in the morning "The Relations of Pulpit and Pew," and in the evening "The Truths and Ideals of Unitarians." The anniversary tea was held on Monday. A large company sat down to tea, and during the evening the schoolroom was well filled. A work stall for the sale of goods left over from the recent bazaar was well patronised. A most interesting programme of vocal and instrumental music was gone through, and a most enjoyable evening was spent.

London: Peckham.—The annual meeting of the Avondale-road Church was held in the schoolroom on Tuesday last, under the presidency of the Rev. G. Carter. Messrs. W. J. Cooley and A. G. Stoessiger, respectively secretary and treasurer, rendered reports, from which it appeared that, though in the membership roll there was a slight decrease, the financial balance for the first time during several years was on the right side, and this after payment of a sum of £40 due to the late treasurer. This had been for the most part achieved by a successful sale of work, but a great deal was due also to the adoption of the weekly offertory. Reports of the Sunday-school, Band of Hope, and Literary Society, showed that these affiliated institutions were in a healthy condition, while a scheme was in contemplation for increasing the popularity of the gymnasium; reference was also made to the quiet but useful work of the mothers' meetings. Among other proceedings of the evening was a resolution expressing the indebtedness of the congregation to the late Rev. Robert Spears (a trustee of the church) for the interest he had always manifested in it, and for his services generally to the cause of Unitarianism.

London: Stratford.—On Sunday last Mr. Lucking Tavenor gave an admirable sermon, on the lessons conveyed by some of the pictures now being exhibited at Canning Town, South West Ham. By special request he will repeat the address at the evening service of the 23rd inst., by which time the paintings will have been removed for exhibition in the Town Hall, Stratford.

Mossley.—The biography of the Rev. T. R. Elliott which appears in this month's New Kingdom, has been reprinted in the Mossley Reporter.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—On Sunday, April 9, the anniversary sermons of the Church of the Divine Unity were preached by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., of Leeds. Large congregations attended both services. Mr. Hargrove's evening discourse explanatory of "A Freethinker's Religion" was listened to with wrapt interest. The annual soirée was held in the Church of the Divine Unity on Monday afternoon. In the evening a public meeting was held, presided over by the Rev. F. Walters, who, having referred in terms of warm appreciation to the Rev. C. Hargrove, spoke of the new catechism. The compilers, he said, either did not know or would not confess the momentous change in human thought during the last fifty years, making it impossible to base faith on biblical authority or ecclesiastical tradition. For many years a radical change had been taking place in religious thought. Yet superficially things looked much the same—churches the same, creeds the same; but beneath all this superficial uniformity the most profound changes were still and latent, only waiting the coming crisis to revolutionise Christendom. He did not know what that crisis would be, but something would happen to reveal to the world that a new reformation had arrived, and an era of spiritual liberty had dawned. The Church of England was a bundle of diverse sects, bound together by a cord of State patronage; and, if that cord was broken, the results would be most momentous. He was sure the deepest tendency on their side was the gradual vindicating of those principles of religion for which they had stood. The heaven of free thought was working slowly but surely in even the most conservative churches. Unitarianism had its historical associations, which were precious and inspiring, and to give it up would seem to imply that they were ashamed of their past. They did not fetter the future; they simply indicated the results of religious evolution. The Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., replying to a cordial vote of thanks, said Unitarians they were, whether they liked the name or not, and Unitarians they would be called by others, no matter what name they placed upon their notice board. Dr. Beard, of Liverpool, a particular friend of his, protested against the name for over twenty years, but never succeeded in altering it. When he died his demise was noted in the Press under the heading of "The death of the well-known Unitarian orator." What did this name they quarrelled about mean, and why were their numbers so few? The answer to the first question was that they denied all the dogmas of modern orthodoxy—the Trinity, the Incarnation, and kindred dogmas; but negation was of no practical avail unless they had a strong formative principle. The answer to his second question was that they could not be called a popular Church. It was a strange fact that men generally went with the majority. Whether they thought for themselves was a different matter. The speaker then added words of encouragement, and said that whether their number was large or small, it did not affect their individual faith, which was placed upon the unalterable and unchanging God.

Stannington.—On Easter Sunday, two impressive sermons were preached in Underbank Chapel by the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., of Sheffield. Owing to the unfavourable weather and prevalent sickness the congregations were not as large as usual. The annual tea was held in the school on the following Tuesday evening, after which a public meeting was held in the chapel, under the presidency of the Rev. Iden Payne. Addresses were delivered by the Revs. J. E. Manning and William Stephens. A hearty vote of thanks was accorded to Mr. Manning for his services on Sunday, and also to the friends who had provided the music of the evening. Several hymns were sung at intervals, and a very pleasant and profitable meeting was brought to a close with prayer and the benediction.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It will be well for the people of this country, if the three-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Oliver Cromwell, which falls on Tuesday next, should vividly recall the memory of that fearless and noble man, and of the services he rendered to his country. No memory has been subject to greater obloquy than his, and yet the impartial judgment of history has now clearly established the single-minded patriotism and the devoted religious enthusiasm of the man. The civil rights of our people are now happily fully established, and the limits of monarchy in this country are clearly defined. Neither will any aggressions of the Sacerdotalists involve us again in civil war. And yet there is need of the Iron-side in politics, and for the maintenance of a personal, spiritual religion, which is the very life of a loyal citizen and demonstrates that God is the only true ruler of the land.

We received with the greatest regret some little while ago the first number of the Sunday Daily Telegraph. The week's finance, betting and sporting news, fashions, society and police news, as well as politics and literature, are all served up for our Sunday reading. We need not, of course, buy or look at the paper, and certainly none of our pennies will go to it. But unhappily this and similar papers are likely to pay, and the men who have to produce them will suffer. Mammon is an ugly god, and its votaries are traitors to their country.

THE Liverpool School Board on Tuesday by eight votes to seven (including, we regret to say, the vote of Mr. T. C. Ryley, a member of the Society of Friends, and one of the "unsectarian" members of the Board) agreed to the adoption of the greater part of the Evangelical Free Church Catechism, together with the "two duties" of the Church of England Catechism, to be used in the religious instruction of Board-schools. Some days ago, when it was rumoured that this step was about to be taken, strong protests were made by the Revs. R. A. Armstrong and J. Hirst Hollowell, the Board of the Congregational Ministers of Liverpool and the Liverpool Wesleyan Methodist Council; but under cover of the specious argument that the Catechism was not denominational and therefore not illegal, because members of so many denominations could agree to its teaching, and in spite of the protest of the Roman Catholic members, the resolution was carried as above stated.

THE Governors of the University College of Wales, at Aberystwith, which is an undenominational foundation, have rightly decided that they cannot accept the legacy of £1,500 from the late Mr. Williams, for the foundation of a scholarship, from the benefit of which Unitarians and Roman Catholics were to be excluded. The College authorities having finally come to this conclusion, the gift was declared in the Court of Chancery last Saturday to have failed, and as part of the residuary estate it will go to a Congregational church at Aberystwith. The College will receive the testator's library, which happily could not be hampered by any sectarian conditions.

THE three letters on the Irish University Question, addressed to THE INQUIRER by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., being a criticism of Mr. Balfour's proposals for the establishment of a Catholic University, have been reprinted in pamphlet form, and may be had, price two-pence, from the author at Maythorn, Heaton, Bolton.

THE bicentenary of Barton-street Chapel, Gloucester, was celebrated on Tuesday, the annual meeting of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches being held at the same time. At the commemoration service the preacher was the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A. A report of these meetings we hope to give next week.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF NON-SUBSCRIBING MINISTERS AND CONGREGATIONS OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.—London, April 19, 1899.—The Rev. Ethelbert Yates, of Hammonton, New Jersey, U.S.A., who desires to enter the ministry in this Province, has satisfied the Advisory Committee of this Assembly as to his character and personal fitness.—(Signed) George W. Chitty, president; James Harwood, secretary. Note.—All matters other than character and personal fitness are left for the sole consideration of each individual congregation.

DR. MARTINEAU'S BIRTHDAY.

REMEMBERING that Friday of this week is Dr. Martineau's ninety-fourth birthday, we have recalled the verses in which Mr. Thomas Hornblower Gill so happily commemorated previous birthdays.

Of the verses of 1885, with Dr. Martineau's reply, Mr. Gill has been good enough to make a translation for the benefit of un-Latined readers.

April 21, 1885.

Haud rapuit, mirande, tibi octogesimus annus
Corporeas vires robur et ingenii;
Ter felix! pede difficiles ascendere montes
Qui possis; necnon edita mente simul.

The Reply.

Nec tibi restinxit, vates, matura senectus
Fervorem ingenii Pieridumque faces;
Parnassum superans, facilis tu victor abibis
Alis despiciens tædia longa pedis.

(Translation.)

Thine eightieth year thee, wondrous one, doth find
Still strong in body, still supreme in mind; Thrice happy thou, whose feet steep hills can climb,
Whose genius still can soar to heights sublime.

The Reply.

Nor, Poet, has thy glowing soul been quelled,
Nor has the Muse's fire been quenched by eld.
Parnassus thou victorious dost ascend,
And winged watch how slowly footmen wend.

To Plato more than eighty years were granted,
To Kant the same large measure was not scanted,
But Martineau to-day at eighty-eight
Transcends herein each fellow potentate.

What mighty monarch of the realm of thought
At ninety years hath ever reigned and wrought?
Time for our wonder doth his rights forego,
And yields the miracle in Martineau.

Two Birthdays.

April 21 and April 23.

A single day the birthdays doth divide
Of mighty intellects not unallied:
Of him, the height of whose transcendent powers
Above all genius in all ages towers;
Of him the matchless master-mind of ours.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

THE forty-ninth annual meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall, on Wednesday evening, the president, Mr. S. S. TAYLER, in the chair. There was a large and most encouraging attendance of members and friends.

The PRESIDENT expressed his pleasure at the large attendance, and welcomed the Revs. H. W. PERRIS and R. H. U. BLOOR, who appeared among them for the first time as ministers of the district. Letters of regret for absence had been received from Mr. J. T. Preston, one of the oldest subscribers and a former secretary, and from Sir John T. Brunner.

The report was read by Mr. G. H. CLENNELL, one of the secretaries.

The report chronicled another year of steady progress in many directions, in the maintenance of work already undertaken, if not in new enterprises, and in the face of financial difficulties; but those difficulties it was confidently hoped would be overcome by the great effort being made worthily to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the Society. At Lewisham the congregation was steadily growing and promised in a few years to take its place among the self-supporting churches. At Plumstead (formerly Woolwich) a church hall had been opened and a vigorous effort was being made to diminish the heavy debt. The future of Bermondsey caused anxiety, there were great difficulties in maintaining a church in the midst of so fluctuating a population, and the necessary outlay was too heavy a drain on the Society's resources. It was suggested that an independent body should take charge of the work. At the re-organised Stamford-street and Blackfriars Mission splendid work was being done. At Forest Gate the Rev. H. W. PERRIS had settled with prospect of excellent results, while Kentish Town and Kilburn promised soon to be independent of the Society. At Stepney and Stratford a new experiment was being tried under the superintendence of the Rev. T. E. M. EDWARDS, assisted by Mr. LUCKING TAVENER, a lay-worker. At Mansford-street the most admirable work was being done by the Rev. W. G. CADMAN.

The Treasurer reported a falling-off of subscriptions and chapel collections, but a very satisfactory reduction in grants to congregations had been possible. The deficiency was increased to £229 10s. 3d., and would have been nearly £500 but for the response to a special appeal of the President's. The loss through death was recorded of Mr. W. TATE, the Rev. R. SPEARS, the Rev. J. T. WHITEHEAD and Mr. CHARLES HIND, valued supporters of the work of the Society, and concluded with an expression of deep obligation to the President for his services.

The Treasurer's statement was presented by Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, who appealed for a larger measure of support, and for new subscribers to fill the inevitable gaps made by the passing years. The annual subscriptions only amounted to £257, the special appeal of the President had brought in £244, and the chapel collections £62. The total expenditure, including grants of over £800 to congregations, amounted to £988 19s. 8d., leaving a balance of £229 10s. 3d. due to the Treasurer.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the reports, said that he had been at the first meeting at which the Society was formed, and at every annual meeting since. He was deeply impressed with the value of the work of the Society, which was founded on the broad principles of Christian truth, upholding the Fatherhood of God as the governing principle of the Universe, and the consequent truth that all people were His children. They could not accept the evangelical scheme of salvation, nor the doctrines of Calvinism, nor the sacerdotal claims, and they had a great work to do to maintain truer principles of religion. They had true sympathy with all the people in the other Churches; it was the principles, not the people, they objected to, and thousands were waiting for the teaching of the purer Christianity it was the duty of that Society to maintain. Thirty years ago he had read a paper on the work of the Society, in which he had said that the field was most promising, but the number of subscribers had fallen off. That was exactly their position at the present time; their subscription list was utterly inadequate to the demands of the work. Their friends did not realise how much work the Society had done. Of the 29 churches of the London District, 15 had been promoted at their foundation by that Society.

The Rev. R. H. U. BLOOR seconded. He noted that among the objects of the Society was to rouse in Unitarians a determination to make increased exertions on behalf of the faith they profess; but from the Treasurer's report it seemed that they had only determined on a decrease of exertions. As the end of Christianity was life, those who showed the best in life were the best Christians. Unless there was great effort, a great output in fact, they could not believe there was very much faith. There was no question that others whose beliefs they could not share were in deadly earnest, and they had to ask themselves what they were doing for the faith they professed? The heretics in the olden times had been crushed by the Church, although they were right and the Church was wrong, because they were not united. But now they who were the successors of the heretics had liberty to combine, and now was the time to do a great work. All the best work was done by strong combination. They were a small band, and it was all the more necessary that they should work together.

Dr. HEFFORD said that Society had been formed in a rebound of encouragement and a new sense of responsibility which followed the securing of their churches by the Dissenters' Chapels Act. At the beginning of the century the churches were very few and isolated, and the feeling was that they could not do more than just hold their own and keep together. But when at last they were stirred to work for the great London about them, their first undertaking was the Domestic Mission, about as noble and ecclesiastically unselfish a work as could be undertaken. The anxiety which was caused by the Lady Hewley case, when their people dared not spend anything that was not absolutely necessary on their chapels, fearing that they would be altogether taken away, was relieved by the Chapels Act of 1844, and then followed a period of restoration and church building. In 1853 there were six chapels in London and two missions; now they had thirty places of worship large and small, and of these eight were substantially missions to the poor. In that work of extension their Society had given substantial help. They had not laboured in vain. In spite of a chronic debt the work had grown, and it was still before them. The need was ever greater than what they could do; and they must respond to the call. He trusted that the special effort being made would meet with a great response, which would greatly strengthen their work.

The motion having been adopted, Mr. EPPS explained the position of things at Bermondsey, and moved:—

That it be an instruction to the new Committee that provided that the B. and F.U.A. and the London District Society find between them £100 a year for three years towards the cost of the services at Bermondsey, they take the necessary steps to form an independent committee with a view to raising sufficient additional funds for carrying on a centre of social and educational work in connection with the church.

This was seconded by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, and the Rev. H. RYLETT spoke of the prospects of work at Bermondsey. One of the most powerful agencies for the elevation of the people he held to be a Unitarian church, and they ought to hold fast to such a centre of work. They might do there the kind of work that was done at the various settlements in different parts of London.

The resolution was carried nem. con.

On the motion of Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, seconded by Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE, Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., was elected president, and the vice-presidents were also elected.

On the motion of Mr. I. S. LISTER, seconded by the Rev. J. E. STRONGE, Mr. David Martineau was re-appointed treasurer; Messrs. Harold Baily and G. H. Clennell secretaries, and Messrs. Withall and R. Lawford auditors.

On the motion of Mr. BAKEWELL, seconded by the Rev. H. W. PERRIS, the Committee was elected.

Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS moved a resolution approving of the formation of a Permanent Building Loan Fund, and of the contemplated appeal and bazaar as the best means of securing the success of the effort. He spoke of the enormous growth of London in the last fifty years, the new county of London covering now 121 square miles, and the growing London being greater even than the county. He felt that the Unitarians of London were not doing their duty by the people of that vast city; but their new effort would greatly strengthen the work they were doing, and enable them to break new ground where there should be need. Of the fund of £12,000 they aimed at, £4,000 might be used to meet present liabilities, and to finish off the work they already had in hand, and £8,000 or more would form the Permanent Loan Fund. He announced that Sir John Brunner had already promised £1,000, Mr. F. Nettlefold £1,000, Sir Edwin D. Lawrence £1,000, and Miss J. D. Smith £500; the promises so far received amounted to £4,200. The London Provincial Assembly, the Postal Mission, and the Manchester District Association had each undertaken to provide a stall at the bazaar. Messrs. F. Nettlefold and Frank Preston had accepted the office of treasurers.

The resolution was seconded by Miss TAGGART, and passed.

On the motion of Sir ROLAND WILSON, seconded by Dr. COURTNEY KENNY, Messrs. G. Callow and J. Sudbery were appointed representatives on the Council of the B. and F.U.A., and Mr. D. Martineau delegate to the anniversary meetings.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by Mr. CLENNELL, and seconded by the Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, brought the meeting to a close.

ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH.—II.

ALTHOUGH the giving up of his Oriel fellowship was a serious pecuniary loss to Clough and left him without any clear prospect of new work, he seems to have quitted Oxford with a joyful feeling of emancipation. In the preceding year, 1847, he had made the acquaintance of Emerson, and the friendship which soon sprang up between them probably hastened his decision. It was with Emerson also that he spent some weeks in Paris immediately after resigning his tutorship in the spring of 1848, in the midst of the excitement of the Revolution. In the autumn of the same year he wrote his long hexameter poem, "The Bothie of Tober-na-Vuolich: a Long Vacation Pastoral." It exhibits abundant signs of the freedom and happiness of this period of his life. Indeed in no poem of his, before or since, do we find any approach to the high spirits which pervade it. We are exhilarated by the youth and health and strength of the young men of the reading-party as they themselves by the Highland air and beauty. We listen to their debates, half gay, half grave. For with the fun of the "Bothie" there is mingled much serious thought. And the metre seems to suit admirably the delightful medley. Listen to Philip Hewson—"Hewson, a Radical hot, hating lords and scorning ladies." The tutor, "the grave man nicknamed Adam," has been talking much quiet wisdom and ends thus—

"We have all something to do, man, woman alike, I own it;
We have all something to do, and in my judgment should do it
In our station; not thinking about it, but not disregarding;
Holding it, not for enjoyment, but simply because we are in it.
Ah! replied Philip, Alas! the noted phrase of the Prayer-book,
Doing our duty in that state of life to which God has called us,
Seems to me always to mean, when the little rich boys say it,
Standing in velvet frock by mamma's brocaded flounces,
Eyeing her gold-fastened book and the watch and chain at her bosom, Seems to me always to mean, Eat, drink, and never mind others."

(Philip, it may be noted, like many other people, does not quote the phrase from the catechism accurately.)

Not the least charming part of the poem is the love story of this same Philip Hewson who woos and wins the Highland maiden Elspie. Here is a quaint and beautiful passage in which Elspie talks to her lover (whom she will still insist upon calling Mr. Philip) of the way in which their lives have been drawn together. It is a good specimen of Clough's hexameters.

"Yes—I don't know, Mr. Philip—but only it feels to me strangely,
Like to the high new bridge, they used to build at, below there,
Over the burn and glen on the road. You won't understand me.
But I keep saying in my mind—this long time slowly with trouble
I have been building myself, up, up, and toilsomly raising,
Just like as if the bridge were to do it itself without masons, Painfully getting myself upraised one stone on another—"

All one side I mean; and now I see on the other
Just such another fabric uprising, better and stronger,
Close to me, coming to join me: and then I sometimes fancy—
Sometimes I find myself dreaming at nights about arches and bridges—Sometimes I dream of a great invisible hand coming down, and Dropping the great key-stone in the middle: there in my dreaming,
There I felt the great key-stone coming in, and through it Feel the other part—all the other stones of the archway.
Joined into mine with a strange happy sense of completeness. But, dear me, This is confusion and nonsense. I mix all the things I can think of—
And you won't understand, Mr. Philip."

It is pleasant to think of Clough in the happy buoyant mood which the "Bothie" reveals. He had just made a great sacrifice for conscience sake, and was before long to find how difficult it would be for him to take up new and uncongenial work, but meanwhile his faithfulness to duty had brought him the reward of a light heart and the joy of a great outburst of song. Soon after the completion of the "Bothie" he accepted the position of head of University Hall, a house of residence for students attending University College, London. Some months intervened before his new duties commenced, and he spent part of this time in a visit to Rome. He was fated to see a good deal of the stirring events of 1848 and 1849. In the former year he had gone, as we have seen, to Paris on purpose to see something of the Revolution in progress there; now, in 1849, he goes to Rome at the time of the short-lived Republic, of which Mazzini was the leading spirit, and, as it chanced, is kept there while the city is besieged and finally taken by the French. His letters give interesting glimpses of the strange life of the city at that time. The inhabitants, both natives and strangers, seem, on the whole, to take things very coolly. At one time he describes a crowd in the Piazza Colonna watching with great interest the bombs which are falling within the city, and crying out from time to time, "Ecco un altro!" A few days later he goes with an Italian general and his wife and daughters to the Villa Ludovisi—"a gay party of pleasure." But he shows his sang-froid and good spirits in the midst of these alarms and excitements most delightfully in his second long poem, "Amours de Voyage," which "... was writ in a Roman chamber When from Janiculan heights thundered the cannon of France."

This collection of imaginary letters in hexameter verse may also be called a medley like the "Bothie," and a charming medley it is. But the mood is a far less healthy one than that of the "Bothie." One of the mottoes prefixed to the poem gives us warning of what we are to find in the hero of the piece—

"Oh, you are sick of self-love, Malvolio,
And taste with a distempered appetite!"

And the love-story, which ends in nothing but vague regrets, is very different from Philip Hewson's vigorous love-making.

"So it proceeds; Laissez faire, laissez aller—such is the watchword.

Well, I know there are thousands as pretty and hundreds as pleasant, Girls by the dozen as good, and girls in abundance with polish Higher and manners more perfect than Susan or Mary Trevellyn.

Well, I know, after all, it is only juxtaposition—Juxtaposition, in short; and what is juxtaposition?"

But the languid love-making is by no means the only interest of the story. We are constantly reminded that we are in Rome at the stormy time of the new Republic, with skirmishing outside the gates and sometimes fighting in the streets. And even the languid Mr. Claude, although his most usual mood is is sometimes roused to enthusiasm for the Italians.

"—What's the Roman Republic to me, or I to the Roman Republic?"

"Ah, 'tis an excellent race—and even in old degradation,

Under a rule that enforces to flattery, lying, and cheating,

E'en under Pope and Priest, a nice and natural people,

Oh, could they but be allowed this chance of redemption!—but clearly

That is not likely to be. Meantime, notwithstanding all journals,

Honour for once to the tongue and the pen of the eloquent writer!

Honour to speech! and all honour to thee, thou noble Mazzini!"

But the greatest charm of the poem is that it breathes the very atmosphere of Rome. Everyone who has been to Rome knows what a strange fascination she exerts upon her visitors. To read Clough's poem in Rome is to experience the delight of finding the mysterious influence which haunts you expressed in beautiful words; to read it at home is to intensify your longing to see the wonderful city again. Here is one of the bits of elegiac verse which are interspersed between the cantos of the poems:—

"Is it illusion? or does there a spirit from perfecter ages,

Here, even yet, amid loss, change and corruption, abide?

Does there a spirit we know not, though seek, though we find, comprehend not,

Here to entice and confuse, tempt and evade us, abide?

Lives in the exquisite grace of the column disjointed and single,

Haunts the rude masses of brick garlanded gaily with vine,

E'en in the turret fantastic surviving that springs from the ruin,

E'en in the people itself? is it illusion or not?

Is it illusion or not that attracteth the pilgrim transalpine,

Brings him a dullard and duncé hither to pry and to stare?

Is it illusion or not that allures the barbarian stranger, Brings him with gold to the shrine, brings him in arms to the gate?"

It was no bad poetical output for the twelve months which followed his departure from Oxford—the "Bothie" and the "Amours de Voyage." But there were deeper thoughts and sterner questionings at work in the poet's soul than are revealed in the breezy life of the one, or the gentle melancholy of the other. It was in Naples in the same year, 1849

—the year of the "Amours de Voyage"—that he wrote the poem called "Easter Day," with its sad refrain "Christ is not risen." It is a poem as beautiful as it is sad, and shows how love can live when all faith and hope seem gone.

We are reminded of the words of the apostle Thomas, "Let us also go, that we may die with him." I do not know how long after the first part of "Easter Day" the second part was written which has a more cheerful note.

"Though He be dead, He is not dead,
Nor gone, though fled,
Not lost, though vanished;
Though he return not, though
He lies and moulders low;
In the true creed
He is yet risen indeed;
Christ is yet risen."

But I do not think that the cheerful second part has the poetic power of the first. In October Clough came back to London and began his new work at University Hall. J. R. WILSON.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

COUNCIL MEETING.

The Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association met on Tuesday afternoon at Essex Hall, the President, the Rev. Dr. BROOKE HERFORD, being in the chair. There were also present Mr. David Ainsworth, Mr. H. Blessley, Mr. G. Callow, Mr. Edwin Clephan, J.P., Mr. Richard Eve, Mr. John Harrison, Miss Florence Hill, Miss E. M. Lawrence, Mr. I. S. Lister, Mr. J. Ellis Mace, J.P., Sir Philip Manfield, Miss Mary Martineau, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mrs. E. L. Morton, Mr. C. F. Pearson, Rev. H. Woods Perris, Mr. Frank Preston, Miss M. Pritchard, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Miss E. Sharpe, Mr. Hugh Stannus, Miss Tagart, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Miss Tayler, Mr. S. S. Tayler, the Rev. C. H. Well-beloved, Sir Roland K. Wilson, Bart., and the Secretary (the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie).

The minutes of the preceding meeting were read and confirmed.

The following report was then read by the Secretary.

REPORT.

Since the last meeting of the Council the Committee have met five times, and there have been twenty-five meetings of the various sub-committees. It has added to the interest of the work of the Association that there are now serving on the Committee leading laymen from the Manchester district, the Midlands, and from Yorkshire. It should also be remembered that two of the ministers who serve on the Committee have lived and worked in the provinces for several years, and are familiar with the life and work of the churches and societies in different parts of the country.

Finance.—The statement of receipts and expenditure of the Association for the year ending Dec. 31, 1898, shows that the Treasurer carried over a cash balance of £42 19s. 1d. from 1897, and that during 1898 the sum of £1,792 14s. 6d. was received in subscriptions, £341 11s. in donations, £869 11s. in dividends, interest, and rent, £603 4s. 2d. in collections, £1,269 5s. 4d. from the Book Department. The expenditure included £2,139 4s. in grants to churches and missionaries, £314 6s. 3d. in grants of books and tracts, £919 5s. 9d. in printing, binding, and purchasing books and tracts. The office and book-room expenses and salaries remain about the same as the previous year. Several changes have been made in the Investment Account, one of the mortgages has been paid off, and the remainder of the Walkers-Parker Debentures have been sold. A legacy of £35 from the late Mr. Matthew, of Bridport, has been received. The Committee have much pleasure in reporting that 172 congregations contributed in collections the sum of £522 9s. 2d. This is the largest amount received since the Association Sunday collections were started in 1833, and also the largest number of congregations taking part in the collections. The income and expenditure for the first quarter of the current year do not differ much from the previous year.

Publications.—During the year 1898, 1,695 books, 103,408 tracts were granted to congregations, postal missions, ministers, students, and to correspondents in all parts of the world. The Unitarian Pocket Almanac and the "Essex Hall Year Book" for 1899 have been issued, and a copy of the latter was sent to every subscriber to the Association of 10s. and upwards. The following leaflets and tracts have been reprinted:—"The Theology of the Future," by the late Dr. James Freeman Clarke; "Common-sense View of the Bible," by Dr. Brooke Herford; "Where to find God," by the Rev. Frank Walters; "What must I do to be Saved," by the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A.; "Five Points of Christian Faith," by Dr. Martineau; "Salvation: What it is and is not," by the late Dr. Crosskey; "Christianity as Christ preached it," by Dr. Herford; "Jesus Christ the Son of God, not God the Son," by the Rev. J. Page Hopps. The "Sermons for the Times" have had additions in "Faith and Life" by Professor W. H. Hudson, U.S.A., and "Christianity and Social Problems" by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke. The Committee has also published, for the use of postal missions, a lecture on "Original Sin," by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. Arrangements have been made with several Welsh ministers for the publication of a series of tracts in the Welsh language, for distribution in Wales; two are already in the press and will be published shortly. A lecture on "The Authority of the Bible," by the Rev. James Ruddle, has been published, especially with a view to circulation in Scotland. The Rev. V. D. Davis is preparing a small book of Services and Prayers for use in churches. The Rev. Denis Peterfi has translated Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul" into Hungarian, and the book has been well received and reviewed by the Press. The Committee made a grant of money to Mr. Theo. Berg, of Copenhagen, to help him in the publication of a small paper in Danish, "Det Glade Budskab," containing translations of Unitarian tracts and leaflets. The Liverpool Booksellers' Company have made an interesting experiment in opening a shop where a special feature is made of the publications of the Sunday-school Association, and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Through the generosity of a member of the Committee upwards of 10,000 copies of a tract by the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., entitled "Christianity and Sacerdotalism," were distributed by post. Every member of the House of Lords, and of the House of Commons received a copy; upwards of 5,000 were sent to ministers and laymen; a copy was also sent to every public library in the country, to a large number of booksellers in London and the provinces, and to the chief newspapers in the country. The tract has proved of great service owing to the controversy in and out of Parliament on Ritualism.

Mission Work.—The Committee have made grants to congregations for the current year as follows:—Ashton-under-Lyne, £100; Bedford, £30; Bermondsey, rate of £60; Bournemouth, £30; Bradford (Manchester), £40; Cardiff, £20; Carlisle, £45; Chelmsford, £15; Chorlton, £40; Colyton, £10; Congleton, £20; Clydach Vale, £12 10s.; Crewkerne, £15; Darlington, rate of £75; Devonport, rate of £35; Elland, £30; Forest Gate, £60; Framlingham, £20; Gateshead, Byker, Choppington, £100; Hastings, £35; Heaton Moor, £45; Huddersfield, £40; Ilkeston, £60; Kentish Town, £20; Kilburn, £25; Leicester F.C.C., £20; Lewisham, £80; Lye, £10; Lynn, £30; Mansford-street, £20; Middlesbrough, £30; Newark, £18; Nottage, £10; Nottingham (Christ Church), £30; Pentre, £12 10s.; Plumstead, £70; Poole, £35; Small Heath, £50; Southampton (a special grant), £100; Stepney, £15; Stockton, £30; Stratford, £15; Torquay, £25; Warwick, £25; Whitechurch, £10; Wick, £5; Yeovil, £15. Grants to district missionaries have been made to the London and South Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly, £100; to the Western Union, £62 10s.; to the South East Wales Society, £85. Grants have been made for foreign mission work to Brussels, £10; Budapest, £50; Hungarian Student, £50.

Special grants have been voted as follows:—Braintree, £20 for new iron building; Chesham, £50 for buildings; Crewkerne, £25 for schoolroom; Croft, £10 for minister; Framlingham, £10 for repairs; Harrogate, £10 for special services; Loughborough, £5 for special services; Newton Abbot, £10 for services; Rhydympark, £5 for supplies; Stalybridge, £25 for buildings; Weymouth, £10 for supplies; £5 was voted to the Rev. James Hocart in aid of Postal Mission work on the Continent; also £5 to Mrs. Dendy, and £2 to the Eastern Union for Postal Mission work. At the request of the Committee the Rev. R. H. Lambley, of Melbourne, visited Auckland, New Zealand, and Hobart Town, Tasmania, to confer with the friends there in respect to the future prospects of the two Unitarian movements. His report came to hand a few days ago, and will be considered by the Committee at their next meeting.

The New Nonconformist Marriage Act.—A circular letter was sent to the ministers of chapels in England, inquiring, on behalf of the Registrar-General, if they purposed taking advantage of the new Act. 142 congregations replied that they intended to adopt the Act; 59 declined; 33 were doubtful; and 45 did not reply. Several congregations have since written that they do not now wish to adopt the Act, owing to the onerous conditions imposed by the regulations.

McQuaker Fund.—Lectures, expository of Unitarian Christianity, have been delivered in various parts of Scotland, under the direction of the McQuaker Trustees. [Particulars of the lectures by the Revs. A. C. Henderson, A. E. Parry, E. T. Russell, and A. Webster were then given.] The new church at Kirkcaldy was opened on Saturday, March 25, by Dr. James Drummond; the services on the Sunday were taken by the Rev. Frank Walters; on the Monday a Public Meeting was held, when the Rev. W. G. Tarrant and Mr. Ion Pritchard attended on behalf of the McQuaker Trustees. The Trustees have voted the following grants to churches for the current year:—Aberdeen, £90; Dundee, £75; Glasgow (South St. Mungo-street), £100; Kirkcaldy, £100; Paisley, £115. In addition to these grants in aid of the ministers' salaries, £50 was voted in aid of the alterations and improvements to the church at Dundee; and £12 in aid of special services in a public hall at Aberdeen. Arrangements are in progress for lectures in the University towns of Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, by the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke, in November, 1899. Books have been offered to ministers and students in Scotland, free on payment of the carriage; 128 applications were received, and 501 books were forwarded at a cost of £26.

Work in India.—The Committee have much pleasure in reporting that the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams has had a hearty reception in India wherever he has gone, and large audiences have gathered to hear his lectures both at Madras and Calcutta. On his arrival at Madras a welcome meeting was held, organised by the Brahmo Somaj, and presided over by the Editor of the Standard. Whilst Mr. Williams was in Madras he preached in the mornings at the Unitarian chapel and elsewhere, and on Sunday evenings at the Brahmo Somaj Mandir. On Wednesday evenings he gave addresses on religious subjects at the Brahmo Somaj, and on Saturday evenings lectures on "Unitarian Leaders." He lectured at different literary societies in connection with the colleges on "Matthew Arnold," "Buddha," and "Carlyle." The Committee have received many letters thanking them for sending out Mr. Williams to India, and numerous newspaper reports have appeared bearing evidence to the good work he is doing. Mr. Williams is now in Calcutta lecturing and preaching, and he will remain there until the hot season, when he goes to visit the Unitarian Mission Stations in the Khasi Hills district. Through the kindness of Professor Chatterjee, of Allahabad, who undertook the work of distribution, 250 copies of Mr. Armstrong's book, "God and the Soul," have been given to University graduates who applied for copies. The Committee are now offering six prizes, consisting of Dr. Martineau's "Study of Religion" and "Types of Ethical Theory," for the best essays by University graduates on this book. The writers of essays will be expected to give their own thoughts on the subjects discussed, and not a mere analysis of the book. Large numbers of books and tracts have been sent to libraries and private individuals in India, and many letters have been received saying how very useful the literature has proved. Mr. Promotho Loll Sen has sailed for India, and carries with him the best wishes and respect of all who knew him. The Committee hope that the knowledge and experience he has gained in England will be of service to him in his missionary work among his fellow-countrymen. Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal and Mr. Hem Chandra Sarkar, M.A., are both pursuing their studies at Manchester College. Grants have been voted to Mr. Akbar Masih for work at Banda, £40; Khasi Hills Missions, £90; Madras, £23.

Special Services.—Since the last meeting of the Council Rev. Stopford A. Brooke has preached at the following places:—Bermondsey, Birkenhead, Birmingham (Church of Messiah), Bournemouth, Bristol, Brixton, Cardiff, Coventry, Croydon, Dukinfield, Gorton, Hampstead, Huddersfield, Kidderminster, Middlesbrough, Newhall Hill (Birmingham), Northampton, Plymouth, Pontypriid, Portsmouth, Preston, Scarborough, Sheffield, Stalybridge, Stourbridge, Todmorden, and Torquay. Large congregations, in several instances crowded congregations, attended the services in these towns. Excellent reports have appeared in the local newspapers, and great interest was aroused by Mr. Stopford A. Brooke's visits. The Committee have made arrangements for services in London and the provinces from October, 1899, to May, 1900. They have been compelled to decline a large number of requests for a visit by Mr. Stopford Brooke.

Autumnal Meetings.—The autumnal meetings of the Association were held at Bolton on Nov. 23 and 24, 1898. The president, the treasurer, the secretary, Mr. David Martineau, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, along with Lady O'Hagan, and Sir John Brunner, Bart., M.P., attended as the delegates of the Association. In spite of a heavy snowstorm, the meetings were largely attended and very enthusiastic. The Albert Hall was well filled at the evening meeting, about 1,000 people being present; the meetings were among the most successful autumnal meetings ever held by the Association. The Committee are greatly indebted to the congregations and ministers at Bolton for their hearty reception of the Association. Mr. G. H. Leigh attended the annual meeting of the East Cheshire Union on Nov. 5 as the representative of the Association. At the annual meeting of the North Midland Association, held on Oct. 7, the Rev. V. D. Davis represented the Committee. Mr. Ion Pritchard and Mr. S. S. Tayler attended the National Conference of Non-conformists, held at St. Martin's Town Hall on Nov. 15. The secretary attended the Jubilee meeting of the Mill Hill Chapel, Leeds, on Dec. 27, 1898.

Anniversary Meetings.—The following arrangements have been made for the anniversary meetings in Whit-week:—On Tuesday, May 23, the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, M.A., will give the Essex Hall lecture on "Mediævalism and Modern Thought." On Wednesday morning, May 24, the annual sermon will be preached at Essex Church, Notting-hill-gate, by the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A. On the afternoon and evening of the same day the annual meeting will be held at Essex Hall. From 4 to 6 the ordinary business will be transacted; from 7 to 9 there will be a public meeting, at which the Rev. Brooke Herford, D.D., the President, will take the chair, and speak on "Our Word and Our Work;" and two well-known laymen and two ministers will address the meeting. On Thursday morning, May 25, there will be a Conference at Essex Hall, when two papers will be read—one by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, dealing with the claims of the priesthood, and setting forth the Unitarian position in contrast. On Thursday evening there will be a Conversazione at the Royal Institute of Water Colour Painters, Piccadilly. The President and Chairman of the Anniversary Sub-committee will invite the delegates from the District Societies to meet the Committee at luncheon after the sermon on Wednesday, May 24.

Deceased Members.—The Committee regret to report the death of a former president, Mr. Michael Hunter, of Sheffield, one of the upright, strong-hearted and outspoken laymen who have made the name "Unitarian" honoured in the public and municipal life of England; also of several members of the Council, the Rev. Thomas Hincks, Miss Bartram, and Mrs. Weiss, all honoured for their work. The Committee feel that some more special mention is appropriate on the death of the Rev. Robert Spears, whose long and active life in the service of Unitarianism was not only intimately associated with this Association, but with our Unitarian work throughout the country, and was known and honoured among our friends in America and India.

THE LATE REV. R. SPEARS.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the report, the PRESIDENT proposed the following resolution:—

That we record with deep regret the death of the Rev. Robert Spears. In him not only this Association loses one who as a former Secretary did much to enlarge and strengthen its work, but our whole church-life loses an earnest, devoted, and untiring worker. By his publications and by his pen, in the issue of Dr. Channing's Works, and his long editorship of The Christian Life and The Christian Freeman, he did much to popularise our faith, and was especially the kind helper of its scattered workers throughout the country. And that this resolution be sent to Mrs. Spears and his family, with the expression of the Council's sympathy and respect.

He thought he was one of the few there present who could remember Mr. Spears before he came to London. At that time there was noticeable in their late friend the same heartiness and outspoken manliness, the same vigorous temperament and Methodist fervour as had characterised him in the years during which he was so well known to them all. He very sincerely felt all that the resolution expressed, and he was sure it would be felt by all the Council.

Mr. EDWIN CLEPHAN said it was inevitable that the older men should pass away, and their comfort was to see many young men in different parts of the country coming forward to carry on the work in which their fathers were engaged. He believed his recollections of Mr. Spears went still farther back than the President's, and he had peculiar pleasure in remembering that at a most critical time in Mr. Spears' religious development, he had looked to Mr. James Clephan (the speaker's eldest brother) for counsel and support. He had deeply endeared himself to the congregation at Stockton, where in his younger days he had settled as minister, and where his memory was most warmly cherished. It was with grateful feelings for all that Mr. Spears had done—which was more than they could yet realise—that he seconded the motion.

Miss SHARPE, in adding a few words, said it was Mr. Spears' great modesty that rendered them unaware of the true loss they had sustained in his death. He had been the standard-bearer of the Unitarian name in days when it was less regarded than now, and she trusted there would be raised up those who would faithfully follow him. She felt that the saying had most fitly been associated with his memory—"Go thou and do likewise."

The resolution was passed in silence by the members rising in their places.

THE NEW MARRIAGE ACT.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the reception of the report, called attention to the new law enabling Nonconformists to dispense with the presence of the Registrar at marriages in their places of worship. He believed that, though the conditions required by the Act were felt by some to be "onerous," they were really not more so than those which were imposed on clergymen; and now that Nonconformists had thus attained so much of equality with the clergy in this respect, he thought it would be a pity if their ministers held back from the adoption of the Act.

Mr. I. S. LISTER seconded the reception of the report.

Mr. H. BLESSLEY having borne grateful testimony to the stimulating effect of the visits of the Rev. Stopford Brooke to Portsmouth and Bournemouth,

Mr. E. CLEPHAN expressed sympathy with the President's views as to the advisability of adopting the new Marriage Act, and Mr. H. STANNUS suggested that a resolution recommending the Act to Unitarians should be passed by the Council.

Sir ROLAND WILSON, as a Nonconformist layman, deprecated such a course. He thought the Act was a radically false step, and while he agreed cordially with the principle of equalising all ministers and clergy before the law, he thought it should be done by insisting on the presence of a civil officer at the celebration of what the State regarded as a civil contract. He strongly dissented from any course which should give the State an excuse for inquiring into the qualifications of their ministers.

The Rev. C. H. WELLBELOVED said the congregation at Southport had been quite willing to adopt the principle of the Act, till they saw the conditions imposed; when they learned these, they emphatically declined. Contrary to the opinions of the President, he thought the Act did not place Nonconformists in an equal position with the clergy in respect to registration; and he would remind the Council that the Act had been rejected by the Congregationalists and Baptists as a rule, absolutely by the Roman Catholics, and to a considerable extent by the Wesleyans. The feeling of the great bulk of the Nonconformists in the country, therefore, was against the Act.

The PRESIDENT, in reply, reminded the Council that already their ministers performed certain civil duties in regard to interments. He thought they would be more likely to get a measure of absolute equality as regards the attendance of the Registrar at all marriages if they accepted in the meanwhile the provisions offered by this Act.

On the suggestion of Miss FLORENCE HILL, seconded by Sir ROLAND WILSON, it was decided to instruct the Committee to consider the introduction of a resolution on the subject of "Peace" at the next annual meeting of the Association.

The report was then passed.

Statements as to Religious Instruction for Young People and as to the New Evangelical Catechism were then made, which we will give next week.

The following are the nominations for the Executive Committee for 1899-1900:—Mr. G. L. Bristow, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, Mr. E. Clephan, the Rev. V. D. Davis, Mr. Charles Fenton, the Rev. James Harwood, Miss E. M. Lawrence, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. George H. Leigh, Mr. David Martineau, Mr. J. S. Mathers, Mr. F. Nettlefold, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. J. F. Schwann, Miss Tagart, the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Mr. S. S. Tayler.

The Rev. T. L. Marshall, who has served continuously on the Committee since 1853, with the exception of one year, has retired owing to his removal to Sidmouth. He will be greatly missed by his colleagues, as his large knowledge and wide experience of our churches and societies were highly prized and proved most valuable. Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, who served on the Committee as ex-president, has been nominated in Mr. Marshall's place. Dr. Brooke Herford will take Mr. Lee's place on the Committee as ex-president. Mr. Oswald Nettlefold is nominated for re-election as treasurer; and the four trustees (Mr. S. S. Tayler, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., and Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P.), are also nominated for re-election. It is hoped that at the annual meeting, Mr. Charles W. Jones, of Liverpool, will be elected as president, in succession to Dr. Herford.

The lists of nominations for the Council, Committee, and officers to be submitted at the annual meeting were then considered and revised, and it was moved by Mr. H. BLESSLEY, seconded by Mr. H. STANNUS, and carried unanimously, that a special letter of respect and grateful appreciation of his many services be sent to the Rev. T. L. Marshall, who, after being for very many years a member of the Executive Committee, was resigning that position, but who would be placed upon the Council.

DR. MARTINEAU'S BIRTHDAY.

Sir PHILIP MANFIELD said that as Friday, the 21st, would be Dr. Martineau's birthday he had been asked to move the following resolution:—

That the Council, being assembled within a few days of Dr. Martineau's ninety-fourth birthday, begs respectfully to offer him its most cordial good wishes, and to express to him on behalf of the Association the deepest gratitude for those labours on behalf of Unitarian Christianity which have so greatly aided its thought and enriched its devotion during more than two generations, and which have permanently endowed it with a precious heritage of wisdom and inspiration; and, while we humbly trust that in days to come our religious movement may show itself not unworthy of so rich a bequest, we would tenderly commend him in our prayers to the Giver of every blessing.

He felt that words were not necessary to add to that resolution, but it was interesting to recall that in 1834, sixty-five years ago, Dr. Martineau preached the annual sermon for the Association, and again in 1869. He had been a subscriber for many years, and only a few months ago called at the Hall to renew his subscription.

Mr. DAVID AINSWORTH said he felt it a great honour to second such a resolution. Dr. Martineau was so well known by his works and personally that they needed no formal expressions of regard and respect for him; but it was really startling that a man of his years should still manifest, as he does, the liveliest interest in politics and the progress of the world. They knew well that so long a life meant the experience of many a sorrow, and recently Dr. Martineau had sustained a heavy bereavement in the loss of his son, Mr. Russell Martineau. With deep sympathy and respect they would join in that resolution, feeling it to be a great honour to have had connected with their movement a man of such singular mental and religious gifts.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

This concluded the business of the Council.

OBITUARY.

MR. B. C. OTLEY.

MANY Upperthorpe friends made another sad pilgrimage to the pretty old chapel at Stanington on Tuesday, the 11th inst., to be present at the interment of an esteemed Sheffield Unitarian—Mr. B. C. Otley. It was within three days of the anniversary of the interment of Mr. Charles Woollen, of ever-beloved memory, and now it was his son-in-law, one of the biggest and seemingly strongest of men, called suddenly, in the very prime of life, to follow him. Mr. Otley came of an old Unitarian family which worshipped at Upper Chapel in the days before Upperthorpe was established. He was a member of the firm of Thomas Otley and Sons, and in recent years was much engaged in business affairs. At one time he took an active part in the affairs of the Upperthorpe congregation; but latterly he had been unable to do so, although he continued to worship with the congregation to the end. He was one of the heartiest and most genial of men; a devoted and affectionate husband and parent, beloved by all who had had opportunities of penetrating through his sometimes brusque manner to the always tender and generous heart underneath. Representatives of both the Sheffield congregations attended the funeral service, which was conducted by the Revs. J. Ellis and Charles Peach, the Rev. Iden Payne also being present.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From Dr. Martineau's "Hours of Thought."

IF, then, the very law of life is a law of change; if every blossom of beauty has its root in fallen leaves; if love, and thought, and hope would faint beneath too constant light, and need for their freshening the darkness and the dews; if it is in losing the transient that we gain the Eternal, then let us shrink no more from sorrow, and sigh no more for rest, but have a genial welcome for vicissitude, and make quiet friends with loss and death. Through storm and calm, fresh be our courage, and quick our eye, for the various service that may await us. Nay, when God Himself turns us not hither and thither, when He sends us no changes for us to receive and consecrate, be it ours to create them for ourselves, by flinging ourselves into generous enterprises and worthy sacrifices by the stirrings of sleepless aspiration, and all the spontaneous vicissitudes of holy and progressive souls; keeping always the moral spaces round us pure and fresh by the constant thought of truth and the frequent deed of love. And then, when, for us too, death closes the great series of mortal changes, the past will lie behind us green and sweet as Eden, and the future before us in the light of eternal peace. Tranquil and fearless we shall resign ourselves to God, to conduct us through that ancient and invisible way which has been sanctified by the feet of all the faithful, and illumined by the passage of the Man of griefs.

It is by looking up beyond the actual, not by looking down into it, by seeking God within, not consulting men without, that you will truly measure the Divine claims upon you, and find your duty clear and calm and sacred. Commune with Him, the All-holy, and it will become a secret understanding between his spirit and your own—a trust from Him, answered by assent and love from you; an escape from the poor twilight of human mediocrity into the precincts of a lustre which can never fade. A soul that goes apart with this divine vision of goodness has that to feed on which others think not of.

On every side the relations of our life to the supernatural which penetrates and enfolds it betrays itself in our consciousness. The intellect, which seeks to transcend the finite in space and time and truth; the conscience, which owns the infinite in duty and stays itself on the infinite in love, indicate the scale of our affinities, and attest a nature that liveth not by bread alone, but by every word of communion with God. Moulded of perishable and imperishable elements, we sink and rise, we sleep and wake, we faint and struggle on; toiling outwardly for transitory wants, pining inwardly with everlasting thirst. Be it not in blind unconsciousness that we carry in us the seal of the Eternal. Shall God's Spirit plead with us every day, and never reduce us to a sweet and holy mind? Because our feet are in the dust, shall our heart never go up into the mountain to pray, and our thought never pace the heights of meditation? Shall the years sweep by and take from us all that is mortal, without waking the immortal life within us from the winter in which it sleeps? Shall we wait to die into the surprise of God, instead of taking his dear and solemn converse now and for ever? Shall we dream of a future eternity, and be blind to that which surrounds us every instant—which brings its judgments to our conscience, its present God to our trust, its mighty company of saints to our affection? Ah! let the film of the carnal mind fall from our eyes; and yielding ourselves to be led by the Spirit of God, let us claim our divine Sonship and enter on its glorious liberty. There will be no sadness then in the flow of a life of change: time will take nothing but our delusions away; will enfold us in a warmer light of divine affection; and clear the everlasting air, till we see even as we are seen.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IN the book of Ecclesiasticus in the Apocrypha there is a passage which begins, "Let us now praise famous men," and the writer goes on through seven chapters (44-50) to tell about the chief men in the history of his people. They were, he says, "Such as did bear rule in their kingdoms: men renowned for their power, giving counsel by their understanding, and declaring prophecies: leaders of the people by their counsels, and by their knowledge of learning meet for the people, wise and eloquent in their instructions: such as found out musical tunes and recited verses in writing: rich men furnished with ability, living peaceably in their habitations: all these were honoured in their generations, and were the glory of their times." And then he adds, "Their bodies are buried in peace, but their name liveth for evermore. The people will tell of their wisdom, and the congregation will show forth their praise."

It was of the ancient history of the Jews, or the people of Israel, before the time of Christ that he was writing; but we also are happy in our own country, that we can praise famous men, when we look back upon the history of England. It helps us to be brave and true, when we remember that we belong to a people among whom in past times there have been many noble men and women, great and good rulers, wise teachers, fearless sufferers for the truth, patient and unselfish workers for the good of their country. A thousand years ago King Alfred, who is called the Great, and might also be called the Wise and Good, was living in this country. A little more than six hundred years ago John Wiclif, the great reformer of religion was living, and a hundred years later William Tyndale was born, who was the first to translate the Bible into the English that we speak to-day, and who died as a fearless martyr for the sake of his religion. These are some of the noblest of Englishmen, and you will be able to think of many more, of former times and in our own time, who make us ashamed of any meanness or cowardice in ourselves, and make us long to be worthy of our country and of the name we bear.

But to-day I want you specially to remember Oliver Cromwell, and to think of what this country owes to him. Next Tuesday it will be just three hundred years since he was born. I think he was one of the very noblest of our people, but he lived in very stern and troubled times, and a great deal of ill has been spoken of him. He was a plain country gentleman, who grew up to manhood in James I.'s reign, and when Charles I. was king, became a member of Parliament, and took a deep interest in the welfare of the people. But Charles I. thought a king had the right to rule in his own way, and was angry when Parliament would not do what he wished. For many years he would not summon Parliament at all, and tried to raise money and to rule without the help of the people. He tried to force the people to do what he wished in their religion too. That led to the civil war, and you know from the history books how the Long Parliament, when the king at last called it together, became the ruler of the country, and the king was defeated in battle and taken prisoner, and at last executed as a traitor to his country. Cromwell was the strongest man in that civil war on the side of the people. He had not been trained as a soldier, but when it became a question between the king's tyranny and the freedom of the people, he felt that he must not hold back, and he gathered the troops, which came to be called "Ironsides," and himself led them to victory. He and they were very earnest religious men, who felt that they were fighting for their religion as well as for the freedom of the people, and that is what gave them the strength and courage by which they conquered.

After the king's death there were great difficulties in the Government of the country, and only Cromwell's strong hand could prevent terrible confusion and disaster. He had not chosen to be the chief man in the country; he had simply gone on from year to year trying to do his duty, determined to be true to what he felt to be just and right, and the best for his people; and so, though he would not be king, he was the ruler of England, and was called the Protector up to the time of his death. He used his strength to protect those who were persecuted on account of religion in other countries, and did his best to have justice done, and earnest religion taught throughout this country. His enemies tried to kill him, and there were many bitter disappointments in the latter part of his life, but he was brave and faithful to the end; and although everything he had tried to do for England seemed to have failed when Charles II. was brought back to be king, Cromwell and the men who had fought with him had shown what the strength of a free people and a determined religious earnestness could do. The liberty we now enjoy in religion and the good government under which we live, we owe largely to Cromwell and the brave and true men of his day. There are many lessons in his life good to be remembered. Some day you will, perhaps, read Carlyle's great book, "Cromwell's Letters and Speeches," and there is a little book by Dr. Horton on Cromwell well worth reading. I should like to think that you all are interested in his life, and feel that he is an Englishman to be remembered with honour.

THE remaining members of the "Universal Mercy Band," of which the late Rev. Thomas Timmins was the secretary, do not feel able to continue the operations of the Society, but they desire to erect a memorial on his grave at Portsmouth. For this purpose they invite contributions, which may be sent to the hon. treasurer, Mr. H. Williams, 48, Lancaster-road, Stroud Green, N.

LONDON, APRIL 22, 1899.

THE LIVERPOOL CONFERENCE OF DOMESTIC MISSION WORKERS.

THE meetings of this Conference were held on Tuesday and Wednesday, at the Liverpool Domestic Mission in Mill-street. Favoured by pleasant weather and a large attendance of friends, the Conference was eminently successful, and full of encouragement for the future of the work. Sir J. T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., President of the Liverpool Society, was unfortunately prevented by his Parliamentary duties from being present, but among those who were present during the meetings of the Conference were Messrs. Walter Holland (Treasurer of the Liverpool Domestic Mission), W. B. Bowring, H. W. Gair, R. D. Holt, Henry Jevons, T. Chilton, S. B. Worthington, J. H. Rawlins, R. Robinson, Richard D. Holt, Sydney Jones, A. W. Hall, B. P. Burroughs, F. Robinson, Mrs. Enfield, Mrs. Alfred Holt, Mrs. R. D. Holt, Mrs. Bowring, Mrs. R. C. Hall, Mrs. Mulleneux, Mrs. Steele, Mrs. J. P. Brunner, Miss Anna Sharpe, Miss H. M. Johnson, Miss McConnell, Miss Worthington, Miss Coventry, the Revs. Dr. Klein, S. A. Steinthal, E. P. Barrow, A. Gordon, C. Hargrove, D. Agate, J. Harwood, C. H. Wellbeloved, J. C. Odgers, E. Ceredig Jones, H. W. Hawkes, J. Crossley, Lawrence Scott, J. C. Street, C. T. Poynting, C. Roper, Wilfred Harris, W. J. Jupp, H. Gow, W. H. Drummond, J. M. Mills, H. D. Roberts, R. S. Redfern, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, W. L. Tucker, J. H. Wicksteed, H. M. Levens, W. E. Attack, N. Anderton, A. L. Smith, V. D. Davis; and of those specially engaged in Domestic Mission work, the Revs. F. Summers, and F. Allen, of London; Sydney Street, J. W. Bishop, and B. Walker, of Manchester; J. W. Clarke, T. Pipe, and W. J. B. Tranter, of Birmingham; Joseph Wain, of Bristol; G. J. Slipper, of Belfast; E. J. Chapman, of Leicester; and T. Lloyd Jones, J. L. Haigh, J. Anderton, and Miss Wells, of Liverpool.

On Tuesday afternoon, the delegates and visitors were received by the workers of the Mill-street Mission in their splendid new buildings, and at 3 o'clock the chair was taken by Mr. WALTER HOLLAND, in the large hall.

The CHAIRMAN, in opening the proceedings, offered a cordial welcome on behalf of the Mission to the visitors, and said that messages of warm approval of the purpose of the Conference, and of regret for absence, had been received from Dr. Martineau, Dr. Brooke Herford, Dr. Drummond, of Manchester College; the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter, C. B. Upton, J. E. Odgers, Mr. R. D. Darbishire, Mr. William Rathbone and others. Having traced the progress of that Mission during sixty-three years, from the humblest beginnings up to the present noble equipment for the work, and having emphasised the fact that the primary object of that ministry, in daily personal intercourse with the poor, had been steadily adhered to, he called upon the Rev. WILFRED HARRIS, secretary of the Manchester Domestic Mission, who read a paper on "THE DEVELOPMENT OF A MISSION CONGREGATION."

The paper was a strong and eloquent plea for the provision, by those who have the religious conviction, the culture and means, of religious ministrations for the masses of the people who have not the means and are largely unawakened to the deeper needs of life. The first day of the week being set apart for the special work of strengthening the spiritual life, provision ought to be made for those who have little education, less culture and no religious habits, that Sunday might not be to them a day of torment, a day on which there was nothing to do and nowhere to go. Their idleness was enforced; but those who did not or could not devote their holy day to holy things were better without such a holiday. Those who were responsible for the enforced cessation of labour were responsible also for seeing that worship took its place, or at least that the conditions of helpful worship, beautiful churches and chapels, services, music, and ministers were abundantly provided. They had no right to drive a thousand men, women, and children away from their workshops into the streets and the public-houses one day out of seven, and to do nothing to make the day profitable to them. Saturday night and Sunday the poor man had his money and himself on his hands at the same time, and was so much at a loss what to do with himself that he was not long at a loss what to do with his money. He spent his money in forgetting himself. The abodes of the poor abounded with public-houses, and they had the one great power of enabling a man to forget himself. They solved the difficulty of getting over Sunday. That glorious day of worship, thanksgiving, meditation and praise broke over a vast seething mass of humanity, stricken half dead already by Saturday night's debauch. There were men, women, dinner, tobacco, drink, and the door-step to get through the day with. The day of cessation from labour unfitted them for the labour of the following day. He did not blame Sunday, but he did say that Sunday was only justified if men were worshipping God upon it. Yet they who compelled work to cease in the slums had not encouraged worship to begin. They were bound either to see that worship did begin, or to send those thousands of men back to their work again. The latter alternative were a wickedness past all naming, to be content that their fellow men should live at such a low level as to be incapable of religious feeling and divine inspiration and fit for nothing but drudgery year in, year out. They must take the higher course and aim at the harder alternative. Sunday was the grandest institution yet ordained for the uplifting of mankind, and if the people needed education in religion on the first day of the week, it must be given them. They must work on Sunday, at the work specially belonging to it—the spiritual and religious education of mankind. The question of the development of a mission congregation, of one or two such congregations in one or two poor districts was only the beginning of a far greater movement by which at last the gospel of education, instruction, friendship and Christian helpfulness, should be as abundantly provided and as adequately maintained and served out at every street corner as beer and spirits are now. It was a question whether or no the religious and educated sections of the community would set their hands to the work, whether they who insisted on Sunday and enforced its cessation from labour would or would not insist upon the ample provision of the means of religious worship, education, and ministerial and lay visitation. An idle day was a wicked institution. If Sunday was such, it was a damning stain on their souls and their character.

Christianity devoted the whole week to God, and the first day of it to working at the spiritual fitness of men that they might be fitted to work for God all the other days also. The night was for rest. The Christian Sunday was not like the Jewish Sabbath, an idle institution. It was not a pick-me-up or half-way public-house, where the driver of the chariot of Mammon might stop for a refresher or engage a seventh and fresh horse to rest the other six, that he might race after money and gold all the faster on Monday. The Christian Sunday was the day of the most important of all work. It was wrongly used unless it was used to call men to the service of God. And if it was not so used the result was the corruption of society and the deterioration of work.

In the districts in which they were called to work men needed to have the duty of the right observance of Sunday forced upon them, they must be compelled to come in, and be made to feel that rightly to begin the week was a life and death question. Those thousands of suffering, miserable men were asleep—asleep on the day of salvation, the one day on which they had a chance of the time, the opportunity, the privilege, the duty of bettering themselves; and they must be roused and saved. Bad as it might seem to have to give up all hope of maintaining suburban residences, it would be infinitely worse to give up hope of maintaining urban churches and chapels, and the thousands of missions and missionaries needed for the complete education of the people in the very heart of the city. Better to come down to poverty in the houses built to the honour of men than to be too poor to build houses to the honour of God, or be paupers in charity, not having Christianity sufficiently strong to bear the cost of maintaining the absolutely necessary spiritual work of the world.

Religion was not an accessory, an ornament to be stuck on or struck off. If it was preached as a secondary thing, it was wrongly preached. And in developing a mission congregation it must not be taken as a pleasant relief from the monotony of the week. The mission must take complete hold of men's lives and inner motives; it must reconstruct their lives from top to bottom by turning their hearts to God, and for such building-up public worship was needed. There was a power in it, needed by the poor as by others. It was needed in the slums as elsewhere. The commandments of God were needed, and not only morals but the motive, the inspiration and strength of life; and also the joy of life. All this was the work of their missions. And those who know the poor best knew how brightly the clear divine spirit burnt within them, how near, how ready to be called out, with what astounding gratitude they sometimes spoke of God, with what trust and love. The harvest of souls was ready; they must see that it was gathered in.

The Rev. JOSEPH WAIN, in opening the discussion, dwelt upon the fact that their missions were Domestic, not for the propagation of any special views, but working on the broadest lines to take their gospel to the people in the intimate union of personal intercourse. The missionary went from house to house helping in temporal and spiritual things, in close touch with his people. And then naturally he gathered them together on Sundays, and out of the knowledge gained during the week he found the material for his preaching. It was right to build chapels and make them as bright as possible, but they must remember it was the very poor and struggling they had to work for. It was not a question of ability in preaching, or of learning, but of understanding the needs of the people. When they found bright young men in the congregation it was well to get them to take part, to read a lesson or give out a hymn, or to pray; and the young women should be encouraged to sing in the choir. Then the elders would be drawn in through their interest in the young people.

The Rev. F. SUMMEES said the paper was a trumpet-call to the subscribers and friends of their missions. A mission congregation could not be developed unless funds were forthcoming to sustain the work. The list of subscribers inevitably diminished from year to year, and it needed hard work to keep up efficient support. The missionaries were in close touch with the people in their homes, helping and advising in every conceivable way; but it was a difficult question how to gather them in for the highest purpose of all—the worship of God. A small tract putting the case of Sunday worship might be of use. And why should not the fine music of their churches be made available also for their mission chapels?

The Rev. DENDY AGATE urged that in gathering a congregation it was not well that the people should have everything done for them, but they should be welcomed as fellow-labourers, and led to feel responsibility for the work as well as the worship.

The Rev. T. LLOYD JONES said that in proposing that subject he had in mind the objection that had been from time to time made to the gathering of a mission congregation, when it had been originally intended to induce those who were reached by the missionaries to attach themselves to the religious bodies to which they may have formerly belonged. But if they were all agreed that a mission congregation was an inevitable consequence of their work, they were right in considering how to develop it.

The Rev. SYDNEY STREET suggested that it might be well if in their Mission congregations they had a definite membership, so that whoever joined would express the desire to stand in definite relations to the minister and congregation; and the members could then form a committee from among their number, to keep in touch with the general committee of the Society and with other similar work that was going on.

The Rev. J. W. BISHOP thought the formation of a committee of the congregation undesirable. It was a great help to know personally every child in the school, for through the children their parents were reached.

Mr. G. J. SLIPPER held that the people were best reached in their homes.

Miss H. M. JOHNSON referred to the success of the Wesleyan Missions in Liverpool in forming a roll of their members.

The Rev. T. PIPE said that in Birmingham there was no question as to the value of the Mission congregation, but its success grew out of home visitation. They found a working committee in connection with the congregation of service. They appointed stewards from among their number, and set their members to do practical work about the building. Special musical services they had found very useful in drawing people to the Mission, and also in furnishing an interest to the young people in preparing for them.

The Rev. B. WALKER said that to many poor women harassed to death during the week it was the greatest blessing to be able to do nothing on the Sunday, and to set the husband and the others to do the work of the house. Idleness in the higher sense was to them a means of grace sent by God, for the rest and development of the physical frame. As to the registration of a congregation he had not found it successful. The most lasting work he had done had been when he gathered a few of his people about him after service, and had spoken to them of the spirit of the Master, and had inspired them to a true self-sacrifice. In such close personal intercourse the best work was done.

The CHAIRMAN and Mr. HARRIS having each briefly spoken, the meeting was concluded.

EVENING MEETING.

After tea, the Conference was resumed, the chair being taken by Mr. CHARLES W. JONES, J.P., who, in opening the proceedings, said that old methods were no better and no worse for being old, and new methods were no worse and no better for being new, but they must each stand on their own merits. He was annoyed by the great respect shown for precedents, and thought that they ought to judge of any work whether it was good in itself. In regard to their Mission he thought that the constant reference to what Dr. Tuckerman did as the standard by which their present action was to be judged was a great injustice to Dr. Tuckerman. The work had grown with changing conditions, and he was convinced that if Dr. Tuckerman could be with them that evening and could see those buildings he would cordially approve, and say that was the kind of work of which he had dreamed. The beginning was to put a God-fearing man to go among the people as their friend, and the work was bound to grow as it had done. If anyone thought that the original idea of personal intercourse with the people was in the least set aside in their present work, they should go through the streets about the Mission with Mr. Lloyd Jones or Mr. Anderton, and see how familiarly they were known to all the people. He then called upon the Rev. W. J. CLARKE, of the Hurst-street Mission, Birmingham, who read the following paper on

"OLD AND NEW METHODS OF WORK."

With the view of preventing any possible misunderstanding, it may be well for me to say at the beginning that in accepting the invitation given to me to address a few remarks to this Conference on the subject of "Old and New Methods of Work" in connection with our Domestic Missions, it is not implied for a moment that the old, the original methods adopted by Dr. Tuckerman and the early workers in the Domestic Mission field of labour have been, or are ever likely to become, entirely superseded or played out in their efforts to befriend and elevate the poor. They relied for the most part on the visitation of them at their own homes, on the supply of the most urgent of their bodily necessities, on helping services and the Sunday-school. And I venture to say that so long as the wail of poverty, the cry of distress, continue to be borne upward to the Throne of the Highest on every breeze that blows; so long as the greatest, although the unseen realities of life—the belief in God, the sense of duty, the hope of immortality—remain in the soul of man, so long will the methods of work devised by our predecessors remain just as needful, and of just the same incalculable value as they ever were. It is not, therefore, as I understand it, so much a question of abandoning the old methods, as of considering to what extent the altered social and other conditions under which we labour make it desirable that we should, with the view of more surely and completely realising the objects at which we aim, employ, in addition to them, other and newer modes of work.

Looking back to the time when most of our Domestic Missions were founded, we may say, as Mr. Disraeli once remarked with regard to a very different subject: "A good deal has happened since then." The ways in which God may be served, immortal hopes made to dwell in the hearts, and religious aims to control the lives, of the poorest, the humblest of His children, are seen to be far more numerous, and much closer at hand, than they were once supposed to be. The distinction between things sacred and things secular is by no means as sharply defined as it once was. And men and women everywhere, in all churches and outside all churches, are awaking to a perception of the truth that there is no pursuit whatever in which it is justifiable for man to engage at all, no single thing which it is right, under any circumstances, for man to do, for which he may not ask the blessing and the consecration of religion.

As evidence of this, permit me to quote a brief, but suggestive, passage from the fifty-ninth annual report of the Executive Committee of the Benevolent Fraternity of Churches of Boston. Dr. Joseph Tuckerman began his labours as a minister at large, or Domestic Missionary, in Boston in 1826. In 1827 the work was taken in charge by the American Unitarian Association, and transferred by the Association in 1834 to what was then, and is now, known as "The Benevolent Fraternity of Churches." The following are the opening sentences of the fifty-ninth annual report of the Executive Committee of this body:—

"The originators of this work must have felt, we are sure, a deep sense of responsibility in those early days when the sermon and the Sunday-school alone were thought to be all the attractions needed. Latterly a variety of inducements have been employed to attract and hold the young, who are too likely to be entrapped by the greater attractions of the street and the saloon. People are not apt to become deeply interested in religious matters unless there is something cheerful and entertaining provided. It has been found that a successful way to make an impression on the young is by turning their attention to profitable reading, attractive games, gymnastics, social clubs, drill clubs, music, and even dancing. All these, if properly managed, may be made important helps to a useful, a respectable, and a religious life."

After this we need not be much surprised to find that among the agencies mentioned in the same report as being actively employed in connection with the Mission work are:—Girls' club; boys' club; gymnasium for boys, for young men, and for young women; dancing school for children and adults; calisthenics; illustrated lectures and entertainments; dramatic club; fife and drum corps; cadet corps; kitchen garden, or practical house-keeping lessons; outdoor sports and excursions; classes for drawing, sewing, mending, dressmaking, embroidery, cooking, &c. And the report concludes with the following statement:—"A summary of the different methods employed in carrying out our plans would embrace nearly all modern helps to good citizenship, and nearly everything that comes within the scope of modern Christian civilisation."

Now I am not going to suggest that all our Domestic Missions should be Americanised to the extent here indicated; although I may as well be frank and say that if some daring innovator should venture to make such a suggestion, it would not upset or disturb me to any alarming extent. Indeed, I am not at all sure that the very audacity of such a proposal would not have a sort of fascination for me. It is, I believe, understood that some of our English Domestic Missions have, rightly or wrongly, travelled a pretty considerable distance in this direction already. To how many of them this suspicion attaches I am not sure; but if any severe condemnation should ever be passed upon those to whom it does apply, then I can readily understand that somebody or other connected with this very Mill-street Mission, with one or two of our London Missions, and with the Hurst-street Mission at Birmingham, might begin to feel slightly uncomfortable.

And now if I refer for just a moment to some of the methods of work we have employed, and are still employing, in connection with the Mission it is my privilege and my joy to represent, it is not a shadow's shade of unworthy and unbecoming self-satisfaction of any kind which prompts me to do it; for heaven knows I am far too conscious of my own shortcomings, too keenly sensitive of the better use to which many of my opportunities might have been put, to yield to the temptation of laying to my soul any flattering unction of that sort. I do so only because I can in that respect, at any rate, speak of the results which have followed a certain line of policy from actual personal knowledge, and because I believe that in Domestic Mission work, as in most other things, facts are of infinitely greater value than arguments, and experience a far safer guide than any mere foreshadowing of probabilities and logical inference-drawing, however clever it may be, or may seem to be.

Apart from the religious services, the Sunday-schools, the home visitations, &c., and the various philanthropic agencies, we have the following in greater or lesser activity:—Classes for Biblical study, English literature, vocal and instrumental music, chemistry, physiography, basket-making, artificial flower-making, sewing, dressmaking, sick, saving, dividend, and prudent clubs, recreation room, cricket clubs, band of hope, mothers' meetings, children's Cinderellas, guild of play, entertainments club, social gatherings, outdoor excursions, &c.

Now before venturing on the extensive alterations of the Mission premises, which the proposal to include many of these agencies in our work necessitated, we submitted our extended scheme of work to Dr. Martineau, and asked his opinion upon it, who wrote to us as follows:—"Most heartily do I wish well to all the objects embraced in your larger scheme, and testify my goodwill and my partnership in your effort by such small contribution to your fund as it is in my power to send. The new influences which you propose to create are all of them approved instruments of social well-being, which every good citizen, without distinction, must naturally desire to set in action."

We wrote also to Mr. Geo. R. Sims, who, I happen to know, is deeply interested in the welfare of the poor, and has a very wide and exact personal knowledge of the conditions under which they live, who in reply wrote thus:—"I am delighted with your proposals; for I know from long experience how sorely the poor suffer from the absence of those opportunities of innocent recreation which are always within the reach of the wealthier classes. The fault of many well-meant plans for their elevation has been the utter lack of the attractive element in the popular sense of the word. In making this element one of the great features of your Domestic Mission, you have, I believe, taken a long stride on the royal road to success in dealing with one of the most difficult questions of the day."

Now, without going into minute details, it will, perhaps, suffice if I say generally that, as far as we are concerned, the results of what was then regarded as a new and somewhat hazardous venture have far surpassed our most sanguine anticipations. Never before have we been surrounded by so earnest, so willing, so devoted a band of workers; never have so large a number of young people been gathered about us, and, best of all, never before have our Sunday religious services been so largely and so regularly attended; never more characterised by true devoutness and sincerity; never more a source of real help and blessing to the worshippers than they have been since these changes were introduced. And this I attribute in some measure to the circumstance that we have thus striven to bring the Mission into touch with nearly every aspect of the lives of the people we desired to reach and attract. Judging by the lines on which many of our Missions have in the past been conducted, and on which most religious institutions are conducted now, one would imagine that colour, brightness, cheerfulness, are regarded as among the craftiest of the devil's devices. My own feeling is that he finds in gloom, dinginess, monotony, and coldness instruments infinitely better suited to his purpose. We have too long allowed the gin palace, the dancing saloon, the low concert hall to monopolise, for vicious and debasing ends, the music, the light, the beauty which we might employ as the gifts of God for high and ennobling purposes.

I think we have too long allowed these people to have it too much their own way; and that for the policy of mere denunciation, which, as a rule, has precious little effect on those it is intended for, it would in many cases be far wiser to substitute that of bold and open competition. I have not the least hesitation in expressing the belief that in our Missions we should do well to act on the assumption that for the poor as well as for other classes, and particularly for young people, amusement of some sort is a necessity, and that if pure, wholesome, and enjoyable entertainments and modes of recreation be not provided, resort will probably be had to those which are impure and unwholesome. I have no faith in the policy which simply calls upon those it is sought to influence for their good to abandon all pernicious forms of enjoyment, while offering no substitutes at all, or only such as are so insipid and colourless as to have no attraction for them. I believe in providing substitutes which, while bright and satisfying, shall yet be innocent, and connected with religious rather than with irreligious associations and aims. And here let me say, with all the earnestness of which I am capable, that in doing this and similar work I would never be content to base it on other than the highest ground. I would engage in it in no other or lower spirit than that which pervades those inspiring lines of old George Herbert's:

"Teach me my God and King,
Thy will in all to see;
And what I do in anything,
To do it as for Thee."

I say we are entitled to claim this high sanction for the methods of work to which I am referring, when it is remembered that many of those who attend our Missions are, during the week immersed in the toils and engaged in the conflicts inseparable from lives of wearying and monotonous labour, beset by temptations and harassed with anxieties which are peculiarly their own, and whom we could not therefore hope to attract or to retain without bringing them into contact with light and cheerful surroundings, but whose souls, once having got them under our influence, we can gradually fire with religious hopes and aims, until at last we bring them to realise that in the music of the hymn, the plaint of the prayer, the memory of the Sabbath, there is strength and comfort, there is protection in the hour of trial and temptation.

The secretary of our Mission Cricket Club told me on one occasion that he was sure the recollection of the Sunday service, and the associations of the Mission generally, had a restraining influence upon the members, causing them in the cricket-field to abstain from a kind of behaviour, and the use of a sort of language, in which others were often all too ready to indulge. And from my own personal observation, I am convinced that our recreation room, which is open nightly, and which is provided with draughts, dominoes, bagatelle boards, and refreshments, has kept scores of young men away from other and less reputable amusements and places. While, as showing the sort of value they themselves place upon the opportunities of innocent recreation there provided for them, I may, perhaps, be excused for mentioning that some few months since when the room needed re-furnishing and decorating, those who use it, poor as most of them are, set to work and did all that was needed themselves at a cost of about £30, without asking for a shilling from the Mission Committee, or from anybody else.

I hold, then, that not only with respect to its uplifting and purifying influences, its high aims and sacred associations, but with respect also to the beauty and the brightness of the Mission buildings, and the cheerful and helpful character of the life always going on within them, every Domestic Mission should be in a social as well as a religious sense the home of all associated with it; who should be able to find there, not only on the Sunday, but on week-day as well, a degree of real happiness, a measure of satisfaction and innocent pleasure, second only to that which may be extracted from the sanctities of the family life and the hallowed delights of the fireside and home.

In all I have said it has, of course, been taken for granted, as something about which all of us are certain to be in perfect agreement, that if it is to be true to the main purpose for which it was founded, then, come what may, a Domestic Mission must always be, first and above all, a religious institution. And while I am prepared to maintain that the agencies to which I have referred are, when properly managed, good in themselves, without regard to any ulterior purpose whatever, I plead for a place for them in connection with our Domestic Mission work, on the ground that they can be used as stepping-stones to higher and better things; that we may find in them material which may help us in building the golden bridge connecting earth with heaven.

One other word only in conclusion. I desire to express my solemn conviction that these Domestic Missions of ours are among the truest, the noblest, embodiments of Christ's own conception of what a Church of his should be I have ever heard of or met with.

God forbid that we should magnify our office; and God forbid, on the other hand, that we should fail to realise how sacred is the nature of the trust committed to our charge, how solemn are the responsibilities it involves, how priceless, beyond measure, are the opportunities it brings. For my own part, the longer I live the more firmly do I become possessed with the belief that of all forms of organised effort yet devised for the higher service of man, none bear a closer likeness to the religion taught and practised by Christ himself than do our Domestic Missions, and none, therefore, are more surely on the side of these forces, visible and invisible, which are for ever making for the reign of truth and righteousness, of justice and love, the whole world over. And with all my soul do I believe that their work belongs to that sphere of human effort of which Shakespeare has declared, "It blesseth him that gives and him that takes"; and of which a still higher authority once said, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

The Rev. SYDNEY H. STREET opened the discussion. He expressed the most cordial approval of the paper, and found nothing to add to it. It was a word that wanted badly to be said. At almost every annual meeting of his Mission someone was found who regretted the old days and the old ways of work, and caused some discouragement to the workers by suggesting that they were not carrying out the original intention of the Mission. But the new work was essential to present-day needs, and had grown out of the experience of the missionaries. For himself he found that after all in home visitation he could not come into close touch with all the members of a family. To reach the fathers and the young people it was necessary to reach them in the hours of their leisure and enjoyment, when they were not at home; and to keep them from the public-house and unhealthy places of amusement, they had to provide what was better. It was not enough to go to the homes of the people and urge them to keep out of temptation and live the higher and better life; they must keep in touch with them through the week, and know how they play their games, and do their work. It was the greatest service their helpers rendered when they thus came into friendly touch with the young people, and urged them to self-improvement, and gave the right tone to their recreations. The public-house was the problem of every poor neighbourhood, and as a place of social resort was necessary they must provide a healthy substitute for the drink shop.

Mr. Street then gave a most interesting account of the experiment he and his friends had made in providing a public-house and club rooms, without intoxicants; an experiment recently described by Mr. Roper in these columns. The few months of work had so far been very encouraging, but of course they could not yet say how it would turn out. But he should not be satisfied unless it proved a commercial success, so that others in other parts of the city might be encouraged to follow their example. Such an effort he felt to be distinctly in the line of Domestic Mission work.

The Rev. J. WAIN said that in Bristol also they had the vexed question of new or old, but he trusted that the paper of the evening would settle the question once for all. Social and religious work must be blended together as one. Organised work such as that of the penny bank gave them a natural entrance to the homes of the people, and the opportunity for more intimate relations and religious ministrations.

The Rev. F. SUMMERS thought that what were called their new methods had always been contemplated, though in earlier years the work had perhaps been more educational than recreative. But now Government through evening classes and continuation schools was doing the educational work more efficiently than they could do it, and they had to reconsider their methods and see what new help they could give in brightening and uplifting the lives of the people. Efforts in the encouragement of thrift were most valuable, and when undertaken in connection with classes of young men and women greatly improved the attendance.

The Rev. LAWRENCE SCOTT referred to a danger in connection with their football clubs and musical societies. He had found that often the young people found they could make profit out of their football and their musical skill and were tempted into less desirable associations and drawn away from the Missions. For the sake of the young people themselves means ought to be found to strengthen their loyalty and hold them to the Missions. It depended largely on their helpers, and he was thankful to know how rich in good workers some of their Missions were. But the difficulty ought not to be overlooked.

The Rev. W. L. TUCKER had found that he could get large numbers of people to a tea-party, but to bring them to the service of the church was more difficult. He thought if their elder and more prominent men would take a more direct part in the work of the schools and in their services, the example would be very helpful.

The Rev. J. C. STREET said that it was a matter of sorrow and regret that Domestic Missions had to exist, and that special provision had to be made for special classes. The ideal was a church in which all classes were united together, yet the present conditions of society rendered the provision of special agencies inevitable. He referred to the splendid work being done by the Birmingham Missions, which in their manifold activities were really like a department of the State providing for the welfare of the people. The Missions were religious in their action, and their methods were in the spirit of Christ making for the well-being of the world.

Mr. CLARKE acknowledged the great kindness with which his paper had been received, and the meeting terminated with a vote of thanks to the Chairman.

WEDNESDAY'S MEETINGS.

On Wednesday morning a devotional service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, an address on "Love" being given by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, and at 11 o'clock the Conference was resumed. The chair was taken by Mr. ROBERT D. HOLT, J.P., and a paper was read by Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON on

"THE RELATIONS OF DOMESTIC MISSIONS TO CHARITY ORGANISATION AND OTHER KINDRED AGENCIES."

The paper dealt especially with the conditions of work in Liverpool, with which Mr. Robinson had direct personal acquaintance, describing the operations of the Charity Organisation Society of that city, known by the preferable name of the Central Relief Society. Workers in the Liverpool Domestic Missions knew what invaluable help was received from that Society, especially since some twelve years ago important districts of the city were apportioned to committees of voluntary visitors, who thus gained an intimate knowledge of the conditions of poverty to be relieved, and that insight into character, without which charitable efforts could be of very little avail. At the same time it must be admitted that the work of the Central Relief Society was merely palliative and was quite insufficient to deal with the problem as a whole. That Society could only give relief for a few weeks in cases of acute distress, but when trade was slack there were always large numbers of the older, less vigorous, less intelligent artisans, who were the first to be thrown out, and the last to be taken on again, whose helplessness was aggravated by the unhealthy conditions of city life, for whom help ought to be found. There ought to be some means of providing work for these. The majority were not habitual drunkards or habitual livers on charity, but were eager for work. With the problem of labour the Central Relief Society did not undertake directly to deal, and those who were engaged in mission work and were face to face with the problem saw that some other agency was required to meet the need. By two methods the relief of this chronic distress had been attempted—by providing special workshops in the city itself, and by taking land on which the people might be set to work. The Central Relief Society in special reports had suggested that either the Guardians or some voluntary association might with advantage pursue this latter course. It might be objected that the question was too large to be dealt with by their Domestic Mission Societies, that the vast extent of the evil, and the causes at its root, must be dealt with by the whole nation; but they might at least do something in their own immediate neighbourhood. The most successful effort of the kind had been the Farm colony of the Salvation Army at Hadleigh, Essex. This and other experiments had proved what might be done to put new life and energy into those who had sunk into the despair of abject poverty. A certain percentage of failures there were, of course, sure to be, but the large majority of those received into the colonies were set upon their feet again, and found employment in this country or abroad. The labour colonies of Germany and similar experiments in America, at New York, Chicago, and Detroit, showed the same good results. The Liverpool Lord Mayor's Commission on the Unemployed in 1894 had strongly urged the adoption of this method. It might be difficult for the Municipality or the Guardians to work such a scheme, although the Guardians do assist some of the labour homes already established by contributing to the extent of 5s. a head towards the maintenance of the labourers, and such support of voluntary efforts might be extended. If the Central Relief Society would undertake such an effort, they would receive the cordial support of all Domestic Mission workers, but failing them, why should not the Missions themselves make the attempt? No very large scheme or great expenditure need at first be contemplated, and if the right man for the management of such a farm, at no great distance from the city, could be found, there would be little fear of failure. It would be only carrying out the great tradition of their Mission for the last sixty years and completing the circle of their efforts to minister to the needs of the neglected poor.

[Mr. Robinson's paper we hope to print more fully next week.]

Mr. W. GRISEWOOD, secretary of the Liverpool Central Relief Society, opened the discussion. He said that Society only dealt with cases of temporary distress and of deserving character, not the drunkard or reprobate. The Poor Law dealt with the latter. The Society did its work through district committees—ladies and gentlemen who had leisure to interest themselves in the details of the daily life of those needing help. Domestic missionaries could seek out deserving cases, going from door to door; they could also send representatives to serve on the district committees. Sometimes the aid rendered by the Society went on three or four months; and afterwards the families needed to be watched and persuaded to become thrifty. Without some test such as their workshop, it would be impossible to find out whether all the cases were deserving or not, and he did not think it caused the men to lose caste. They were seldom asked to relieve superior artisans who, as a rule, found no need to apply for aid. Whenever groceries were given they were in addition to money; the average man could earn over 3s. per day in the workshop cutting firewood. At present there was an abundance of work to be had in Liverpool; but hard times would come again, and it would always be less demoralising to give money as wages than as a dole. The national workshop in Paris was disastrous. It was good often to teach necessitous men a trade. The farm work suggested might be desirable; but it should not be made sensational. Let it be simply a general labour farm.

The Rev. F. SUMMERS thought that no case should be relieved unless it could be effectually and thoroughly dealt with. Men who objected to the labour test were, on the whole, the least deserving. He did not believe in farm colonies; they took men too far away from their accustomed employments. Besides, efforts of that sort brought down wages. He would test men by making them cart loads of stones from one corner to another, and then back again; and not let them produce goods that would compete with the markets and tend to reduce profits. Productive labour tests were a mistake, injuring trade and industry. In his own district the so-called deserving poor were so unscrupulous that some of them got on five separate lists for Christmas dinners.

The Rev. W. J. CLARKE was in hearty accord with the paper, but not with the previous speaker. He was sure it was better to deal with a case of need partially than not at all. Men who objected to labour tests were not necessarily undeserving. Great care should be exercised; but it was easily possible to be too hard. In twelve months' careful test in his own district he had not discovered six cases of duplication. The police aided in finding children deserving of clothing, which was marked so that it could not be sold. Ungenerous treatment was sometimes meted out to the deserving poor by those from whom might be expected different things. They might be more sinned against than sinning. If they had special vices, had they not also special virtues? Every day he saw amongst the poorest of the poor a measure of self-sacrifice, by the side of which the benefactions of the rich were not to be named. He did not believe in the doctrine that if we could at once make the poor virtuous, we should abolish poverty.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE thought that in a certain sense missionary effort could be too scrupulously unsectarian. People who were helped ought to be expected to attach themselves to the Mission and send their children to the school. Every missionary ought to look upon the Charity Organisation as his servant, and yet he himself should be its agent.

The Revs. L. SCOTT and V. HERFORD also joined in the discussion, after which Mr. ROBINSON briefly replied.

The Conference was resumed after lunch, when the chair was taken by Alderman W. B. BOWRING, J.P., and a paper was read by the Rev. JAMES C. STREET, of Shrewsbury, on

"THE DRINK CURSE; AND HOW TO DEAL WITH IT."

Speaking to a body of experts, familiar with aspects of suffering, sin, and ruin hidden from the gaze of the world, Mr. Street felt that he was set free from the awful but easy task of demonstrating the existence and potency of what was rightly called "The Drink Curse." They were only too familiar with the revolting features of drunkenness and its attendant vices. Much of their work was hindered, much of it spoilt, by the recurring flow of viciousness from that exhaustless fountain of evil. The question was, how to deal with that curse. The drunkard was constantly in their path, and those who were involved in the misery he caused. Sometimes they seemed to give permanent help, but for the most part it was only a temporary palliation of the evil. They never gave up a case, or ceased from their efforts, and used every means to elevate and to provide counter-attractions and awaken higher interests, and yet the tide of evil still flowed on, and was too strong and continuous for them. They were giving medicine to the sick and food to the starving, but the foul drains from the dram shop were ever poisoning fresh victims, and poverty was always being newly created. All around, at every corner, in every street, the public-house flaunted its seductions before the eyes of the people. The contrast between these places and their own homes and workshops was too marked, and the temptation too overmastering. Once under their influence the victims were alcoholised to their ruin. The wealthier classes could escape from such surroundings, but the poor had no real freedom of choice, and the publican naturally wished to push his trade. It was not the public-house which was the evil; there must be places of entertainment, of refreshment and public resort. It was the special article sold in those houses in which the mischief lay.

Undoubtedly the working men of Preston, seventy years ago, were right when they taught that personal abstinence from drink was the perfect cure for drunkenness, and the remedy for all the evils which alcohol brought into the world. In the region of moral suasion multitudes of good men and women had worked and were working now as arduously as ever. But the path of total abstinence was not easy to enter, and the temptations to leave it were numerous and powerful. Those who urged a moderate use of alcohol upon the people set them an impossible task; they had not strength enough, and their conditions were too hard. And even to the educated moderate drinker, experience in every rank of life showed how great the danger was. They must, therefore, work for total abstinence. Much progress had been made: there were said to be between five and six millions of personal abstainers in the United Kingdom. And yet the organised drink traffic was a tremendous force in the national life; no words could be too strong for the insidious evil it wrought. To oppose this they must use every effort—preach total abstinence, and use every agency they could discover to ameliorate the condition of the victims. But further than that, new power must be put into the hands of the people, to free themselves from the presence of the public-house. The responsibility of regulating the drink traffic in their midst should be laid upon the people themselves, and new hope and energy would be roused in them to fight against that great evil and overcome it.

[Mr. Street's paper we hope to print in full next week, or in the following week.]

The Rev. J. W. BISHOP opened the discussion. He said the time for speaking was past, and the time for action had come. A great mistake was made in not conceding the principle of compensation, for by this time much of the evil might have been removed. The coffee tavern keeper had yet to learn his business. He had spoken to at least 120 people about vetoing the sale of intoxicating liquor to young people under eighteen, and not one opposed the scheme. He believed in Local Option.

The Rev. J. WAIN said that for some time he was opposed to legislation in this connection, thinking it was a personal matter; but he now thought otherwise.

Miss H. M. JOHNSON thought that if power were given to the people they would use it rightly. In Norway it was Local Option and not the Gothenburg system that had brought about such good results.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL asked why temperate drinkers did not in public state why they held aloof from total abstinence work. It was not so much a question of personal conduct as of civic policy. Advocates of Local Veto are not now called fanatics. He believed public-houses would be closed if Local Option were granted. Statistics showed that the population in the lowest parts of the towns were more in favour of it than the parts socially higher. The curse was not confined to the working-classes and the poor.

The Rev. F. ALLEN thought that every Christian minister ought to be a teetotaler. He was surprised that so few Unitarian Sunday-schools had Bands of Hope.

Mr. JAMES SMITH spoke as one engaged in the trade and believed it was as honourable as any other, and was catering for a real want. Men had a right to eat and drink as they liked. It did no good to denounce the publicans in hard terms. The trade should be put on a just basis. A monopoly had been created and the rate of profit had been unnaturally increased. Those who advocated "no more licences" were the best friends of the publicans.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE said he was not a total abstainer, and claimed to be free to drink as long as he did not go to excess. He had been a total abstainer for prolonged periods. Alcohol was not a poison to him, but was good for his health, in moderation. Again and again he had asked himself whether he could do good by being teetotal, and he did not think he could. Much depended upon a man's environment. Had he been born a cobbler destined to work long hours in vitiated atmosphere he might have had a craving for drink. The cure was the improvement in the conditions of life.

The CHAIRMAN said that as one who had gone into the slums to see for himself he came to the conclusion that the only bright comfortable spot on Sundays was the public-house. Rational amusements and better houses must be provided. He was in favour of Local Veto. Licences were granted wickedly. No one could measure the harm done by intemperate drinking. The present system was as bad as it could be.

The Rev. J. C. STREET summarised the discussion very ably, and replied to the various points raised.

The meetings of the Conference closed with an evening reception at the Mission, for which Sir John and Lady Brunner had issued invitations. In the absence of the President, the guests were received by Mr. Walter Holland and Miss Holland, and there was a very large gathering, about 300 being present. An organ recital and choral music from "Miriam" were given in the chapel, Mr. F. Robinson presiding at the organ, and at a subsequent meeting in the lecture hall some short speeches were made by visitors and other friends, and an address to Dr. Martineau, one of the original founders of the Liverpool Mission, on the completion of his ninety-fourth year was adopted.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Blackpool.—The Rev. William Binns has announced to the congregation of Bank-street Unitarian Free Church his intention of retiring from active service, and will conclude his ministry in October next. The reason for this decision is the ill-health of Mrs. Binns and his own far from robust health. After forty-one years' service in the ministry, the last six spent in Blackpool, Mr. Binns will enter on a well-earned rest. He intends to continue, at any rate for the present, his residence in Blackpool.

Ciliau-Aeron, Cardiganshire.—On Wednesday, April 12, there was a large gathering on the occasion of the laying of memorial stones in connection with the new chapel which is being built from designs prepared by Mr. A. S. Tayler, of the Sanctuary, Westminster. In the afternoon a short service was held in the open air under the presidency of the Rev. Lewis Williams, resident minister. After the singing of Gwilym Marles's fine dedication hymn to the "Old Hundredth," the Rev. John Davies, of Altyplacae, read an appropriate portion of Scripture and offered prayer. Then stones inscribed with their names were laid by the Rev. Lewis Williams, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones, M.A. (Bradford), Mr. Thomas Jonathan (Foelallt), Miss M. A. Evans (Tynant, in place of her mother who was unable to attend through illness), Captain Davies (Rhydowen), and Miss Jenkins (Trecefel). Each of these friends repeated the words "In the name of the most High God, our heavenly Father, I declare this stone well and truly laid, and may He bless the edifice." The service concluded with a short prayer by the pastor. After tea, which had been generously provided by members of the congregation, a public meeting was held in the new school-room, which was crowded in every part. An opening hymn having been sung the Rev. L. Williams, who presided, stated that towards the £1,250 required to complete their scheme, which included the erection of the schoolroom in which they were assembled, the chapel house, stables, and the chapel, they had already received about £1,000. Towards that amount the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones had found about £400, and had helped them in other ways. Their gratitude was specially due to their English friends, who had responded most generously to their appeal. He hoped that when the chapel was ready for occupation, in the autumn, it would be possible to open it free of debt. The Rev. E. E. Jenkins, of Capelygroes, congratulated the congregation upon the progress which they had made towards securing a home that was worthy of their great cause. The new chapel was erected, as it should be—on a rock. It would remain as a monument of their zeal and earnestness, but the spiritual building which would be done within its walls would have a still more enduring influence. The Rev. J. H. Davies, the rector of the parish, said he was glad to come and rejoice with them that day. Cordial relations had existed for two centuries or more between the church and the chapel. When they required any good music in connection with their church functions they looked to the chapel choir for help, and always got it. He referred in feeling terms to the affection which had sprung up between him and their late minister, the Rev. William Rees, and said he was glad to find that their young pastor was following in his steps. The rector was quite overcome with emotion, and was unable to continue his address. The Rev. Thomas Pugh, curate of the parish, as a representative of the mother church, said he was present to accentuate as far as he could the feeling of Christian unity which had been dwelt upon by the rector. He had watched the progress of their new scheme with interest, and felt that the mother was in danger of being out-distanced by her more vigorous daughter. Captain Davies said he considered it a great honour and privilege to have his name inscribed on one of the memorial stones. That place was to him holy ground. He loved the spot. It was there that fifty years previously he had laid the foundation of his faith, which consisted of two great principles—"one God the Father of all; and love to God and man." On this foundation he had tried to build his character in this life and his hopes for the life to come. In his many travels in India, China, and elsewhere, the great principles which he had learnt on that spot had been a source of strength and un-failing comfort to him. The Rev. E. Ceredig Jones said that on that day was fulfilled one of the dreams of his childhood and youth. When he attended the old meeting-house in his early days it had always struck him that they deserved a more comfortable, religious home. He then made a vow that if it were ever in his power to build for them a new chapel he would do so. For the last few years he had done his best to give a practical expression to this long-cherished desire to help their cause. Their congregation had a most interesting history, and dated from the visit of Walter Craddock, the apostle of Nonconformity, to the district about the year 1649. Ever since then there had been a Nonconformist congregation at Ciliau-Aeron. Until the year 1672 the worshippers had to meet secretly in the woods and glens in the neighbourhood, and occasionally in each other's dwellings. For a long time after this they continued to assemble in private houses until the squire of the parish, Mr. Davies, of Foelallt, built for them the old chapel which had just been pulled down. It had been licensed as a place of worship on Oct. 8, 1755, but it was most probable that it had been erected some years previously. At that time the minister was the Rev. Philip Pugh. In 1773 the celebrated scholar and poet, David Davies, of Castle Howell, became minister of the chapel, and attracted large congregations by his eloquence. He made an appeal to the young people present to be true to the noble traditions of their church, and to take an active personal interest in religious work. Let them build their character on the rock of truth according to the plan which Jesus had supplied them with, and then in their new religious home they would worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness. Mr. David Davies, of Llanarth, the Rev. John Davies, and Mr. Daniel Jenkins, of Glanwern, were also among the speakers, and a most delightful meeting was brought to a close by the singing of a hymn and a benediction.

Coventry.—On Sunday week the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke preached, at the Great Meeting, a sermon on the renewal of life and hope. The text was Mark xvi. 5 and 6.

Elland.—On March 25 the ladies of the church, and the Guild of Goodfellowship, gave an entertainment of a rather novel character. They wore the national costumes of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, Mrs. Fred Lee representing "Britannia." National songs were sung by the chorus, and there were solos, recitations, and readings. During the interval the performers were very busy selling refreshments to the audience, and presented a pretty appearance. Mrs. H. Dyson, of Halifax, presided, and made an encouraging little speech.

Hastings.—On Tuesday week the Rev. S. Gardner Preston lectured at the Girls' Board School, Githa-road, Clive Vale, his subject being "Can we reconcile the Goodness of God with Pain and Evil?" General Luard presided. The lecture, which dealt with the great question of moral responsibility in a practical and helpful manner, was one of a course Mr. Preston is delivering.

London : Hackney.—A conversazione was held in the schoolroom on Tuesday evening, and most of the members of the congregation were present in order to meet the recently-appointed minister, the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor. After some songs, &c., under the superintendence of Mr. L. Taylor, the organist, a resolution offering a hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Bloor was proposed by the hon. treasurer, Mr. Collier, seconded by Mr. Cornish, the hon. sec., and supported by the Rev. H. W. Perris, of Forest-gate, as representing the London ministers.

London : Wandsworth.—Will secretaries and persons otherwise interested kindly note that the present secretary of this church is Mr. H. B. Lawford, 28, Nightingale-lane, Balham, S.W., Mr. A. Banton having resigned after eleven years of office.

Long Sutton, Lincolnshire.—The 199th anniversary of this place of worship was commemorated on Sunday and Monday last. The services were conducted by the Rev. A. J. Marchant, of Deptford (Messenger of the General Baptist Assembly). On Monday evening the proceedings consisted of a lecture on Dr. Brooke Herford's "Story of Religion in England," illustrated by magic lantern views, illuminated by the new acetylene gas. The connective readings were given by Rev. A. J. Marchant. The lecture was followed by short addresses, in which the Revs. A. J. Marchant, A. Julian (Congregationalist), W. J. Pond (pastor), and Mr. F. C. Boltz (treasurer) took part. The attendances were good throughout, the collections satisfactory, and the whole proceedings thoroughly interesting and successful.

Manchester : Upper Brook-street.—The "Monthly Popular Service" on Sunday last was addressed by Mr. L. T. Dodd, of Merton College, Oxford, who gave a very interesting account of "Ruskin Hall." The annual reports of the congregation, school, and other institutions have just been published in book form. In the course of their report the Committee "congratulate the congregation on a year marked by zealous activity and steady progress. New institutions have been formed and old ones built up; weak places have been strengthened and new opportunities embraced. The church has fully and fearlessly upheld its mission and traditions both on its negative and positive side, and it is without the slightest reservation that the Committee record their deep satisfaction with its past progress and its future prospects." During the year fourteen new members were admitted—a net gain of nine. Financially the year was most satisfactory. The total income of the church and its several institutions amounts to £680 7s. 1d., and the expenditure to £668 8s. 10½d. There is therefore a balance in hand of £11 18s. 2½d. after paying off the accumulated deficits of several past years. The Committee also refer to the establishment of a "Monthly Popular Service" for the consideration of questions of public interest. So far these services have been well attended, and addresses have been delivered by representatives of five different nationalities. Collections for various public objects have been taken, including one of £17 11s. 6d. for the Irish Distress Fund. Very encouraging reports were also given by all the various societies. "The efficiency of the Sunday-school remains unimpaired." It has 156 scholars and thirteen teachers. The Congregational Union has 114 subscribing members; the Literary and Musical Union has sixty members; the Scholars' Summer Camp was again a great success; fifty-six scholars and teachers spent a week in camp together, and other visitors, for shorter periods, brought the number up to nearly 100. The Ladies' Sewing Society, the Cricket Club, Cycling Club, Dramatic Society, Recreation Committee, &c., all report in much the same healthy and satisfactory tone.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual conversazione was held at Stockport on Saturday last. About 200 friends sat down to tea. After the committee meeting, at which it was decided to hold the picnic at Stalybridge on July 1, and the annual meeting at Glossop on Oct. 21, the chair was taken by Mr. John Barrow, the vice-president, in the absence of the president (Rev. W. Harrison) abroad on account of ill-health. The Rev. J. Morley Mills attended as delegate from the South Cheshire and District Sunday School Union, and delivered an excellent short address during the evening. An interesting programme was given by the Stockport friends, consisting of glees, action songs, and a large number of tableaux by the children, the whole passing off very well. The vote of thanks at the close was moved by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A., and seconded by the Rev. T. R. Elliott. The Rev. B. C. Constable and the Chairman, respectively, replied.

Nottingham : Christ Church.—A service for the induction of the Rev. W. Lindsay, the newly-appointed minister, was held on Monday evening, the Revs. Joseph Freeston, A. Bennett, H. Gow, H. S. Perris, and Mr. Jesse Hind, J.P., taking part. The charge was given by the Rev. J. K. Smith, of Belper.

Pendleton.—A meeting was held in the schoolroom last Saturday evening to welcome the Rev. and Mrs. Jenkin Thomas on their settlement in the district. Mr. Robertson presided, and amongst those present were the Revs. D. Agate, A. Dolphin, G. Evans, W. George, W. Holmshaw, G. Knight, C. Roper, W. R. Shanks, F. Wood, and Messrs. G. H. Leigh, C. Agate, J. Wigley, T. Robinson, J. Milner, Revs. — Clark (Bible Christian), — Pope (Congregationalist), — Glynn (Calvanistic Methodist). The Chairman said it was a rare thing at Pendleton to welcome a new minister, Mr. Thomas being only the third they had had. He thought their congregations could be increased if people and minister combinedly put more warmth into the services. Empty pews did not bring the best out of a minister. Filling the church might be mainly a minister's question, but the laymen had serious duties in connection with it. On behalf of the congregation he extended both Mr. and Mrs. Thomas a hearty welcome. Mr. Wigley offered a welcome on behalf of the Sunday-school, and hoped they would all have a prosperous and happy time together. He presented some interesting statistics concerning the district. It seemed that the church tapped two parishes having a population of 24,000, in which were two Episcopal churches and ten Nonconformist chapels. Pendleton itself had a population of 50,000 living in 11,000 houses, so that there was plenty of material to work upon; and a Sunday-school was one of the most important and influential agencies that could be put down in any population. It aimed, through its teachers, at getting possession of the mind and heart of the young. The Rev. Dendy Agate spoke on behalf of neighbouring ministers. He trusted that in trying to do the work of that church Mr. Thomas would find a kind and hearty response from the congregation; and he was sure he would find his brother ministers sympathetic and willing to help and encourage him in every possible way. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, the late minister, spoke as one well acquainted with the district, and said that the population would test to the utmost all the powers of any minister; it did not for the most part seem inclined to enter any church or chapel, being interested almost entirely in materialism and materialistic affairs. However, there was good work in abundance possible to be done, and he wished both congregation and minister every success. The Rev. Charles Roper spoke as a near neighbour; the Rev. Francis Wood as having been locum tenens for three months; and the Rev. Geo. Knight extended a welcome as President of the Manchester District Association. Mr. G. H. Leigh represented the Manchester District Sunday School Association; and the Rev. Mr. Glynn spoke on behalf of neighbouring churches of other denominations. In reply, the Rev. Jenkin Thomas said it had not been easy to part with old friends and to leave his native country, but their kind welcome had been most helpful and encouraging to him. He trusted they would look upon the Sunday services with the eyes of worshippers, coming together for the sake of spiritual edification. He hoped always to have their sympathy and encouragement and that their work might be carried on harmoniously, towards the building-up of the inward man and the fitting of themselves for a higher sphere. The proceedings were varied with recitations, songs and glees, and there was an earnestness about the meeting which augured well for the new ministry just commenced.

Sheffield : Upper Chapel.—The annual parents' tea, and distribution of funds of the Sick and Savings Society in connection with the Sunday-school, held in the Channing Hall on Wednesday, 5th inst., was the occasion of a large and successful gathering, more being present at both tea and meeting than for many years past. £131 17s. 9d. was distributed in dividends amongst the members of the Society, the total original contributions having been £140 17s. 5d. The tea was followed by a concert and entertainment, to which the children of the Guild of Good Endeavour contributed. During the evening presentations were made to Miss Smith, and Mr. Whitfield, who have recently resigned their positions in the school, where for very many years they have acted as teachers and superintendents, and further to Mr. Hy. Townsend, until lately treasurer of the above Society; the testimonials to the last-named and to Mr. Whitfield consisting of books, and that to Miss Smith of a handsome dressing-case. The whole meeting was very encouraging.

Torquay.—In his farewell sermon at Unity Hall, on "Five Years in Torquay," the Rev. Priestley Prime made a strong protest against the policy of exclusion which the clergy and other ministers had practised towards him, and urged the great need of sincerity on the part of the people in their religious profession and practice. On Friday, April 7, the members of the Free Christian Church, at a farewell meeting, presented a set of Ruskin's "Fors Clavigera" to Mr. Prime, as a token of the high esteem in which he was held.

Trowbridge.—The annual congregational meeting of Congre Chapel was held on the evening of Wednesday week, Mr. W. Walker presiding. Reports were given by Mr. E. Taylor, hon. secretary; Mr. J. Hawkins, treasurer, and Mr. J. Harper, secretary of the Benevolent Society. These gentlemen and the retiring members of the Committee were re-elected. It was mentioned that the net profit from the recent bazaar was nearly £50. A special report was given, for the trustees, by Mr. W. Walker, which was most satisfactory, and the meeting concluded by votes of thanks to the honorary officials and to the chairman.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Cromwell Tercentenary, which has been celebrated this week, has called forth no finer utterance than that of Mr. Frederic Harrison, in an article contributed to the Daily Chronicle of April 25. What we owe to the Protector in addition to the memory of one of the noblest of Englishmen, Mr. Harrison states in the following passage :—

"What permanent results did Cromwell stamp upon the history of England? In the broadest sense he gave us modern England. Not, of course, alone, but as chief leader in the English Revolution, much as Frederick made modern Prussia, as Nelson won Trafalgar, or as Wellington won Waterloo. Cromwell made modern England with the blood and sweat and heart of the flower of the English people. It is far from clear that without him the finer part of the English people would not have succumbed to the baser part, that the Stuarts would not have founded at last some such monarchy as that of the Louis in France. Those who understand the inner history of the Civil War know that, down to the battle of Marston, if not down to the New Model, the issue was far from clear—and Marston and Naseby were essentially Cromwell's triumphs. And those who understand English history know that the struggle was a long one, that it lasted for at least sixty years from the Long Parliament to the Act of Settlement, that what old Whigs call the 'Revolution' was a mere episode and after-glow of the Commonwealth. Modern England begins with the Act of Settlement: this was the direct fruit of the Civil War: and the Civil War might have ended in a Malignant Monarchy—but for Oliver Cromwell and his genius as soldier and statesman."

At a meeting of Nonconformists in the City Temple, in celebration of the Cromwell Centenary, Dr. Clifford spoke of Cromwell as a typical Free Churchman. "His main effort was to suppress 'corruption' in the individual heart, and in the life and action of society and of the State. His religion was inward and spiritual. He stood for the principles of justice and freedom. He held that the rights of the people were more important than the rights of kings and priests." In this sense, also, Dr. Horton's "Oliver Cromwell" is written, of which Messrs. James Clarke and Co. have published a shilling Tercentenary edition.

THE national memorial to the Tsar on the subject of disarmament, to which no fewer than 150,000 names were attached, was on Tuesday handed by an influential deputation to M. de Staal at the Russian Embassy, prior to his departure to attend the Conference at The Hague.

WE published to-day the greater part of Mr. Richard Robinson's paper at the Liverpool Conference of Domestic Mission Workers. It will be found complete in a reprint which is to be shortly issued. Mr. Street's paper we hope to publish next week. All the echoes of the Conference that reach us are pleasant and encouraging. The meetings were an unqualified success, and point to great usefulness for similar meetings at other centres in coming years. The President of the Liverpool Domestic Mission Society was much missed, and greatly regretted his enforced absence, but Sir John Brunner wrote to say that he had been appointed Chairman of a Private Bill Committee of the House of Commons, and was obliged to remain in town throughout the week. Another friend, whose absence was keenly felt, was the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who wrote to Mr. Lloyd Jones: "No man can honour more than I the men who are giving their lives to the great ideas and ideals of Tuckerman. May light and leading be in your Conference, and the blessing of God on all our Domestic Missions." Mr. Armstrong has been staying at Blackpool, and we are glad to have a better account of his health.

In his sermon at Renshaw-street Chapel last Sunday morning, the Rev. Dr. Klein dealt with the action of the Liverpool School Board in accepting the Evangelical Free Church Catechism as a basis for religious instruction in the schools under the Board, and strongly urged that the resolution should be rescinded. What seemed most inexplicable to him, he said, was how the members of the Board who voted for the measure could have persuaded themselves that they were introducing a truly unsectarian instrument for religious teaching. How could a catechism be called unsectarian which was satisfactory neither to Anglican Churchmen, nor to Catholics, nor to Unitarians, and which, however satisfactory to the majority of Nonconformists, was not desired by them in the Board schools, out of respect for the principle—or should he say, the compromise—upon which they ought to rest? Perhaps no unsectarian catechism is possible in practice, however conceivable in the abstract. This catechism, at any rate, was entirely inadmissible.

WHILE exclusion of Unitarians from religious fellowship is so much the order of the day, it is pleasant to note that the Todmorden Sunday School Union, comprising twenty-one schools, have this year elected a Unitarian, Mr. Thomas Graham, as their president, who at a recent quarterly meeting at the Eastwood Congregational School gave an admirable address on "Some Difficulties and Rewards of Sunday-school Workers."

THE Christian World's "May Meeting List," which extends from April 10 to July 18, includes over 300 meetings of various religious and philanthropical societies. A good many of these will be over with the present month, but most of them do fall in May. The centenary of the Church Missionary Society has already been celebrated, and on Friday of next week the centenary meeting of the Religious Tract Society is to be held. Of the £50,000 for which the Committee appealed as a commemoration fund, it is announced that £43,500 is already contributed. The Society is supported by all Evangelical denominations, in the Church and out of it, and distributes an enormous amount of literature. Since 1832 it has spent £218,000 in the distribution, free or at reduced cost, of more than 54,000 libraries of books, varying from 25 to 500 volumes, and that is only a section of its work.

THE annual meeting of the Liberation Society is to be held on Wednesday next. At the council meeting in the Memorial Hall, at 4 o'clock, Mr. H. J. Wilson, M.P., will preside. At the annual public meeting in the City Temple, at 7 o'clock, the chair is to be taken by Lord Battersea, and among the speakers announced are Dr. Guinness Rogers, Dr. Spence Watson and Messrs. Thomas Shaw, M.P., John Wilson, M.P., and Silas K. Hocking.

At the annual assembly of the Baptist Union in Bloomsbury Chapel, on Monday, the presidential address of the late Rev. James Spurgeon, who was to have occupied the chair, was read, and Dr. Clifford was subsequently elected president. It was finally decided to raise a Baptist Twentieth Century Fund of a quarter of a million.

THE Abolitionist, the first number of which was issued on the 15th of this month, is a new monthly organ of the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection. (Office of the British Union: 20, Triangle, Bristol. 2d. monthly.) In an opening article Miss Frances Power Cobbe states clearly and incisively the position of those who advocate the absolute suppression of vivisection, and have, therefore, felt obliged with her to separate from the National (Victoria-street) Society, which now aims at "lesser measures," by way of mitigating the evil. Mr. William Watson ranges himself among the abolitionists in a poem written expressly for this first number, and contributions are promised also from Mr. R. D. Blackmore and Mr. Thomas Hardy.

THE first number of the Abolitionist also contains an article by Mr. R. E. Dudgeon, M.D., on "Vivisection up to date," which has rightly received widespread attention. In this article, Dr. Dudgeon, who shares with Mr. Lawson Tait the conviction of the barren and misleading results of vivisection as a method of research, gives an account, derived from German medical journals, of a number of shameful and disgusting experiments made upon hospital patients in that country. On this has ensued a vigorous correspondence in the Liverpool Daily Post, in the course of which one anonymous correspondent, either seriously or ironically, defended such experiments as justifiable and needed for the progress of medical knowledge, and Dr. Rentoul brought out a distinction which ought not to be lost sight of. Medical knowledge and surgery are, of course, the result of a long course of experiment on patients from the earliest times, one method after another having been tried, in the hope of benefiting the sufferers, until knowledge and skill have reached their present pitch. But it is one thing to build up knowledge through the treatment of patients, always doing the best for them that is possible, and quite another to make experiments and even to induce fresh diseases for the sake of making observations and thus gaining knowledge, without any reference to the well-being of the subject of the experiment. It is against this latter course that we protest, especially when it involves the torture of sensitive and helpless animals. We would fain hope that in this country protest against such use of hospital patients is not needed.

ST. JAMES'S HALL was well filled on Wednesday evening at the demonstration of the London Anti-Vivisection Society. The chair was taken by Mr. Walter McLaren, and the two chief resolutions were moved by Mr. Lawson Tait and the Bishop of Nottingham.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—W. A.; R. B. D.; C. F. (thanks); T. H. G.; C. S. H.; M. H.; M.; T. M.; G. St. C.; F. W.; S. F. W.

THE BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE following additional reports were presented at the recent meeting of the Council:—

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

The question of the supply of religious literature for our young people was discussed at a meeting of the Council held on Feb. 1, 1898, and the matter was referred to the Executive Committee for consideration and report. The Book and Tract Committee carefully considered the matter, and also consulted the Sunday School Association, through its hon. secretary, Mr. Ion Pritchard. The Committee submit the following statement to the Council:—

There are three sources whence the supply of such books and other publications is derived—namely, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sunday School Association, and outside publishers (including the A.U.A. and other American societies). A very considerable number is derived from each of these sources, and the total, being steadily augmented by current publications each year, is amply sufficient for present needs. Almost simultaneously with the reference to the Committee, a list of books available for class-teaching in connection with religious, and especially with Unitarian doctrine, was published by the Liverpool Sunday School Society. This list, which is trustworthy, except for a few cases where books out of print are named, is copious enough to leave no room for doubt as to the abundance of literature at command. The chief need of the hour appears to be an awakening of parental responsibility, and some direct and practical help to those who are really anxious about their children's religious education, but who are at present insufficiently aware of the means at their command. A letter was prepared urging the necessity of careful instruction in religion, signed by Dr. Brooke Herford, the president, Mr. Ion Pritchard (hon. secretary of the Sunday School Association), and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant (chairman of the Book and Tract Committee). Copies of this letter were forwarded to ministers of congregations enclosing a list of suggested publications, and requesting them to call the attention of their congregation to the circular. The letter was also published in THE INQUIRER, and The Christian Life.

THE EVANGELICAL FREE CHURCH CATECHISM.

The SECRETARY also read a statement on this subject. He said:—

Immediately on the publication of the "Evangelical Free Church Catechism," the Secretary forwarded copies to members of the Committee and leading ministers in different parts of the country, and it was decided to prepare and issue an edition of 10,000 copies of a "Letter on the Evangelical Free Church Catechism," by a Unitarian Christian, and to send it to all Baptist and Congregational ministers, and to the principal newspapers, and to circulate it otherwise. The Committee also purchased a large number of copies of two excellent sermons on "The New Catechism," by the Rev. Charles Hargrove, of Leeds, which they also distributed. The "Letter," and Mr. Hargrove's discourses, judging from the correspondence and the orders received by the Book Room, were read with interest by many of the recipients.

LONDON UNITARIAN BAZAAR.—It will be remembered that when the Manchester District Association resolved to hold their grand bazaar in 1897, the friends in the Metropolis showed their practical sympathy with them in their efforts by furnishing and managing a London stall; and now this great provincial centre has decided to give substantial proof of their appreciation of the help rendered, by generously, and unanimously, passing a resolution at their annual meeting, to provide a Manchester District stall at the forthcoming London Bazaar. So that not only are the Metropolitan churches being drawn closer together by this common and united effort, but Manchester and London join hands as associates in this enterprise which seeks to advance the interests of liberal and progressive Christianity.

AN association has just been formally constituted, and named "The Ministerial Fellowship," for the promotion of ministerial fellowship in such manner as may be from time to time declared and defined by the members. Its first object is the establishment of a fund to assist in the support of members who may be temporarily without ministerial charge. The membership, which is elective, is not to extend beyond ministers whose names appear on the roll of the Provincial Assemblies of Lancashire and Cheshire, and of London and the South-Eastern Counties, and ministers of kindred churches and missionary societies in the United Kingdom. The Fellowship has been inaugurated with an original membership of seventy-seven, and the members are drawn from all parts of the country. The Rev. H. E. Dowson, B.A. (Gee Cross), is the first president, the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A. (Altrincham), treasurer; the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B. (Bolton), secretary; and the other members of Committee are the Revs. P. M. Higginson, M.A., Chas. Roper, B.A., W. H. Drummond, B.A., Joseph Harrison, T. P. Spedding, and James C. Street. A copy of the constitution and rules will be sent to any minister on application being made to the secretary.

THE annual meeting of the Essex Hall Temperance Association is announced to be held on Friday, May 26, when the Earl of Carlisle will take the chair at 7 P.M., supported by a number of leading ministers and other temperance workers. Among the speakers will be Mrs. L. Ormiston Chant.

THE seventh annual musical festival of the London Sunday-school Society, to be held at Essex Hall this (Saturday) evening, is looked forward to with great interest by many friends. There will be no competition this year, but the united choirs from ten or twelve schools, numbering about 200 singers, are to give a concert, with solos, &c., by friends. The chair is to be taken by the new president, Mr. F. Lawrence.

ARTHUR HUGH CLOUGH.—III.

It seems a strange thing to us in these days that a man of Clough's high character and attainments should be debarred from continuing the work at Oxford, for which he seemed so well fitted, because he could not conscientiously sign the Thirty-nine Articles. He has left us an account of his feeling on this matter.

My objection in limine to subscription would be, that it is a painful restraint on speculation; but beyond this, to examine myself in detail on the Thirty-nine Articles, and say how far my thoughts upon them had passed the limit of speculation and begun to assume the form of concretion, would be not only difficult and distasteful to me, but absolutely impossible. I could not do it with any approximation to accuracy; and I have no wish to be hurried into precipitate declarations which, after all, might misrepresent my mind. It is fair to say that the points in question with me would not be subordinate matters; but at the same time I feel no call to the study of theology, and for the present certainly should leave these controversies to themselves, were they not in some measure forced upon my notice. Of joining any sect I have not the most distant intention.

It is easy to understand that with such a shrinking from controversy and with no attraction to any religious society outside the Church of England, Clough must have found something uncongenial in the atmosphere of University Hall, London, where he now took up his residence as Principal. For the institution, though unsectarian, was, as a matter of fact, chiefly, if not wholly, supported by Nonconformists, and largely by Unitarians. Already, on accepting the position, he had written to one of the authorities of the Hall declining to "undertake the conduct or superintendence of any prayers." In the same letter he says:—

I have expressly testified my dislike to the Thirty-nine Articles, and you yourselves are quite as likely to attach to me such names as heretic, as I to apply that word to you. I need not, of course, say that I suppose I have on these subjects, if not convictions, sentiments; not assuredly a definite theological creed, but what would be called religious views—views which may prove very different from those commonly entertained by Unitarians.

It is interesting to compare with this some words from a letter written in Liverpool in 1845. He says he has been reading "the 'Life of Blanco White,' almost wholly from his own papers; a very striking production. . . . For me, almost it persuaded me to turn Unitarian, that is, for the moment; and even now I feel no common attraction towards the book and the party who have brought it out—namely, the high Unitarians, such as Miss Martineau's brother, a preacher here; Mr. Thom, his colleague, editor of the book, &c., and others. . . . In their particular section of the people they are, I should think, doing a great deal of good." And in December, 1848, in a letter to his sister, he shows that he still has no desire for any religious communion outside the Church of England. "So long as one isn't obliged to sign articles, or go to daily service, or prayer-meeting, or the like, I don't see why one should excommunicate oneself. As for the Unitarians, they're better than the other Dissenters, and that's all; but to go to their chapels—no!"

Clough remained at University Hall rather more than two years, and although he made some new friends, one of whom was Carlyle, this time was, we are told, "the dreariest, loneliest period of his life, and he became compressed and reserved to a degree quite unusual with him, both before and afterwards. He shut himself up and went through his life in silence." It was during this period, in the vacation of 1850, that he paid a visit to Venice and there began to write his third long poem, "Dipsychus." The name, we may presume, was suggested by those words in the Epistle of St. James, "a double-minded man (ἀνὴρ διψυχος), unstable in all his ways." And it is, indeed, a picture of a double-minded man put into a dramatic form. The dramatis personæ are but two—Dipsychus and "the Spirit," his alter ego, the plausible tempting voice of worldliness which, though it seems to be at his side, is really a voice from his own heart. Dipsychus himself makes many pretty speeches and some beautiful and wise ones, while the worldly wisdom of the "spirit" is couched in plenty of grim humour. Indeed, it is remarkable that this, the gravest of Clough's long poems, is by far the most humorous. The scene is always in Venice, now in the piazza, now on the lagoon, now at the Lido. But it cannot be said that the poem is full of the atmosphere of Venice as the "Amours de Voyage" is of that of Rome. The scene is spoilt by the gloom and trouble in the mind of the spectator. It is Venice seen by a sick eye. But we must except the lovely verses in which over and over again, in the same cadence and with a similar refrain, he describes the motion of the gondola. Here is one specimen:—

"How light we go, how soft we skim!
And all in moonlight seem to swim;
Against bright clouds projected dark,
The white dome now, reclined I mark,
And, by o'er-brilliant lamps displayed,
The Doge's columns and arcade;
Over still waters mildly come
The distant waters and the hum.
(How light we go, how softly! Ah, Life should be as the gondola!)"

For an example of the excellent wisdom which we not infrequently hear from the lips of Dipsychus, I may quote the following, though it is well known:—

"Where are the great, whom thou would'st wish to praise thee?
Where are the pure, whom thou would'st choose to love thee?
Where are the brave, to stand supreme above thee,
Whose high commands would cheer, whose chidings raise thee?
Seek, seeker, in thyself; submit to find
In the stones, bread, and life in the blank mind."

If he could only have been true to this better self! But he is the "double-minded man, unstable in all his ways." As he himself says in another place:—

"To thine own self be true, the wise man says.
Are then my fears myself? O double self!
And I untrue to both?"

Let me dismiss the poem with a specimen of the very different wisdom of "the Spirit." Dipsychus is asking what he must do if he consents to be guided by this persistent companion.

"Di. What should I do? What should I cease to do?
What incense on what altars must I burn?"

And what abandon? What un-learn, or learn?
Religion goes, I take it.

Sp. Oh,
You'll go to church of course,
you know;
Or at the least will take a pew
To send your wife and servants to.
Trust me, I make a point of that;
No infidelity, that's flat."

In October, 1852, Clough, who had given up his position at University Hall some months before, sailed for America. He hoped to find there opportunities of teaching and literary work, and Emerson had encouraged him to make the experiment. He was fortunate in having Thackeray and Lowell for fellow-passengers. A group of lovely short poems, called "Songs in Absence," belong either to this voyage or to the time he spent in America. The sea inspired him. Here is a characteristic picture of human life under the image of a ship upon the wide ocean. It begins with the first line of one of Wordsworth's sonnets slightly altered:—

"Where lies the land to which the ship
would go?"

Far, far ahead, is all her seamen know.

And where the land she travels from?
Away,

Far, far behind, is all that they can say.

On sunny noons upon the deck's smooth face,

Linked arm in arm, how pleasant here to pace;

Or, o'er the stern reclining, watch below

The foaming wake far widening as we go.

On stormy nights when wild northwesters rave,

How proud a thing to fight with wind and wave!

The dripping sailor on the reeling mast

Exults to bear, and scorns to wish it past.

Where lies the land to which the ship
would go?

Far, far ahead, is all her seamen
know.

And where the land she travels from?
Away,

Far, far behind, is all that they can say.

Clough had a warm welcome in America, and soon found himself in very congenial society—Emerson, Longfellow, Lowell, Hawthorne, C. E. Norton, and others. He settled at Cambridge, and soon began to get pupils and also work for his pen. On Nov. 24 he writes:—"Here I am settled at Cambridge in my own apartments, with all my books about me. . . . To-morrow, which is Thanksgiving Day, the old Puritan substitute for Christmas Day, I have promised to go to church with the Nortons. The Congregationalists, Baptists, and Unitarians all unite for the day, in the Unitarian building." He seems to have had little sympathy with the "orthodox Unitarianism" (so he calls it) which reigned in Boston at that time. He was especially indignant at the attitude assumed by many towards Theodore Parker. "I sometimes, when I have heard people here talk of Theodore Parker, as if he were the scum of the earth, think that it will not do to keep silence. I have no particular love for Theodore Parker; but he is so manifestly more right than the people who despise him, I cannot, I think, in right altogether remain silent and acquiesce. It looked to me as if orthodoxy (of the Unitarian kind) was as bad for me as any realer orthodoxy elsewhere."

America was not to become Clough's permanent home. After about nine months spent there he accepted the offer of an examinership in the Education Office, and returned to England in July, 1853, and in the following year he married. Some happy and peaceful years followed. But the fount of poetry which had before flowed so freely seemed for the time to be dried up. In 1859 his health began to fail and gradually grew worse. In the spring of 1861 he tried what a voyage to Greece and Constantinople would do, and after a few weeks spent at home he started abroad again in the summer of the same year for Auvergne and the Pyrenees. It was during these journeys that he wrote his last long poem, "Mari Magno, or Tales on Board." It is a series of short stories supposed to be told on board ship in the course of a voyage to America. Their ease and lightness make Clough rank high as a story-teller. But even here there is the earnest serious note which is never long absent from any of his writings. These journeys, alas! did not work that improvement in his health which had been hoped. In September he started from Paris with his wife for Switzerland and Italy, and in Florence he died on Nov. 13. He was not quite forty-three.

If we ask wherein lies the peculiar charm which has made, and which still makes, Clough's poetry so helpful and so consoling, I think we may best answer that it is his faith. It may seem strange to make this claim for one who remained to the end so sceptical towards much which others regard as essential. But what is it that breathes throughout such a poem as "The New Sinai"? Not in denial, still less in the worship of the golden calf—"that priestly creed"—is the better part which the manly heart should take who awaits the prophet hidden in the cloud which covers the mount of God.

"The clouded hill attend thou still,
And him that went within.
He yet shall bring some worthy thing
For waiting souls to see:
Some sacred word that he hath heard
Their light and life shall be;
Some lofty part, than which the heart
Adopt no nobler can,
Thou shalt receive, thou shalt believe,
And thou shalt do, O Man!"

The faith that can afford to wait, because its witness is within, that is a faith which is precious to mankind. We admire its reticence and its self-reverence even more than its expression.

"In controversial foul impureness
The peace that is thy light to thee
Quench not: in faith and inner sureness Possess thy soul and let it be."

Even in deep darkness it clings to Him who "dwells not in the light alone"—
"with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning."

"It fortifies my soul to know
That, though I perish, Truth is so:

That, howsoever I stray and range,
Whate'er I do, Thou dost not change.
I steadier step when I recall
That, if I slip, Thou dost not fall."

MORAL FREEDOM AND FORE-KNOWLEDGE.

SIR,—In his kindly-worded reply to my letter Mr. Upton omits to notice, at least directly, the words in which I intended to summarise my criticism of his position. They ran: "I submit that human freedom and divine prescience do not combine into a self-evident absurdity, as do divine omniscience and divine ignorance. In the latter case we are able to perceive that there is no possible reconciliation of the two ideas; in the former we are simply unable to conceive the nature or process of the reconciliation." It is plain that Mr. Upton does not concede both these propositions, but I am somewhat doubtful which he calls in question.

The phrases "intrinsically inconceivable and impossible," "essentially impossible," and again "essentially impossible and irrational," applied to God's foresight of the issue of a really free moral choice, would seem to imply that Mr. Upton regards that combination of ideas as an absurdity, a contradiction in terms, were it not that he adds to each a modifying clause, such as "in the light of human reason." I cannot be sure whether his position is that we cannot allow this combination without denying the validity of our mental processes, or only that our mental processes will not avail to discover the nature of the divine power it implies. If the former, one may ask for proof, since a self-evident absurdity may always be exposed. If the latter, I fully concede this minor premiss. Negatur major. I submit that we have no reason to believe that our temporal powers of comprehension are the measure of what is possible with God.

In what sense, again, is Mr. Upton justified in asserting that the "dogma that God's thought and life exist out of relation of Time" is "wholly unintelligible and inconceivable"? Only in the sense, surely, in which colour is wholly unintelligible and inconceivable to a man born blind. Yet he can conceive the existence of what to him is wholly unintelligible, and just so far, perhaps with equal justice, we may go. We can conceive that though we are bound by time and space God is not so bound.

The starting point of this inquiry was Professor Ritchie's position that a god who is ignorant of any portion of the future is not God. I do not agree with his inference that human moral choice is an illusion; for I believe that God's omniscience and our freedom of choice in temptation can be reconciled, though not in terms of human comprehension. But the position itself still seems to me sound. To say that God's ignorance is imposed by Him upon Himself is not to deny, but to admit his ignorance, that is, His inability to know; and surely "omnipotence" and "inability" are contradictory terms. It was for Mr. Upton's answer to this point that I looked most eagerly; upon this point, however, his letter did not touch. E. W. LUMMIS.

THE DESPAIR OF JUDAS.

SIR,—It is said that certain Gnostics of the second century honoured Judas as the one apostle gifted with the true knowledge, that they regarded the traitor as the emancipator of Jesus from the burden of the flesh, and even produced a gospel bearing his name. It seems now to be a mark of some who profess high attainments in spiritual knowledge to assert that Judas "remains for ever the first in the line of the Christian martyrs" (INQUIRER, p. 233). But what is this but the glorification of suicide? T. C. ROBINSON.

[We did not understand Mr. Harris so. There is no defence of the desperate act of Judas, but an insistence that his repentance, though it drove him to despair, was yet the first witness (and so made him the first martyr) to the constraining power of Christ's love. But, perhaps, Mr. Harris will answer for himself.—ED. INQ.]

EMERSON AND THEISM.

SIR,—Whether this Emerson be 'a Pantheist,' or what kind of Theist or ist he may be, can, perhaps, as well remain undecided." So wrote Carlyle in 1841, when he introduced Emerson's first series of Essays to British readers. Mr. Binns, it would seem, thinks otherwise, for in his interesting discourse on "Emerson," printed in last week's INQUIRER, he tells us that "Emerson was a Theist with very Pantheistic leanings." This he does with such confidence that his hearers were likely to suppose he was stating an established fact, and to go away with the impression that, in religious ideas, Emerson, Theodore Parker, Francis Newman, Miss Cobbe, and Mr. Charles Voysey belong to one and the same group.

In truth, however, Emerson's ideas have more in common with Herbert Spencer and his school than with the professing and recognised Theists I have named. Emerson, not less than Spencer, is an apostle of ethical—as distinguished from theistic—religion; but while Spencer's standpoint is that of the man of science, Emerson's is that of the poet. This ethical religion has no such deity as that proclaimed by the expounders of Theism. Newman declares that "God is a person" and, following him, Miss Cobbe, in Broken Lights, testifies:—"Our belief in the Personality of God is, in a peculiar manner, allied to the moral side of Religion. In proportion as that moral side is developed in us, so we may almost say is the clearness of our conviction that it is indeed a living God who rules the world and no mere Creative Intelligence. Now, this moral side comes out only in its full luminousness in Prayer. Prayer is, in its essence, the approach of the finite and fallible moral agent to its infinite Moral Lord to whom it is conscious of owing allegiance and to whom it comes for forgiveness and strength. In such prayer . . . we feel, as at no other time, the existence of a Moral Being over us and aiding us. Such a Moral Being can only be known as a Person." (First edition, pp. 178-9.) No similar statement can be found anywhere in Emerson's writings. There is much mention of "God," but no suggestion that "God" is "a Person." What Emerson means by "God" is signified in many places, but notably in the essay called the The Over-soul, alluded to by Mr. Binns, which essay assuredly could not have been written by a "Theist," whether with or without "Pantheistic leanings." "Man," writes Emerson, "is a stream whose source is hidden. Always our being is descending into us from we know not whence." Again: "The Supreme Critic on all the errors of the past and present, and the only prophet of that which must be, is that great nature in which we rest, as the earth lies in the soft arms of the atmosphere; that Unity, that Oversoul within which every man's particular being is contained and made one with all other; that common heart, of which all sincere conversation is the worship, to which all right action is submission; that overpowering reality which confutes our tricks and talents, and constrains every one to pass for what he is, and to speak from his character, and not from his tongue, and which evermore tends and aims to pass into our thought and hand, and become wisdom, and virtue, and power, and beauty." And again: "In all conversation between two persons, tacit reference is made to a third party, to a common nature. That third party or common nature is not social; it is impersonal, is God." Here, possibly, are "very Pantheistic leanings," but surely nothing which, without violence to language, can be described as "Theism." Nowhere in Emerson's writings is there any recognition even of that "fatherhood" and "motherhood" of God on which Theodore Parker laid such stress. The God of Emerson has nothing in common with the "Person" of Newman and Miss Cobbe's worship. It suggests rather the "Unknownable" of Spencer, or if that term be, as Matthew Arnold thought, objectionable because "merely negative," then Arnold's own substitute—"the Eternal Power, not ourselves that makes for Righteousness," or his completer "Eternal Power, not ourselves, by which all things fulfil the law of their being." As to prayer which, as we have seen, is glorified by Miss Cobbe as the link between the personal God and man, it is dismissed by Emerson as "a disease of will," inimical to self-reliance.

What label should be substituted for this inappropriate one of "Theist," I shall not attempt to suggest, for I agree with Carlyle that "ists and isms are rather growing a weariness." Possibly we might manage without any label; but, at any rate, careless mis-classification is so likely to mislead that it should be avoided.

WALTER LEWIN.

Bebington (Cheshire), April 9.

[Mr. Lewin's letter has been delayed by the great pressure on our space. The delay has, however, had this advantage, that it has enabled us to add at the same time the following letters in response from Mr. Binns and Professor Upton.—ED. INQ.]

SIR,—Emerson's religion is a large subject. I cannot deal with it in the absolute fashion which Mr. Walter Lewin adopts. What I said about it in my sermon was somewhat like this:—"It is difficult to define completely Emerson's exact religious whereabouts. If we want to give him a name, we may call him a Theist with very Pantheistic leanings, or a Pantheist with very Theistic leanings. But the best name is suggestive rather than exhaustive." In the newspaper report which you copied this was condensed.

I am aware that Theism and Pantheism are not easy to reconcile. But the two often do co-exist in the same man, especially when the man is a poet and has imaginative and emotional, as well as intellectual, moods. Emerson wrote for many years on many subjects. Perhaps he was not always consistent with himself—who is? I do not remember any great man who has been willing to express his aspirations in the same words or with the same precise meaning all through his life. As for Emerson, his philosophical and religious thoughts are a Joseph's coat of many colours. But I do not care to judge the whole coat by one bit of colour. I like to take the colours all together. You may quote Emerson any way, as you may the Bible and Shakespeare. Mr. Walter Lewin tells us that writing one thing makes writing another thing impossible. I am not so sure about these impossibilities in the mental world. All depends on who the writer is. One man is not the measure of every man.

WILLIAM BINNS.

SIR,—Mr. Lewin's thoughtful letter deals with an important question; for it is evident that Emerson's writings have exerted, and are exerting, a powerful influence on the religious thought of our time—and especially on the religious thought of American Unitarians. Good on the whole as this influence assuredly is, I question whether it is an entirely unmixed good. The wholly inadequate emphasis, for instance, which is laid by some of the leading Unitarians of America, on sin and on man's possession of free-will, appears to me to be in part owing to Emerson's teaching, though no doubt the seeds of German idealism early found a congenial soil in America and had much to do with the fashioning of Emerson's own thought.

The answer to the question, Was Emerson a Theist? appears to me to involve the answers to two previous questions. Firstly, does Emerson regard God as a self-conscious and self-existent Personality; and, secondly, does he consider the individual soul to be a mere transient mode or phase of God's eternal life; or, on the other hand, does he hold that God has delegated to man some original causality, some true freedom of moral choice?

In trying to justly estimate Emerson's theological position, we must remember that he writes differently in different moods; and that "the foolish consistency" which, as he truly says, "is the hobgoblin of little minds," certainly exercised no cramping influence on his own thought. Turning now to the first of the above questions, I should be inclined to answer it affirmatively. It is true that Emerson sometimes speaks of the Over-soul as impersonal, but it would seem from the context that he means by this expression no more than that the Eternal cannot be regarded as "a person" in the limited sense in which we are persons, seeing that we are finite beings with an origin in time, while He is infinite and self-existent. Emerson would probably not have dissented much from Lotze's position that perfect personality is found in God alone, for he often speaks of God as the "Supreme Spirit" and the "Divine Mind"; and in one of his later essays, that on "The Sovereignty of Ethics," he says: "When we ask simply, What is true in thought? What is just in action? it is the yielding of the private heart to the Divine Mind." So far, then, as concerns the personality of God, I should maintain that Emerson was a Theist, though a Theist of the extremely mystic type, who held that the saintly soul knows God in virtue of his actually sharing in a measure the very life of God. And here I cannot follow Lewin in recognising any close affinity between Emerson's mysticism and Mr. Spencer's agnosticism.

To turn now to the second of the above questions; I feel compelled to conclude that here the conditions of a true Theism are conspicuously lacking in Emerson's writings, and that so far as this aspect of his teaching is concerned, he must be classed with the Hegelians as essentially pantheistic. From the point of view of the Conscience, he tells us, man seems to possess true freedom of moral choice; but from the point of view of the Intellect, man's conduct, like every other change, is the outcome of a divine necessity. Here, it seems to me, he makes a wholly baseless antithesis between intellectual insight and moral insight. "Saints," he says, "are sad, because they behold Sin (even when they speculate) from the point of view of the Conscience, and not of the Intellect: a confusion of thought. . . . The Intellect names Sin shade, absence of light, and no essence. The Conscience must feel it as essence, essential evil. This it is not, it has an objective existence, but no subjective." To the genuine Theist, I take it, conscious Sin means temporary alienation from what God loves and what God wills, and therefore in the view both of his Conscience and of his Reason, it appears to him "essential evil." No true Theist can regard courses of wilful sinfulness as analogous with processes of physical evolution and say, as Emerson does—"The carrion in the sun will convert itself to grass and flowers; and man, though in brothels, or jails, or gibbets, is on his way to all that is good and true." Nor is it at all consistent with theistic ideas to say of the souls of men:—

"We are but floating foambells upon Thought's causing stream, That take their shape and sun-colour from Him who sends the dream."

All this smacks strongly of Hegelian Pantheism; and so I must contend that while one side of Emerson's teaching is theistic and highly inspiring, there is another side to it which is distinctly non-theistic and wholly at variance with the deepest deliverances of our moral and spiritual consciousness.

COUNTRY AIR FOR WEAK AND AILING CHILDREN.

SIR,—May I venture to again appeal for subscriptions towards the Children's Country Holiday Movement. The work is one which increases in importance, for health of mind and body is essential, and yet hundreds of our City children are, by their surroundings, prevented from drawing the natural breath of country life.

As the work increases, however, the difficulties in connection with it grow greater. But by keeping in touch with the General Country Holiday Fund, we hope to be guided by them as regards principles, while at the same time to reap the advantages which accrue to a smaller and less general institution.

I beg to acknowledge subscriptions already received—

WE are glad to be assured that for Dr. Martineau his birthday passed as a day of quiet happiness, and that he even survived the shocking portraits which appeared in daily papers both in London and Liverpool.

The Daily Chronicle of last Saturday, together with a portrait which we will not further characterise, published an "appreciation," by "a former student," which contained the following interesting passages:—

"Writing to me once on the subject of distinctive religious teaching, he urged that such work should be undertaken by the wisest and the best; but, he concludes:—'Dogmatic differences are so attractive to both the Pharisee and the Sadducee that the one or the other is apt to snatch this department of teaching from the modest and devout, and to infuse into it a tincture either of arrogance or of scepticism.'

"When Mr. Gladstone's brilliant letter on the recognition of Anglican Orders was published in May, 1896, I wrote to Dr. Martineau suggesting that he should give his opinion on the controversy. There can be no harm now in quoting his reply, and in view of current controversies it is exceedingly interesting. He wrote:—

'After showing the near parallelism of the Anglican and Roman Church lines, Mr. Gladstone must be credited with a far-sighted benevolence in his joyful contemplation of their meeting. I can the less sympathise with him from the assurance I feel that they would no sooner meet than they would cross and part, the unity being momentary. I can feel no interest in these puerile discussions about 'Orders,' in which there is really nothing to review but whole regiments of fictions. They look foolish enough when marshalled on parade, and find their deserts soonest by mere self-exposure. At all events it afflicts me to come across good and great men, to whose inner life and thought I am entirely unable to address myself.'

And the writer concludes his "appreciation" as follows:—

"The once erect form is now bent with age, the fine head of dark hair is grey and white, the splendid memory is no longer clear and keen as in days of yore, but the lines of deep thought are still visible on his noble brow, the winsome smile is still there; and though the eyes have lost something of their wondrous lustre, the spirit within is bright and trustful as ever. On a previous birthday in one of his affectionate notes, written in response to a greeting from the Committee of the Unitarian Association, he said:—'In taking leave of the scenes so long familiar, it is a privilege and a joy to see its work well lodged in faithful hands.' These words were written two years ago. Dr. Martineau is happily with us still, revered and loved, not only by his little band of disciples and students, but by all who respect and honour a great and worthy life spent in the pursuit of truth and righteousness."

The following address was adopted at a meeting on Wednesday week of the Liverpool Conference of Domestic Mission Workers, on the motion of the Rev. Dr. Klein, seconded by Alderman W. B. Bowring:—

"Liverpool, April 19, 1899:

"To the Rev. James Martineau, LL.D., S.T.D., D.D., D.C.L.

"Dear Reverend Doctor,—Before bringing to a close this Liverpool Conference of Domestic Missions, the delegates and visitors from the Missions connected with our Free Churches, in various parts of England, the Committees of the Liverpool Domestic Mission and of the North End Domestic Mission, and the many friends who have come to attend the meetings of this Conference wish to join in a most affectionate and respectful greeting to you on the occasion of your approaching birthday.

"All of them, assembled here to-day in the spirit which, sixty-three years ago, prompted the foundation of the Liverpool Domestic Mission, gratefully remember the active part you then took in the establishment of that work on behalf of the poor of this city, while the circumstance of your ninety-fifth birthday reminds them of the fact that you alone remain amongst us of the noble band of benefactors and workers who initiated this movement in Liverpool in 1836.

"They wish to associate your honoured name with the present effort to maintain and to increase still further the usefulness of those centres of moral and religious culture, and to make them thoroughly efficient in the practical application of the high Christian principles which have been for so long, they rejoice to think, the burden of your teaching and the inspiration of your life.

"It is their earnest prayer to-day that you may yet long be spared to the love of so many who, by your help, have found peace and renewed spiritual strength in a purer conception of the worship of God and of the service of man; they crave the Divine blessing upon the glorious sunset of a life spent in training the eyes of men, in this generation, to watch for the rising dawn.

"Signed on behalf of the meeting,

"CHARLES W. JONES, Chairman."

LAST week we collected the commemorative verses written in former years by Mr. Thomas Hornblower Gill. We now have pleasure in adding the following lines, his tribute for the present year:—

April 21, 1899.

"Revering Youtho'er gifted Eld oft glows, Warm tributes of admiring verse bestows:

Not often aged luminaries stir
To glowing verse an aged homager.
Here Eld on utmost Eld expends its store,
And eighty homage yields to ninety-four."

OBITUARY.

MISS MILNE.

THE congregation of the Kettering-road Church, Northampton, has sustained a grievous loss in the death of Miss Milne, the sister of Lady Manfield, who passed away on Saturday last, at Redlands, Cliftonville, the residence of Sir Philip Manfield. The daughter of Mr. James Milne, of Northampton, formerly County Surveyor of Northamptonshire, Miss Milne had been for over forty years a member of her brother-in-law's household, and was closely identified with the interests and work of the congregation now worshipping in the new Kettering-road Church. For many years she was an earnest worker in the schools, and was held in honour and affectionate regard by all who knew her many acts of quiet and unassuming beneficence. Those who were privileged to come within the circle of the home she shared, know how rich her life was in the truest grace of lowly discipleship. They will best understand the sorrow her departure must leave behind, but also the blessedness of that silent benediction, which is more than all the sorrows of our mortality.

The Merciful Knight.

For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive you your trespasses.—Matt. vi. 14-15.

THERE is not a boy or girl who will read this page who is unable to repeat the wonderful prayer which Jesus gave to his disciples. All of you are familiar with the petition in the prayer, "Forgive us our sins—or trespasses—as we also forgive those who are indebted to us." And some of you have wondered, perhaps, why Jesus laid so much stress on this, as though he would teach that God's forgiveness of us is dependent on our forgiveness of our brother.

I am going, in a moment, to tell you a story which may perhaps help you to understand the reason. But first let me try to describe to you a picture. The picture is by a great English artist, only recently dead, Sir Edward Burne-Jones. In the collection of Sir Edward Burne-Jones' pictures, exhibited a little time ago in London, there was one, somewhat smaller than the others, which was called "The Merciful Knight." This picture represented a knight in armour. The knight had taken off his helmet and laid aside his sword; and at the moment represented in the picture he was kneeling before a crucifix—a cross, that is, on which is the figure of Christ. But—and here is the marvel of the picture—the figure, instead of being fixed, upright, to the cross, is bending forward and embracing the knight. What does the picture mean?

The picture is intended to illustrate my story. Some hundreds of years ago there lived in the beautiful city of Florence a young man whose name was Giovanni Gualberto. He belonged to a noble house, and he and his people were rich. This Giovanni—or John Gualberto, as we should call him—had a brother younger than himself, whose name was Hugo. For this brother Giovanni had a singular affection. He loved him as Jonathan loved David. Now, pleasant as it was to live in Florence in those distant days, the pleasantness was often sadly spoiled by deadly quarrels, and as the result of one of these quarrels Giovanni's brother was murdered by some gentleman of Florence. Giovanni naturally was filled with passion and rage; and his passion and vindictive fury were the more aroused, when he saw the grief and misery of his aged parents. He would follow his brother's murderer till he found him, and then, without mercy, he would slay him on the spot. So day after day Giovanni went forth, always hoping to meet his enemy.

There is on a hill overlooking the city of Florence a famous and most beautiful church, the name of which is San Miniato. Leading up to this church is a zigzag path, which you may see to this day. Up this path Giovanni, early one morning—and the morning was no other than the morning of Good Friday—was making his way to the church. Behind him were some of his friends. Half way up, at the turn of the path, whom should he meet but the murderer of his brother, the very man he had been seeking; and the man was unarmed and alone. In an instant

Giovanni drew his sword, intending to slay him. But before he had time to carry out his intention, the man fell upon his knees and began to plead for mercy. Then he stretched out his arms so as to make his body like a cross, and reminding Giovanni what day it was, he entreated him to remember him who died upon that day, and who as he was dying, with almost his last breath exclaimed, as he thought upon his foes, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." "For the love of Christ," he said, "spare me, spare me, Giovanni." Giovanni trembled with excitement. It was hard, very hard to let go his foe, the man who had done him so great a wrong; but the appeal he had made, and the thought of Jesus dying that very day upon the Cross, and as he died forgiving the men who had brought him to it, were more than Giovanni was able to resist. His sword dropped at his side, and stretching forth his hand he lifted the poor frightened man from the ground, and embracing him, gave him the kiss of peace. The rescued man went his way into the city, and Giovanni continued his journey to the church. Entering the church he walked up to the altar, and there before the great crucifix above the altar he went down upon his knees. As he kneeled, his heart full of exciting and conflicting thoughts, he saw—or thought he saw—exactly as we saw in the picture, the compassionate figure of the crucified bending from the Cross and stooping to embrace him. His heart, at the sight, was filled with great peace and joy. He understood, as he had never understood before, what Jesus meant when he said, "If ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you." Never before had he been so happy, and never before had he seen and felt so much of the love of God.

From that day Giovanni was a changed man. Not only did he put away all thought of hatred and revenge, but he resolved to give up all other evil ways and to live as a true and holy man. He would devote himself to what men in those days used to call a "Religious Life."

Accordingly, quitting Florence, he betook himself to the hills above the wide Arno Valley, and there among a range of mountain tops, as high as our own Helvellyn, he began at first, in a very humble way, to found a Brotherhood. Little by little the Brotherhood and their buildings grew, until at length they became the famous Monastery of Vallombrosa, and there for hundreds of years the brothers of the Order worshipped God and fed the poor. In a single year, at times, they would give away as many as a hundred thousand loaves.

In addition to this, the monks of Giovanni's Monastery planted the hills with trees. Forty thousand beeches they are said to have planted on the mountain sides around their home. These were the woods which centuries after were visited by our own great countryman, John Milton, in allusion to which he wrote the musical and often quoted lines regarding Satan and his fallen hosts:—

His legions—Angel forms—who lay entranced
Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks
In Vallombrosa, where the Etrurian shades
High overarched embower,

Now I think you will begin to feel why it was that Jesus laid such stress on our forgiveness of those whom we think have done us wrong; and why he taught us to say, "Forgive us our sins, as we forgive those that sin against us."

Only by forgiving others can we come to understand the mercy and forgiveness of God; only by forgiving others can we attain to peace and joy; and only by forgiving others, and putting away from our hearts all hatreds and ill-will can we become fitted—like the Merciful Knight—to do our best work for God and man.

We do pray for Mercy,
And that same prayer should teach us all to render
The deeds of Mercy.

Therefore, boys and girls, if you have any spite, any grudge, any ill-will against any of your companions at home or at school, put it out of your hearts, that so you may come to know the patient and forgiving love of Him who is the Father of us all.

JOHN BYLES.

THE INWARD LIFE.

LET man, then, learn the revelation of all nature and all thought to his heart; this, namely, that the Highest dwells with him; that the sources of nature are in his own mind, if the sentiment of duty is there. But if he would know what the Great God speaketh, he must go into his closet, and shut "the door," as Jesus said. God will not make Himself manifest to cowards. He must greatly listen to himself, withdrawing himself from all the accents of other men's devotion. Even their prayers are hurtful to him, until he have made his own. Our religion vulgarly stands on numbers of believers. Whenever the appeal is made—no matter how indirectly—to numbers, proclamation is then and there made, that religion is not. He that finds God a sweet, enveloping thought to him never counts his company. When I sit in that presence, who shall dare to come in? When I rest in perfect humility, when I burn with pure love, what can Calvin or Swedenborg say?—Emerson, "The Over-Soul."

God builds His temple in the heart on the ruin of churches and religions.

The whole state of man is a state of culture; and its flowering and completion may be described as Religion, or Worship.

The superiority that has no superior; the redeemer and instructor of souls, as it is their primal essence, is love.

Fear God, and where you go, men shall think they walk in hallowed cathedrals.—From Emerson's "Worship."

MINISTRY TO THE POOR.

THE large amount of space we gave last week to the report of the Liverpool Conference of Domestic Mission Workers must be taken as a measure of our sense of the great importance of the occasion and of the interests affected by the questions discussed, as vital to the welfare of our religious community.

The work of Domestic Missions is, in our view, the very noblest in which anyone can engage, and the men who devote their lives to it are to be held in the highest honour in the ranks of the ministry. They go down into the depths, and are brought into close contact with the worst evils of our social state. And they go simply in the spirit of CHRIST, as brothers to those whose need is greatest, who sin and suffer and are sinned against. They go with a whole-hearted sympathy to share the lot of those hapless ones, to see how far the power of love and righteousness and truth can avail amid such conditions of degradation and overmastering adverse circumstance. They go to see with their own eyes and to handle with their hands the things which modern civilisation has made in the midst of the wealthiest of nations, to carry a message of new hope and genuine brotherhood to the suffering and neglected, and to discover and declare to those who have the power to help what must be done to remedy these crying evils.

The duty is, of course, laid on all the churches, for they are all pledged to the service of the Kingdom of God, and declare CHRIST's message of brotherly love; and, indeed, no faithful minister is altogether without some close personal and helpful intercourse with the very poor, and no church worthy of the name it bears neglects on its own part, as the opportunity arises or is made, such efforts of sympathetic ministry. At the same time it has to be acknowledged that, in these days of separation in the social conditions of life and in the stages of intellectual and spiritual development, some churches inevitably minister more completely to the needs of the educated classes, while for the very poor in the crowded quarters of great cities special religious agencies have to be provided.

Thus the Domestic missionary holds the post of danger and of honour. He is the representative of Christianity in the field of some of its worst apparent failures. He is charged with the duty of redeeming, so far as it is possible, that lamentable defeat; he is not only to minister to the present needs of the poor, to bring new elements of healthier life into their lot, and a new quickening of inward energy and worthier aspiration into their hearts, but he has also to rouse the conscience of those who have deputed him to that service to the new claims of duty which the revelations of his life among the poor press upon them.

His work is the work of all the churches; he takes the place of others where they cannot go, and is the messenger of their faith and the steward of their goodwill. There is no test of the vitality of religion in any church more sure than this, which is found in the measure of support given to such missions to the poor.

The first duty of the churches is to send capable and faithful men into the field. It is an unworthy thought that for such work the men most poorly equipped and poorly paid will do. What body of Christian disciples with such a thought in their heart and such practice in their past record would dare to look into the face of Jesus and tell him what they thought and what they had done? This work must be sustained with all the generosity and abundant sympathy the wealthier churches can command; and we are happy to know how largely that is the case in our own community.

But it is not only in the material equipment of such missions and in the support given to the ministers devoted to this service, that the faith of the churches is tested. They have to furnish also fellow-workers with the missionaries in the manifold activities which now gather about a personal ministry to the poor. And no one could have been present at the Liverpool Conference without feeling that in our churches there is no indifference to this call. Yet we would plead for more helpers. There is not one of our missions that does not need to be strengthened and that will not furnish abundant opportunities for fresh demonstrations of faith and goodwill among our people.

And as to larger measures of social amelioration we would earnestly commend the papers read at the Liverpool Conference to the attention of our readers.

BY RICHARD ROBINSON.

IT has been abundantly testified in the course of this Conference that by far the most important work of the Domestic Missionary is the religious influence which he exercises, and the chief aims and objects of Domestic Missions these spiritual and moral efforts which have been so ably put before us. No one, however, who is at all cognisant of the working of these institutions but must feel that the question of the material condition of the class of people among whom they are established is a problem of vital importance, and of constant daily and hourly recurrence.

That this would be so was plainly seen by those who founded these Missions; and though, for my part, the needs of to-day would be quite sufficient authority for dealing with this question, yet it is helpful and encouraging to find that the prophetic gaze of those to whose spiritual genius we owe these Missions to the poor, included in its purview the social and bodily needs which to-day we feel to be so urgent and so notorious. Dr. Channing, in his charge at the ordination of two ministers of the poor at Boston, said:—

Can it be necessary that multitudes of human beings should writhe under want and hardships which palsy and almost extinguish their spiritual and moral power?

A louder and louder cry is beginning to break forth through the civilised world for a social reform, which shall reach the most depressed ranks of the community. I see, and rejoice to see, in your office, my friends, a sign of this new movement, an earnest of this grand and holy revolution.

And in the Prospectus issued in 1836, which formed the basis of the Society which established this Mission, it is expressly included among its objects and aims that "The minister of the poor will possess the fullest opportunities of becoming acquainted with the economic condition of the families he visits," &c.

It is needless to labour this point. We have learnt to feel that religion, the attitude of our minds towards God, is not concerned with any particular portion of time or space, nor with any special class of subjects, but should permeate and inform the whole of life and the manner in which we approach every subject which comes before us; and indeed if we are to discriminate, as is hinted in my last quotation, to feed the hungry, to attempt to heal the sick, to enable these crippled and paralysed in life's journey to recover somewhat of sound and healthy existence may take place as a religious duty by the side even of the most punctual and earnest thanksgiving and prayer.

The subject of the Conference this morning is the relation of the Mission with Charity Organisation Societies in various towns. I am thankful to say that we know this society in Liverpool by an infinitely preferable name—namely, the Central Relief Society. As later on I may have a few criticisms to quote and to make upon some details of the working of this Society, let me say at once that I hold the work which this Society has done for so many years in Liverpool in the greatest respect and admiration. Hard as is the lot of so many thousands of our fellow-citizens, it would have been immensely harder if it had not been for the kindly aid and helping hand of the officials of this Society. I cannot doubt that the successive Missionaries who have from time to time been responsible in the two Missions here have taken a very wise course in establishing a very close and friendly connection with the authorities of the Central Relief Society, and I am quite sure that they would be most desirous of acknowledging in the amplest manner the assistance which has been rendered to them in their work from time to time by the existence and administration of this truly excellent institution. I am not acquainted with the working of any other Charity Organisation Societies; it must be understood, therefore, that all my remarks upon this head apply only to the local circumstances with which I am more or less familiar.

It was at one time the practice at both our Liverpool Missions to give the recommendation forms of the Relief Society to all applicants at the Mission without necessarily making any specific inquiry into the cases themselves. This, I believe, is now entirely dropped, and recommendations signed by the Missionaries are only given to persons either actually known to them or into whose application they have made some inquiry and ascertained that there is some ground for help.

Until some twelve years ago the visitation of the cases so recommended for relief was undertaken solely by the officials of the Society. Since that time in several important districts of the city, committees of voluntary visitors (on one of which I had the privilege of serving for nearly three years) have supplemented the work of the officials and have themselves distributed relief in view of the advice given to them, and subject, of course, to the usual rules of the Society. It cannot be doubted, I think, that these committees have added considerably to the value of the work of the Society, and especially because they furnish an opportunity for those engaged as workers in connection with our Mission to come into personal contact with the very cases which most need their friendly advice and help, and so form most valuable aids to the work of the missionaries themselves. It is greatly to be desired that more of these, to whom it is a pleasure to work at our Mission, would throw themselves into this kind of activity. Trying and laborious though it be, I can answer for it that they will never regret the labour and thought they may give to it. It may fairly be said that if we had not had a Central Relief Society in existence it would have been necessary, from the exigencies of the Domestic Mission, to have created one. It cannot but be a source of strength to the latter that they have so large a body of supporters in carrying out what, I think, we have already decided is not the least important part of their work. But having said so much—I have not said one whit more than I sincerely believe—we may still ask ourselves whether there is not still a large portion of the work untouched; whether the work of the Central Relief Society, itself excellent, as up to a point it is, is not quite insufficient to deal with the problem as a whole. I do not wish you to take my word for this. I will appeal to better authorities.

Mr. Lloyd Jones, in his report for 1888, speaking of the prejudice which he found existing against the Central Relief Society, and particularly against their labour test, says:—

The objection to the labour test is that men lose caste among their fellow workmen when they have to resort to the chip yard—the usual test employed—and that it is also too heavy and rough for skilled artisans and clerks, impairing their proficiency afterwards in their respective trades. For a hard day's work they get about eighteen-pence, which they consider unjustly small, and they often prefer to trudge down to the docks early and late, and patiently wait the chance of being hired for a day or two. The spirit of independence, which refuses to be driven by any privation to seek assistance from the Poor Law and shrinks from any submission to what degrades it in the eyes of associates, deserves sympathy and support.

Mr. Anderton says, in 1894, speaking of one case:—

The Central Relief Society gives provisions to the amount of three shillings or three shillings and sixpence three or four times, and then it can do no more.

Again, in 1895:—

Now it is a fact beyond dispute that there are hundreds of men out of work who are not drunken, lazy, and thriftless, but sober, striving, and industrious. The Central Relief Society is clearly their best resource; but in times like the present, when men are out of work for months together, it cannot go on giving ad lib.

My own experience entirely bears out this criticism of the weak point in the working of the Central Relief Society. The cases coming before the Committee of which I was a member, and those which came still more closely under my own observation, were, in the majority of instances, applications made because of more or less lengthened periods of unemployment. The number of those obviously vicious and not entitled to assistance by the Society was very small. The large mass of artisans and labourers so situated were not quite so strong, so quick, so intelligent, and, in many cases, not so young as their fellows, and so consequently the first to lose work when trade became slack, the last to be taken on again when labour was in greater demand. Enfeebled physical frames and mental capacity of less than average quality were the characteristics of the immense majority of the applicants for relief. The conditions of life in our great cities, the vitiated atmosphere, the crowded dwellings and workshops, the unhealthy surroundings of various kinds, are breeding these brothers of ours, already handicapped in the race of life, by thousands. What could the Central Relief Society do with cases of this kind? The obvious result was, that they were helped for three or four weeks, and then, perhaps, some work was found, but in a month or two they were again in our hands, and the same system was repeated.

Obviously, the one thing needful is to provide them with work of some sort or another.

In my experience, almost without exception, leaving out the habitual drunkard, or the habitual liver on charity, there was no shirking of work provided it could be found. The unpopularity of the "chip-yard," of which I have already spoken, would seem to contradict this experience; but I can fully bear out Mr. Lloyd Jones's testimony on the matter, especially as for a long time I was disposed to treat this objection as a desire to avoid work because it was work. But when I noted that the higher up in the scale of skilled labour the greater was the objection to make use of the "chip-yard"—not only so, but as I got to know my cases better, the higher in the scale of character, the greater was the objection—when I saw that the same men would willingly undertake and, to the best of their ability, perform rough unskilled labour in the discharging and loading of cargo at the docks or in warehouse, then I felt that there was some ground for the objection other than a mere desire to avoid work.

It must be said, however, in regard to this, that the yard for making firewood is not looked upon by the Central Relief Society as I understand it, as provision of work for the unemployed; it is simply a "labour test," a means of finding out whether a man is willing to work and has really done his best to find work. I think I have shown that it is not satisfactory even in this latter limited sense. As provision of work for the unemployed, it is obviously absolutely unfair to consider it. The Society has always, so far as I know, distinctly disclaimed any such attempt; they have looked upon any such possible interference with the labour market as beyond their province.

And this is precisely the reason why, from the point of view of the Domestic Missionary and the Mission worker face to face with this problem, it is not sufficient to rely entirely upon the machinery, however excellent, of the Charity Organisation or Central Relief Society as at present administered. The Central Relief Society themselves have pointed this out more than once.

In their report for 1894-95 are these words:—

Relief should be given through the head of the family. If this is a man out of work, employment of some kind should be provided for him. This both acts as a valuable safeguard against imposition and affords the worker and his family substantial help.

Then, after speaking of the use of the parish labour-yard and its own workshops, it goes on to say:—

If needful, both means of giving work might be extended, and it is a question whether it might not be advisable for the Poor Law Guardians, or some voluntary association, to acquire land and set the people to till it, should such an extension of relief work become necessary.

And again, alluding to the state of extreme distress which had then very recently been exhibited, the same report says:—

It has afforded an object-lesson to show what lies beneath the surface in Liverpool, and calls earnestly for strenuous effort on the part of the local authorities and benevolent agencies, but still more of those who carry on spiritual work, to seek a remedy for such a deplorable state of things.

I know that I shall at once be met with the objection that this is much too large a question to be dealt with in any practical manner by our Domestic Missions. The vast extent of the evil, the deep-seated nature of many of the causes which have led to it, all point to the fact that this is a matter for the whole nation to deal with, through the Legislature acting under the pressure either of political parties or religious communities. One thing, I think, we shall all agree with: that it is not because these people only have sinned, or even their parents, that this state of things exists among us; and while we are waiting for society to redress the grievous wrong it has allowed to be committed by the private appropriation of God's free gifts to all His children alike, can we not do something to ameliorate the position of affairs, at least in the immediate neighbourhood of our existing organisations?

The question divides itself naturally into two—(1) the provision of work in towns, leaving the worker to continue to find his own residence for himself and family; (2) the suggestion I have already quoted of the Central Relief Society of the taking of unemployed labour to the land, necessitating as it would undoubtedly do, the provision also of residence during the period of such employment. I believe something could be done more than is done on the lines of the first head. A few years ago a work-yard was started in Liverpool with very fair prospects of affording employment to men and women temporarily unemployed. During the short time that it was working, the men were employed partly in firewood making, but principally in mat making; a large demand was found to exist for the mats which were made, and the Committee were told that no supply of such mats existed nearer than London. The women were engaged in the collection and sorting of household waste. Unfortunately this particular venture was brought to a premature close, but sufficient experience was obtained to show that with a very small expenditure a large amount of work could be found with little or no interference with existing labour already employed.

But it is the second of these alternatives to which I wish more particularly to draw your attention. Its advantages over the first are obvious. In the first place, the production of food could be carried on in the neighbourhood of any large town without any danger of interference unduly with existing industry; next, the withdrawal of the worker from the unhealthy conditions of life, with all the existing temptations to which in all probability he is only too likely to succumb when in work, and the placing him and his family in fresh air and healthy surroundings with all the wholesome influences of a country life upon him, are themselves immense benefits. Of course, this is no new thing, and the growth of this movement during the past few years, if quiet, has been very considerable.

The best known instance of the kind is the Farm Colony of the Salvation Army at Hadleigh, Essex. I think we all feel, however much we differ from the theology and some of the methods of the Salvation Army, that the services they have rendered to the cause of sinning and suffering humanity, particularly in London, are incalculable in their value, and merit the very highest praise. I will briefly quote one or two statements which will help us to estimate the particular value of this portion of their work. General Booth, in his book "Darkest England," says on this subject:—

I fully recognise that when all has been done that can be done in the direction of disposing of the unhired men and women of the town, there will still remain many . . . for whom employers cannot be found.

What then must be done with them? The answer to that question seems to me obvious. They must go upon the land. If it pays the Swiss Mountaineer in the midst of the eternal snows, far removed from any market, to cultivate such miserable soil in the brief summer of the high Alps, it is impossible to believe that Englishmen working on English soil, close to our markets, and enjoying all the advantages of co operation, cannot earn their daily bread by their daily toil. The soil of England is not unkindly, and there are more days in the English year on which a man can work out of doors with a spade with comparative comfort than in any other country under heaven.

What has been the experience of the Farm Colony?

Mr. Bramwell Booth, writing in 1894, says:—

Every word that has been said about the beneficial effects of contact with the land on some classes is true, and more than true. It softens them. It opens a new world of interest to them. The mere handling of fruit and flowers, and tending of sheep and oxen calls out, all unknown to them at first, the finer side of men's nature as the breaking of stones or the picking of oakum never could to all eternity.

The figures which follow are eloquent. The number of men up to that time passed through the colony was 1,616; of these 128 left immediately after or before commencing work; of the 1,488 who actually worked and resided there, 602 whose conduct was satisfactory left with situations in view; 283 were sent direct to situations obtained for them through the Salvation Army; while only 146 left without notice on their own account, and 349 were discharged as for various reasons unsatisfactory.

A correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, writing in 1898, says:—

They come here from the shelters and elevators of London broken down, desperate, and cursed with a passion they cannot control. The fresh smell of the upturned soil, the regular hours, and the fresh air do wonders for them.

In addition to the recommendation of the Central Relief Society, the idea of a labour colony or labour farm has been already urged upon the Liverpool public by the report of the Lord Mayor's Commission on the Unemployed, presented to the Corporation in 1894, which says:—

Another important section consists of the respectable men and women, who, through natural weakness—either of character or body, advancing years, or other inevitable cause, are unable to do work of average quality, but who can do a certain limited amount of work if watched and guided. For these people the labourers' colony or labour farm would seem to be the natural remedy; but it must be clearly understood that such a colony could not be made entirely self-supporting. There seems, however, no reason why it should not be conducted at a moderate cost by careful management, and the deficit might be made up partly by voluntary subscriptions, and partly by a grant from the poor rate. These people even now have to be kept in some way or other by the community, and it would probably be cheaper to do it in a direct than an indirect manner. Moreover, it is quite possible that the influence of the life in the colony might result in the permanent restoration of a percentage of the labourers to the ranks of efficient labour.

This particular recommendation had the unanimous support of the whole Commission.

It is, I think, quite clear that we have sufficient evidence to show that in this recommendation we have the desired remedy, the missing link in the chain connecting the felt needs of the work of our Domestic Missions in regard to the material and physical conditions of those among whom they work, with the existing relations between themselves and the Charity Organisation Society. And the question then arises, by whom should this much needed reform be carried out?

It is quite evident that there are serious objections to its adoption by the community, whether on the part of a Municipality or on the part of the Poor Law Guardians. I do not say the objections are insurmountable, only that they must necessarily delay action almost indefinitely.

It may very well be asked whether it would be at all right to burden the already overburdened ratepayer with the necessary expenses of such a scheme, at least until some enormous changes are made in the incidence of local rating and taxation. It would hardly be wise, either, to create an idea that such labour could be demanded from the community as a right; and the work of discriminating between those who should receive such aid and those who for the present were not so assisted would be very much better in the hands of some voluntary organisation.

The Guardians do already, however, assist in the work of some of these labour homes already established, by paying to the extent of 5s. per head for labourers so assisted. This co-operation might reasonably be looked for and developed. If the work is therefore best done by a voluntary organisation we may ask whether such an organisation exists.

The Central Relief Society naturally suggests itself. I have no knowledge of whether they would view such an undertaking as at all within the scope of their endeavours. Up to the present, however, they have not moved in the matter, nor, so far as I know, have they given any intimation that they propose to do so. I think we may safely say that if they did they would receive the cordial and willing support of those who are engaged in the work of our Domestic Missions. But failing this, I venture to ask this Conference to endorse the opinion that it would be a wise and fitting development of the great work which these Missions have ever striven to carry on, that they should at least make a trial of this most valuable and necessary corollary to the relations which already exist between them and the neglected and deserving poor.

There is no necessity to contemplate, in the first place, any very large and formidable scheme. It would be necessary to obtain suitable land (freehold if possible), and not too distant from a large town. Such a farm would naturally occupy itself not so much with the raising of large and extensive crops or live stock as with vegetable and fruit culture, poultry and dairy farming, and the small culture which is becoming so valuable an annexe to regular farms in the neighbourhood of large towns. It would be desirable to limit the number of heads of families at first to say 25, the number which has been fixed by the Church Army as the largest to be safely put under the care of one superintendent. The provision of cottages for the families, and rooms in the superintendent's house for single men, would not, therefore, be great. The principal difficulty would probably be the engagement of a suitable man with the necessary force of character and the requisite technical knowledge. Still such a difficulty could no doubt be surmounted. I think you will agree that there is nothing here that could not be carried out with ease by our existing organisations, if only they were convinced that it was their duty to do it.

In reply to the question, Why should we do this? I can only repeat that the need seems to me to be urgent, and of the highest importance; that it falls within the scope not only of our traditions, but of the developments of those traditions through the last sixty years; that there are few if any organisations with freedom and elasticity enough to enable them to approach this work with the same prospect of success. Do you want more? I hesitate to add what I feel in the presence of those who have never needed to be urged to any good work once they were persuaded it was needed, but, for completeness sake, I will say that I can imagine a similar question being asked of those who desired to commence the work of Missions to the poor sixty years ago—Why should we do it? The answer was then, that which I hope will be your answer now—Why should we not?

It is given to us to see the need, and to feel the desire to help our brethren who are not so fortunate in the race of life—indeed, who are seriously handicapped from the beginning. Surely this is sufficient reason why, if we are able, with thought, with time, with substance, we should do our part.

Who can stand unmoved in the presence of one willing to work to the extent of his ability, and yet unable to find it—who has spent a weary day in attendance at hiring stands, and returned with no prospect of food for wife and family; one to whom—and there are many such—an application to charity even of the kindest sort is a confession of failure, hard to recognise, bitter to resort to? The little comforts and necessities which go to make up the magic of that little word "home," have gradually disappeared; you, perhaps, as a casual visitor, do not notice them, but he does. As the helplessness of the situation forces itself upon you, many thoughts and aspirations find their way, if not to utterance in the language of earth, at least to expression in the nearest we can conceive to spirit communion. Once more we hear the wondrous tones resounding down the centuries:

Why stand ye here all the day idle?

They say unto him, "Because no man hath hired us."

He saith unto them, "Go ye also into the vineyard."

Whether we can unhesitatingly say that if Jesus were here to-day he would do just the particular thing which seems to us to be right or not, we can at least feel that he who described his own work in the words, "The blind receive their sight, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up and the poor have good tidings preached unto them," would be likely to look with approval on any earnest attempt to realise in the smallest measure the spreading of his kingdom.

"I knew these footprints were the Lord's,
I followed where they led,

And in a hovel rude,

With naught to fence the weather from his head,

The King I sought for meekly stood.

A naked hungry child

Clung round his gracious knee,

And a poor, hunted slave looked up and smiled,

To bless the smile that set him free.

New miracles I saw his presence do:

No more I knew the hovel bare and poor;

The gathered chips into a wood-pile grew,

The broken morsel swelled to goodly store.

I knelt and wept. My Christ no more I seek;

weak."

GLOUCESTER BI-CENTENARY AND WESTERN UNION ANNUAL MEETING.

THE annual meeting of the Western Union of Unitarian and Free Christian Churches was held at Gloucester on Tuesday, April 18, in connection with the bi-centenary of the Barton-street Chapel. Of the twenty-five churches on the roll of the Union, seventeen were represented at the meetings.

Among the delegates and visitors who were present during the day, were the Revs. Alexander Gordon (Manchester), H. Austin (Cirencester), J. Barron (Tavistock), A. N. Blatchford (Bristol), S. S. Brettell (Crewkerne), T. B. Broadrick (Bridgwater), J. S. Mathers (Plymouth), F. W. Stanley (Bath), J. Worthington (Taunton), J. Warschauer (Clifton), J. Fisher Jones (Cheltenham), F. T. Reid (Moreton Hampstead), Mrs. W. E. Price (Pen Moel), Mrs. Fisher, Mme. Flacciomio (Bath), Miss H. Thomas (Taunton), Mrs. Widgery, Mrs. Biss (Exeter), Messrs. W. Colfox (Bridport, High Sheriff of the county of Dorset), T. Grosvenor Lee (representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association), Major-General W. Jacob, I.S.C. (Tavistock), Messrs. Geoffrey New (Mayor of Evesham), A. W. Worthington, J.P. (Stourbridge), T. A. Colfox, J.P. (Bridport), W. Walker, J.P. (Trowbridge), Morgan P. Price (Tibberton), L. Brinkworth (Yeovil), J. Joyner, C. Lane (Cheltenham), J. Mitchell (Clifton), G. Philpott (Taunton), C. M. Taylor (Exeter); of the members of the Gloucester congregation, the Rev. and Mrs. Walter Lloyd, Dr. Bond, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Washbourne, Mr. and Mrs. A. Keeping, Mrs. John Ashbee and many others. At the Conference of ministers on the following Wednesday morning, a paper was read by the Rev. L. P. Jacks, of Birmingham.

The business meeting was held in the morning, under the presidency of Major-General Jacob, who said how much they all regretted that Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, who had been elected president for the past year, had been obliged, through illness, to relinquish his office. In the course of an encouraging speech the Chairman spoke of the value even to a small body of being well organised, as they in that Union were, and of the progress of Unitarianism, which he was convinced had many adherents in the Church of England as well as beyond its borders.

The report of the Committee was presented by the secretary, the Rev. F. W. STANLEY.

The report, while not recording any striking new departure or progress in the past year, gave a satisfactory account of steady work, and declared that there was an excellent spirit in the churches, and a strong determination to hold the ground won by the self-sacrifice in the past. The Rev. J. Warschauer had been welcomed to Clifton, the Rev. W. Agar to Sidmouth, and the Rev. E. Parry to Ilminster, succeeding the Revs. C. D. Badland, H. M. Dare, and A. M. Holden respectively, while the Revs. J. T. Davies, Priestley Prime, and R. H. U. Bloor had also left the Province. Special acknowledgment was made of the value of the lecturing tours of the Revs. Joseph Wood and G. St. Clair, and also of the services of Miss Staples, who had been obliged to resign the office of secretary to the Western Union branch of the Postal Mission, and was succeeded by Miss Julia Barmby. Lectures at Newton Abbot had encouraged the attempt to hold regular Sunday evening services. The successful efforts of the Crewkerne congregation in obtaining a newschoolroom were subject for congratulation. The Chronicle and Seed sower had been of great service, at little cost to the Union.

The reports of the aided congregations, of the Sunday Schools of the Union, and of other work were also presented. The report of the treasurer, Mr. Philip J. Worsley, showed an increase in subscriptions and in the number of subscribers, and an adverse balance of £33 turned into a balance in hand of £6 5s. 8d.

On the motion of Mr. W. WALKER, seconded by the Rev. J. S. MATHERS, the reports were adopted, and on the motion of Mr. G. PHILPOTT, seconded by the Rev. J. FISHER JONES, the officers for the ensuing year were elected, Major-General Jacob being appointed President.

The year's grants, were then voted, and on the motion of the Rev. F. W. STANLEY, seconded by the Rev. T. B. BROADRICK, Messrs. W. Colfox, J.P., P. J. Worsley, J.P., and J. Kenrick Champion, were elected life members of the Union.

Thanks having been tendered to the Revs. Alexander Gordon and J. Warschauer, for the services to be rendered in the afternoon, a resolution of acknowledgment to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association for help received was passed, and the Rev. JEFFREY WORTHINGTON then moved—

That this Assembly desires to offer its heartiest congratulations to the minister and congregation of Barton street Chapel on reaching this eventful period of their history, and to express the hope that the future may see a continuance of that fidelity and usefulness which has marked the two hundred years that are gone.

Further votes of thanks for the hospitality of the day, and to the Chairman, concluded the business of the meeting.

The delegates and visitors, to the number of over sixty, were then entertained by the local Committee to luncheon at the New Inn Hotel. Mr. C. W. Washbourne was in the chair, and Messrs. J. Wareing and A. H. Keeping in the vice-chairs. An apology for absence was announced from the Mayor.

The toast of the Queen having been duly honoured, the Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD spoke to the toast of "Civil and Religious Liberty all the World over." He esteemed it a great honour to be connected with a toast referring to so many of their fathers and forerunners. Among the ranks of their honoured ministers in the liberal Christian Church he recalled the memory of one who breathed the very air of religious freedom, who was always ready to give a reason for the hope that was in him, and to stand as one of the pillars of Protestant Nonconformity—the late John Gordon. And side by side with him they remembered so many more that time did not suffice to tell of them. The very stones of Gloucester witnessed to the life they lived, to what they had done for the cause of civil as well as religious liberty. He recalled the name of Oliver Cromwell, and of the founders of that venerable chapel in Barton-street. The subject of the toast he associated with their beloved country, and the pure civilisation with which the English name was identified and ever would be. They knew what their people were doing for civil liberty throughout the world, and as to religious liberty, they had reason to thank God for the progress it had made among the churches. They might depend upon it that where the spirit of the Lord was there was liberty. He felt sure that the truer their following in the footsteps of the Common Master, and the more loyal their adhesion to his precepts, the more truly were they the apostles of a liberty that was worth having and handing down to their children. They had striven in the past for liberty of thought, liberty to study, and liberty to speak; and their forerunners had not laboured in vain. So it was to-day that the rising spirit of freedom was too strong for all barriers and restrictions. The mind would think, the heart would feel, and the tongue would speak: and their success in the future would be just in proportion to their loyalty to the spirit of liberty which was the breath of their religious life.

To the toast of "The Ministers of all Denominations" given by the Chairman, the Rev. SYDNEY T. COMER, minister of the Southgate Congregational Church, first responded. The Free Churches of Gloucester, he said, were a happy family; there was no discord among them. They were a strong body, not one of their churches in that city was in a weak and languishing condition. Although they had no Free Church federation, they were taking their part in the life of the city and all public movements, and they were happy also in their relations with the Established Church.

The Rev. F. T. REID also responded.

To the toast of "The Visitors," Mr. W. COLFOX first responded, and was followed by Mr. FRANKLIN HIGGS, deacon of the Southgate Congregational Church, who said that it was with peculiar appropriateness that the members of the Barton-street Chapel had invited the minister, officers, and some of the congregation of the Southgate Church to join them in their celebration. Indeed, he thought it would have fallen short somewhat of its glory and satisfaction if members of the Southgate Church had not been allowed to participate, for they claimed with them a common origin. He cordially acknowledged the spirit in which Mr. Lloyd, in his excellent history of the congregation, had alluded to the separation which took place, and to the present relations of the two congregations. Although in times past it had, unfortunately, been too much the custom to accentuate differences of opinion on theological matters, there was a better spirit abroad at the present time, instead of looking for points of disagreement, people tried to find points of contact and agreement—matters in which they could find a common platform—and share in the spirit of the Master himself who said, "He that is not against me is for me." The toast of "The Chairman," given by Mr. A. W. WORTHINGTON, and coupled with thanks to the minister and congregation of Barton-street, concluded the proceedings.

THE COMMEMORATION SERVICE.

In the afternoon a religious service was held in the Barton-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. J. Warschauer, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Alexander Gordon, who took for his text, "He is not the God of the dead, but of the living."—(Mark xii. 27.)

The men of God, he said, whose efforts in olden time they were commemorating that day, were not to be viewed as mere items in the roll of the dead. They lived. In culling the vestiges of their story they were dealing with living persons—forgotten it might be; dimly and imperfectly discovered; incorrectly discerned or appreciated; but still existing, though transferred to another sphere of human life: not dropped out of being and fidelity, but raised, on the contrary, to a higher power of living. The founders of their faith were living still who, having builded first a spiritual house in that city, erected two centuries ago that structure to be its material abiding-place, and dedicated it to be a permanent home for praise and prayer, and advocacy in Divine things. They were celebrating that day ostensibly the bi-centenary of a building, but they were not interested in that edifice merely as a relic of the past. They valued it chiefly for the part which through long years it had filled in harbouring the religious life of a congregation of worshippers and workers, and in sheltering each stage in the development of its ideals and in the evolution of its forces—a development and an evolution which, in all probability, had not touched their term, if two hundred years had fled since first the door was set open which had not yet been closed. Were he to speak of the formation of that congregation, as distinct from the foundation of that venerable and hallowed shrine, he should have to go back to a point of time 245 years ago, for then it was that a company of believers bound themselves to each other and to God in the bond of a resolute Christian fellowship. A young divine from Aberdeen—whose scholarship had received the additional stamp of an Oxford degree—whose parts had won the appreciation of Cromwell, chief of men, met in Gloucester with the people willing to gather about him, ready to take his lead. They became attached to his person and to his ministry with a consistency which endured through all the changes of his fortune—and those changes were many. For six years Forbes enjoyed a lectureship in the neighbouring Cathedral Church. Ousted from that at the Restoration, he continued his Gloucester ministry for two years as a non-conforming outsider. Silenced by the new Uniformity Act in 1662—that darksome year—he disobeyed the law and was twice imprisoned in consequence. In London and at Enfield he found refuges, still keeping up, as far as possible, his relations with his Gloucester flock. When there was a cessation of the persecutions due to the sinister policy of James II. Forbes resumed in Gloucester a pastoral position, which was at length secured to him finally by the operation of the Toleration Act. Forbes was an Independent and a Calvinist, and it was certain that his Calvinism had not relaxed to the end of his long life. Forbes' Independence, however, did not forbid him to enter into relations of fellowship and federation with evangelical divines theoretically attached to Presbyterian Church government, and in 1694—five years before the building of the Barton-street Meeting House—he presided over a large meeting which issued proposals for a national federation of the various county associations of Presbyterian and Independent divines. His congregation in Gloucester numbered no less than 650 adherents, of whom 70 were qualified as Parliamentary voters under the restricted franchise of that day. The building erected in 1699, those present could see for themselves, could never have held as many people as were reckoned to belong to that congregation. Whereas the chapel builders in our own time built extravagantly, hoping for further extensions, the founders of the old meeting-houses usually proceeded on the opposite principle, making their modest structures on the smallest practicable scale. It was not expected that all would be in attendance at every service. People were religious then not on the Lord's Day alone nor in the Lord's House alone. Heads of families then repeated to their households at family worship on Sunday evenings the sermon heard at meeting. Week-day services in private houses carried the message of religion to the homes of such as were unable to be present in the House of Prayer on the Lord's Day. On great occasions, such as the celebrations of the Lord's Supper, the meeting-house was full and filled again by those who came in relays to take their share in the sacred ordinance. The conveyance of the meeting-house in which those services went on left it, legally speaking, private property. The trustees or their successors were empowered to limit its use in any way they thought fit, but that power was never exercised till so late as 1769, and then the only limitation was to Protestant Dissenters, without specification either of denomination or of creed. Besides that congregation, to all appearances, the only organised body of Dissenters which the city of Gloucester could boast for some years near the beginning of the last century, was that in connection with the famous Dissenting Academy, presided over by Samuel Jones. The pupils of Samuel Jones, including one who ultimately became Archbishop of Canterbury, must have been hearers of Forbes. Within those walls, so long as he was able, Forbes continued his active ministry. He took an assistant (Joseph Denham) in 1709; he preached his last sermon before the united ministers of his county in 1711; and he died in May, 1712. In that year the Gloucester Academy was removed to Tewkesbury, where the great Butler, author of the "Analogy" became one of its pupils.

Mr. Gordon then proceeded to trace the subsequent history of the congregation. Denham, who succeeded Forbes, was also a strict Calvinist, and in the preacher's view it was probably some question of discipline which led to the division in the congregation. Having also referred to John Biddle and his connection with Gloucester, he said that at the middle of the last century the trend of opinion among liberal Dissenters had set in an anti-Trinitarian direction; yet there was much hesitation in pronouncing definitely upon points of doctrine. The acknowledged difficulty of the topic led men on both sides to be cautious in dealing with it. The preaching of theology was avoided, and that quite as much by men who retained the older type of opinion as by those who were conscientiously departing from it. It was in the time of Theophilus Browne (a Cambridge man, who followed Lindsey in giving up a living in the Church) that the Unitarian name became prominent in connection with the Barton-street Chapel; and what had been long tacitly taken for granted was then emphasised and set plainly in the forefront. It was necessary to remember what exactly the distinct adoption of the Unitarian name implied. It was not taken as a term of theology, but rather as an expression of religion. It rested doubtless, as its ultimate base, on forms of doctrine, but as a name of discrimination it stood emphatically for purity of worship. The Unitarian Chapel itself, in the meaning of Lindsey and his followers, was simply a building where that Great Being, whose ear was ever open to the supplications of His children, was alone worshipped as God, and that remained its distinctive characteristic. Its worship was defined by its name, but no restriction was thereby laid upon the future development of the worshippers' thought. That which they had adopted they might out-grow, or reject; but it was not yet out-grown.

While they claimed that conscience had brought into Nonconformity the heroes of their story both in its earlier and later phases, they would be, at the same time, the last to refuse to own that conscience had carried out of Nonconformity men who, trained in their traditions, had not been able permanently to find full satisfaction in their methods or ideals. Such was the case with Joseph Hutton. There were minds transparently sincere in their love of truth, and as little biassed in pursuit of it as was consistent with human nature, who deemed it their duty to sacrifice a portion of the freedom which otherwise they would gladly have.

In conclusion Mr. Gordon said that Unitarians embodied a part, and an influential part of the religious forces of the age, and an essential part of the religious needs of their time; but there would be no surer way in which they could court failure than by pretending to ignore the mathematical axiom that a part was not equal to the whole. History should be a noble study, but it might easily become an enervating one. To pore over the annals of the past, to dwell upon its expired glory, to pride themselves on by-gone ancestral achievements, as if they were their own, might damp the spirits of men as they had deadened the energies of nations. Spain was a case in point. But to revive the memory and praise the renown of their forefathers might be an unqualified good, if it taught them the possibility and inspired them with the enterprise and the enthusiasm of a better future to be made by their following in the footsteps of the most elevating examples. It was something for them to feel that they came of a good stock and stood in the responsibilities of the descendants of stalwart men and true. To live in the past was the function of the mere reliquary hunter; to attempt to live on the past was a sign of the effete; but to resolve to live from the past might be the spring of wise endeavour, counselled and controlled by the experiments which the ages had seen and the lessons which they had left behind. A bi-centennial such as the present should be a retrospect full of joyous encouragement to "quit them like men"—men of God animated with the spirit which once lived on earth and was living still in their forerunners, none of whom were lost, but all gone before; and should fill them also with the assurance that the works which their forefathers had begun would seek some of their completion at their hands.

EVENING MEETING.

After tea, which was served in the Oddfellows' Hall, a public meeting was held in the chapel.

Mr. A. W. WORTHINGTON took the chair, and having congratulated the congregation on the celebration of that day spoke of the part Unitarians had played in the struggle for civil and religious liberty, and of their social and philanthropic work.

The Rev. WALTER LLOYD, who followed, said he could not stand there that evening without thinking of the good and saintly men who had preceded him, and he felt it was a great honour to be the minister of that congregation in the ancient and famous city of Gloucester. There had been no break in the continuity of their religious life as a congregation, except for the temporary dispersion in the reigns of Charles II. and James II. in the days of persecution. But, while a part of the congregation had seceded, the rest remained, while the doctrinal change to Unitarianism was going on, and he himself was the direct successor of James Forbes, the founder of dissent in Gloucester. They could not, therefore, justly be shut out from the fellowship of the Nonconformists of that city. Among the trustees of the chapel, he found in 1797 the names of John Doddridge Humphreys and William Price. The name of Price had ever since been associated with the congregation, and they found also the well-known names of Ashbee and Washbourne. He concluded by urging the congregation to hand down their great inheritance unimpaired and their noble traditions untarnished.

The Rev. ALEXANDER GORDON proposed a resolution of congratulation to minister and congregation on the bi-centenary, and the Rev. A. N. Blatchford pronounced a eulogy on Oliver Cromwell, the champion of religious liberty, under whose patronage the first minister of that congregation had settled at Gloucester.

The Rev. F. W. STANLEY said that no doubt, in 1662, Charles II. thought he had accomplished a great triumph, but one main effect of his repressive acts was to strengthen the love of religious liberty to which England owed so much. An attempt to compel men to renounce their opinions only brought disastrous consequences to the persecutor, and he could not help thinking that France was suffering to-day because she had slain or driven from her shores men of conscience centuries ago. He next referred to the state of things in the Church of England, and the recent order that had been made in many dioceses for the reading of the Athanasian Creed, the outcome of which he watched with considerable interest. He doubted whether the order, however distasteful, would meet with opposition, for service in the Established Church did not conduce to resistance on doctrinal grounds, but rather to submission, and the pious hope that things might improve in the future. So far he had not heard of any canon laying down his canonry, or any minister his ministry, because of that order. Out of the battle two centuries ago came the love of undogmatic religion. It was well that one Church refused to formulate, or to own that every doctrine must be expounded or explained away. They ought to resolve to contend for a reverent reserve, for surely there were clouds on the Mount of God, which they were not able to penetrate. If they were willing to confess their human ignorance concerning many of the things which were commonly dogmatised upon, it would prove a blessing to Christianity.

Dr. BOND, Mr. T. GROSVENOR LEE, on behalf of the B. and F.U.A., Mr. W. COLFOX and the MAYOR of EVESHAM also spoke, and a concluding vote of thanks to the Chairman was moved by the Rev. S. T. COMER, who, referring to a remark of Mr. Lloyd's, said that the Free Church Council did not "take" in Gloucester, as one of the churches had refused its support, because Unitarians were excluded. He felt that they could not ask Unitarians to join in spiritual matters with other dissenting bodies; but in political and social work they had no right to say that they were the Free Churches so long as the Unitarian body was left outside.

The motion was seconded by Mr. J. T. WAREING, who expressed a hope that the debt still remaining from the renovation of the chapel might soon be wiped out.

The meetings were throughout of the heartiest and most successful character. During the interval after lunch a capital photograph was taken as a memento of the occasion, as to which particulars will be found advertised in another column.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Capelygroes.—The Rev. E. E. Jenkins has tendered his resignation of the pastorate here with the object of undergoing a further course of study at Manchester College, Oxford. His resignation will take effect on the first Sunday in July, when he will preach his farewell sermon. During his short pastorate here Mr. Jenkins has won the respect and love of his congregation, and general regret is expressed at his departure.

Chowbent.—The annual meeting of the congregation and schools, with allied institutions, was held on Monday evening, Mr. D. Schofield presiding. The various balance-sheets having been audited, were presented to the meeting for confirmation. While some of the accounts showed deficits, most of which were provided for at the meeting, others were found to be in a flourishing condition. The Sunday-school Sick Society has 241 members and a balance of £1,278 0s. 6d. The chapel and schools debt of £700 has been wiped off by private subscription during the past year. The Young Men's Institute has also a balance of £6 13s. 5d., the Band of Hope £5 10s. 1d., the lantern service account £2 13s. 2½d., and the library account £29. The wardens' and the Sunday-school accounts were the chief ones having deficits, the amount for the chapel being £15 0s. 11d. and the school £4 4s. 2d. The position of the day school account could not be stated, as the report and the Government grant for the year ending Feb. 28 were not yet to hand. Officers for the ensuing year were appointed, all the committees being united into one council. A vote of thanks was accorded to the Chairman, on the motion of Mr. T. H. Hope, seconded by the Rev. J. J. Wright.

Hinckley.—Last Sunday evening the Rev. W. G.

Price delivered a vigorous address on the "Tercenary of Oliver Cromwell." In the morning he spoke against the growing evils of additional Sunday newspaper literature.

Leigh: Lancashire.—The annual School Sermons were preached last Sunday by the Rev. P. M. Higginson, M.A. of Monton, in the afternoon, and in the evening by the Rev. R. Travers Herford, B.A., of Stand. On each occasion there was a large congregation, that in the evening completely filling the building. There were friends present from several of the neighbouring churches, including Chowbent, Astley, Hindley, Park-lane, &c. Special hymns were sung by the children and anthems by the choir, which had been largely augmented, the whole of the Chowbent choir being in attendance, under the leadership of Mr. Frank Eckersley. Notwithstanding the unfortunate weather the anniversary was a very successful one, and the collections realised the sum of £16 1s. 11½d., which was considerably in excess of any previous year.

London: Essex Hall Recreation Society.—The sixth annual meeting of this society was held on April 22, in the schoolroom of Unity Church, Islington, Mr. S. T. Rodger, the president, in the chair. The report was read showing the membership to number 97, about equally divided between the three centres at Newington-green, Rhyl-street, and Islington. Four summer meetings had been held at Epping Forest, Kew Gardens, Hadley, and Tetherdown Woods, and three during the winter, when each section in turn had entertained the other two. Report also told of the cricket and the swimming sections of the society and of its finances, a balance of £3 8s. 4d. going forward to the new year. Mr. Howard Young having been elected as the new president, and the other business disposed of, an entertainment provided by the Unity Church members followed, finishing off with a few dances and the singing of "Auld Lang Syne."

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—The annual meeting was held on Thursday evening, April 20. Mr. Councillor Marsden, warden, presided, and there was an attendance of about 100 members and friends. The reports (of which an abstract appeared last week) were unanimously adopted after many congratulatory expressions upon the present position of the congregation and its affairs. Mr. Councillor Pritchard, J.P., was elected warden, Mr. Garnett treasurer, Mr. A. Dugdale, jun., secretary, Mrs. H. Renold, Mrs. A. Dugdale, and Mr. J. Garnett were elected representatives to the Provincial Assembly. During the evening an inlaid walnut davenport was presented to Miss Bertha Guthrie, with grateful thanks for her long services in the church choir, and best wishes for her future professional career. Rev. C. Peach said, in the course of his address, that the congregation was drawing new life from its attempt to come into closer touch with the living issues of the day. During the year popular services had been established, and various new forms of philanthropic work taken up. He hoped for further developments on these lines. They were living on the fringe of a very poor and congested district, and he asked them to realise their duty to it. The congregation could only live and thrive in proportion as it worked for others. He was not prepared with a definite scheme, but he would like to see a mission-room established under the care of the congregation. The congregation was fortunate in the possession of many members of exceptional ability as lay preachers. They regularly supplied the pulpit whenever he himself was absent, and regular employment should be found for them. Then there was much musical, literary, and dramatic talent in the congregation; all this he would like to see employed in helping the lives of their poorer neighbours. The pastor's suggestions were loudly applauded, after which the meeting closed with hymn and benediction. On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. Both morning and evening the words of the preacher were direct, simple, and appropriate, and they made a deep impression on the large congregations which heard them. In the afternoon a service of song with lantern views, "The Man of Nazareth," was given before a crowded audience. The anniversary was altogether most successful, and the collections were much better than last year.

Portsmouth.—The first annual report of the "John Pounds' Training Home and Institute for Girls" has been issued, and shows a good record of modest work. Of the Institute and reading-room, thirty-five girls are now members, and there is an average attendance of fifteen a night. The evenings are spent in a variety of recreation and instruction, including physical drill and cooking. Into the Home, twelve girls were received during the year for longer or shorter periods, of whom seven were placed out in domestic service with an outfit provided. The year's income was £246 19s. 2d., and there remained a balance of £11 in hand.

Sheffield.—The members of the Sheffield and neighbouring congregations held their annual social tea and public meeting in Channing Hall on Thursday week. The chair was taken by Mr. Michael J. Hunter, who was supported by the Revs. J. E. Manning, Joseph Wood, J. Ellis, H. Thomas, W. Stephens and A. Bennett. Mr. Wood, in response to a resolution of welcome to him, as the guest of the evening, took for the subject of his address, "The Church Idea." They were, he said, living in a time of deep and general revival of religious life. It might not yet have reached their own churches, but there were signs of it. The scientific opposition to religion was not what it was. Secularism and materialism had not so strong a hold as formerly. The associations of church life were not going to die out, for they were founded on deep human needs. They must keep in mind the essential purpose of a church—to nurture faith in God and spiritual life, and to promote goodness. At the conclusion of the meeting a resolution of congratulation to Dr. Martineau on his ninety-fourth birthday was passed.

Southern Unitarian Association.—At the quarterly meeting of the executive of this Association held last week at the Kell Schools, Southampton, a unanimous resolution was passed expressing deep sympathy with the relations of the unfortunate passengers who were recently lost in the s.s. Stella off Guernsey. A collection on behalf of the Stella fund was made in the Church of the Saviour on the previous Sunday. The congregation at Bournemouth having just lost by the death of Captain Rough, their oldest member, the following resolution was also unanimously passed—namely, "That this Committee of the S.U.A. desire to express the deep regret with which they have heard of the recent death of Captain Rough, and to convey both to the relations of the venerable deceased, and also to the Bournemouth Church, the Committee's deepest sympathy with them in their great loss." Captain Rough lived to be considerably over eighty years of age, and was one of the two first founders of the Bournemouth congregation.

Trebanos, South Wales.—On the 23rd and 24th inst., the half-yearly meetings were held, the officiating ministers being the Revs. D. Rees, Pentre, and W. T. Jones, Swansea. On Sunday afternoon a young student with the Congregationalists introduced, and at the same meeting a Wesleyan minister was present, and according to his own testimony felt that Unitarianism was far superior to anything he had formerly pictured it to be. A collection was taken towards the chapel debt, and realised more than was expected. At the week night meeting on Wednesday evening, the Rev. J. E. Jones, Cwmbach, officiated.

Walsall.—The address delivered by the Rev. Peter Dean last January on "The Unitarians: Who they are, and what they have done," has been reprinted from the Walsall Observer, and may be had from the author for distribution at 4½d. a dozen.

TRUE courtesy is only an interpretation of the Golden Rule, as good taste is nothing but an instinct of truth in any department of life or of art. Heroism is but the response of firm moral strength to the law of right in some exacting emergency. The martyr at the stake, the helmsman standing at his post while his members stiffen with frost or parch with fire, the engineer delaying to reverse his engine before he saves his own life, is but doing "that which it was his duty to do"; and what we applaud in him is, properly, not his performance of an act which he might have neglected without wrong, but the nerve and courage which held him to duty at the cost of pain and death.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

In this year's exhibition at the Royal Academy what is most worth seeing, to our mind, is Mr. Hamo Thornycroft's colossal statue, in bronze, of Oliver Cromwell. One feels, it is true, in Burlington House, rather like meeting Gulliver in Lilliput, and the statue cannot be seen to any advantage. It will be different when it stands in the open in Westminster, but clearly it is a very noble work of art, worthily representing a great and noble man. Close by is Mr. Alfred Drury's statue of Dr. Joseph Priestley, dwarfed of course, but not rendered insignificant, by its great neighbour. It is to stand in the city square at Leeds.

TURNING from Cromwell to the pictures, we may perhaps be forgiven for saying that we still seem to be in Lilliput, though in a different sense. There are no great pictures this year. The President at the Academy banquet explained the absence of several important works by the unfortunate circumstance of a week's unexpected fog, which had prevented their completion. And we may hazard the suggestion that many of our artists are lying low this year, that they may burst upon the world with redoubled splendour at the coming Paris exhibition. However that may be, we did not find one picture that we longed to go and see again. There are three big Jubilee pictures of the scene in front of St. Paul's, and a number of interesting portraits—seven bishops among them—Mr. Gerald Balfour, by Watts (his only picture this year); Gladstone, by F. Goodall; and Miss Octavia Hill, by J. S. Sargent. Of landscapes there are a good number that are pleasant to look at, Peter Graham as ever, Leader, with some variety of subject, MacWhirter perhaps the most varied and striking of all; and with these H. W. B. Davis, David Murray, Colin Hunter, Alfred East, William Keeling, and Alfred Parsons. Among the water colours, also, there are some very charming landscapes.

Of the pictures that have a personal interest for us the first place must be given to Miss Minna Tayler's striking rendering of some lines from Longfellow's "Saga of King Olaf,"

They say that through heat and through cold,
Through weald, they say, and through wold,
By day and by night, they say,
She has fled!

Through the dreary summer heat, amid a tangle of faded thistles, the figure of the unhappy queen is pictured in her lonely flight, the face covered with her hands. The picture is worthy of its place on the line, and Miss Tayler is to be congratulated on the position she has achieved. Mrs. Forster Morley, Mr. Robert Morley, Mr. W. Follen Bishop are also among the exhibitors. There are three beautiful miniatures by Miss R. Drummond, and many friends will be glad of the opportunity of seeing Mrs. Basil Martineau's fine portrait of the late Russell Martineau.

At a meeting of the Canterbury House of Laymen at the Church House on April 25, a report of the Committee on Cremation was presented by Mr. Morton Smith, of Rochester, and on his motion, seconded by Sir Richard Temple, after discussion and amendment, the following resolution was passed:—"That his Grace the Archbishop be respectfully asked to take into his consideration the desirability of a service being provided by authority, to be used in cases of cremation." It was argued that the practice was on the increase, and that a modified burial service should be provided to meet the need. Mr. Athelstan Riley objected on the ground that the House ought to hesitate before endorsing cremation as a Christian method of disposal of the dead. He admitted, however, that the question of the resurrection of the body was not affected one way or the other. Admiral Field, M.P., said they wanted to get from the region of sentiment to the realm of common-sense. Lord Playfair was right when he said that burial was a chemical process and the sooner it was achieved the better. Mr. Sydney Gedge, M.P., and others spoke in favour of cremation, and the resolution was passed by a large majority.

THE sixtieth annual meeting of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society was held on Friday, April 23, at the London Institution, the President, Sir T. Fowell Buxton, Bart., in the chair. Among the speakers were Mr. J. E. Ellis, M.P., Mr. Thomas Bailey, M.P., Mr. Joseph Pease, M.P., Mr. E. W. Brooks, and the Rev. R. Wardlaw Thompson. The following resolutions were unanimously passed:—

(I.) That this Meeting regards with thankful satisfaction the work accomplished during the last sixty years against Slavery and the Slave-trade in different parts of the world, especially in the African Continent. But it deeply regrets the great amount of Slavery which still exists, and in particular the very slow progress which has been made in carrying out the Abolition Decree of 1897 in the islands of Zanzibar and Pemba, which are under British Protectorate.

(II.) That this Meeting learns with regret that Her Majesty's Government have taken no steps to carry out their pledge to abolish the legal status of Slavery at the earliest possible opportunity in the mainland of the Zanzibar Protectorate. It views with the strongest dissatisfaction the action taken by Her Majesty's Officials in Mombasa, in June last, in administering the local custom of Slavery, and ordering a native Christian girl, with her father and mother, back to their former master, in defiance of the Instructions sent out by the Government, in June, 1897, against British subjects taking any part in the rendition of fugitive Slaves.

This Meeting protests against this anomaly, which is contrary to the spirit of British law, and a complete reversal of the tradition and policy of this country, and calls upon the Government to put an end to the hesitating policy of the past few years by issuing a Decree that:—

The status of Slavery be abolished throughout the whole Sultanate of Zanzibar, and in all British Protectorates in Eastern and Central Africa.

At a meeting of the Liverpool Council of Evangelical Free Churches, held at the Common-hall, Hackin's Hey, the Rev. J. K. Nuttall in the chair, strong feeling was expressed against the recent action of the Liverpool School Board, in the matter of the Catechism. Messrs. William Crossfield, Herbert Watts, and J. Hirst Hollowell were among the speakers, and a resolution was adopted disclaiming all responsibility on the part of the Council for the suggestion of the use of a catechism in State-aided schools. The resolution of the School Board was declared to be a distinct violation of the Education Act, calling for emphatic protest from all friends of religious freedom. One catechism, it was added, might lead to another, and a worse.

THE pathetic muteness of prisoners in the dock, resembling that of a brutally beaten horse, must often have gone to the heart of spectators in court. It is not alone "the silence of pure innocence" which "more prevails than speaking."

Once and again the gaol-bird becomes articulate, and his words too often confirm the impression which the silence of his comrades has left upon us. James Henry Day, convicted of burglary at Sheffield, put in a written statement showing that "a brutal sentence in this court in 1872," when he was but eleven years old, had utterly destroyed his life. This the Recorder declined to believe—on what ground? That since that time he has been a remarkably active criminal. The prisoner wrote:—"I was sent to prison for ten years while yet a boy. I was over nine years at Chatham under a Governor who was no more a man than the devil. I endured under him 400 days of bread and water; I was flogged four times; I was twice six months in irons; I was for two years nigh to death, and for years I worked like a galley slave to keep me alive and earn money, not for myself, but for the British Government. I did every minute of the ten years. Chatham prison was a hell, and nothing else." Doubtless it was all a matter of routine, and, perhaps, the Governor was not so much to blame as his victim thought: but what wonder that since that time, since Day emerged from this course of education at twenty-one years of age, he has been a remarkably active criminal? He was sentenced to six years penal servitude.

In a recent sermon in the Peterhead Parish Church, reported in the Aberdeen Free Press, the Rev. Dr. Stewart reviewed his experiences in a forty-five years' ministry, and showed how far he had departed from the strict orthodoxy of his earlier days. Broadening thought and a new trust in humanity and the divine purpose in the world had led him to abandon the Evangelical "scheme," and to protest against the authority assumed by the Church and the pretensions of ecclesiastical persons.

Sacerdotalism was trying to ride rampant over more Churches than one, but, God helping those who had the truth, sacerdotalism must die. He had thought over these things for years, and he put it to them whether in seeking to spread a free Christianity, a Christianity that was not tied by dogmas, and doctrines, and creeds, and forms, they were not doing more for the great end of the Gospel than anything that could be done in the name of Churches, Churches, Churches. If the Churches knew what they were losing by separation; if they knew what they were doing by holding to their fads; if they knew what they were doing by the little bickerings and bitternesses that the leaders of them are keeping alive by their silly separation! . . . He for one would be prepared to unite with every Christian body in the land, and give them all the advantages, if there were any, in connection with the Church to which he belonged, on the one condition that creeds, forms, and ceremonies should be left absolutely free to every little section or body of the great mass of the population. Let them do as they would in these things, but let them be one in spreading the knowledge of Christ and infusing his truths into the souls of humanity. Thus would the grand end of the Christian religion be most readily secured. They were not fighting for eternity. They were fighting for earth and time that ended in eternity. They were not fighting for the kirk but for the human race, not fighting for establishment or disestablishment, for voluntarism or endowment, for Congregationalism or for union among the Churches, but fighting for an end which should ignore all these things, and which should bring them at last as one up to the throne of God, emancipated from everything that can hurt or destroy, and rejoicing in the fulfilment of the Saviour's pleading.

At a meeting of the Humanitarian League on Wednesday afternoon, Mr. G. W. E. Russell moved the following resolution:—

That this meeting being of the opinion that the legislation by which bull and bear baiting were prohibited ought now to be directed to the suppression of tame deer hunting, pigeon shooting, and rabbit coursing, urgently appeals to the Government to give facilities for discussing the Spurious Sports Bill, and to make arrangements for the abolition of the Royal Buckhounds.

In supporting his motion, Mr. Russell said that some people objected to the abolition of the Queen's hounds because of their historical importance. But there was no reason why the office of the Master of the Buckhounds should not be kept, without asking the holder to conduct a hunt. This had been done in the case of the Hereditary Grand Falconer. The Master of the Buckhounds might turn his attention away from the hunting of tame deer to other things. He might become master of the Queen's collies, or keeper of the Queen's canaries, or Custodian-in-chief of the Persian cats at Windsor Castle. A man would then be able to accept the post without hesitation and without a blush.

THE Mill Hill Chapel Record for April quoted the following passage from a notice in Nature of the late Rev. Thomas Hincks, who during the time of his ministry in Leeds was President of the Philosophical and Literary Society for three years (1863-1865), and devoted much time to the arrangement of the Zoological collections in the Museum:—

"Hincks' monographs are the ripe results of independent and accurate observation, ranging over the whole area of the subject treated. He was accustomed to take a broad and comprehensive view of his subject matter; and the classification of the Polyzoa owes not a little to his insight. His last work was a series of papers published in a collected form in 1894. This volume is a most valuable record of systematic work, carried out in an admirable manner. Indeed, of Mr. Hincks' work it can only be said that he enlightened all he touched. Difficult questions were treated as by the hand of a master, and his wide knowledge and logical faculty led him to conclusions which command general assent.

"He was a man of active habits, devoted to open-air labour in his garden till near the close of his life, and it is probably owing to this that he was able to continue his scientific work till the last year or two. He was a man of singular refinement and dignity, a correct and convincing speaker, and was distinguished for the zeal with which he threw himself into all charitable and philanthropic work at Leeds, in spite of the heavy and exhausting scientific work which he undertook at a time occupied by absorbing pastoral claims. He was a conspicuous example of the type of Naturalist common in this country, who earn for themselves distinction during the leisure spared from the performance of other duties."

AN INTERESTING EXPERIMENT.—Mr. Lucking Tavener writes:—During the winter months just passed, it has been my pleasure to watch an interesting experiment with the growing youths of College Chapel, Stepney-green, E. It has been occasioned by the ever-vexing question of retaining the elder scholars in our Sunday-school. The idea was suggested to me by the work of Mr. G. F. Watts, R.A., at Compton. His principle is to get people interested in the work before you set them about it. My first winter with these Stepney youths was not successful. I adopted ordinary guild methods. Last October I tried to persuade them it would be nice to decorate the schoolroom with pictures; but they would not believe they could paint an oil painting; they had had no instruction. I persuaded them if they would follow my instructions they would succeed. I bought a large canvas and worked out a tracing of Hoffman's picture "The Boy Jesus in the Temple." I then let them watch me paint a small canvas for about half an hour, gave them paints, brushes, &c., and told them to do as I had done. Each youth was appointed to make one of the heads or hands or curtains of the picture. They had to practise on a small Academy board first; when that was done to my satisfaction, they could reproduce their work on to the larger canvas. Six months' work has been spent upon it, and the result is a very creditable piece of painting—surprising every person who has seen it. Not only is the oil painting made for the school, but eight small pictures have been made for their own homes. The whole nine pictures are on exhibition for the annual meeting, May 4, when one of the lads is to make a speech, presenting the picture formally to the school. If any of the readers of THE INQUIRER would like to see the work, may I suggest that it can be seen on Sunday afternoon after the Postal Mission Conference. (See Advt. cols.)

LONDON BAZAAR.—The Committee of the London Permanent Chapel Building Fund have been fortunate in securing as its president Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P. It will be remembered that he has just accepted for the coming year the presidency of the London District Society. As this special effort to raise not less than £12,000 has for its object the strengthening of the churches, and the development of new centres within the metropolitan area, it is a very happy arrangement that the president should be at the head of the present movement, as well as of the society which inaugurated it. Another gratifying fact is that Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, who is always ready to help forward every good work in connection with our churches, has also consented to become its treasurer in conjunction with Mr. Frank Preston.

COUNTRY AIR FOR WEAK AND AILING CHILDREN.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mrs. Aspland, £1 1s.; B. X., £2; Mrs. T. Cobb, 10s.; Mrs. Holt, £2 2s.; C. S. Kenny, Esq., £1 1s.; F. Plumtre, Esq., £1 1s.; Mrs. Rooke, £1; F. S. Schwann, Esq., £1 1s.; Mrs. Temple, £1 1s.; J. Troup, Esq., £2 2s.; X. X. X., 10s.

THE GOSPEL OF THE ATONEMENT.

"All that is essential in religious belief can be sufficiently verified by ethical experience."—Archdeacon Wilson.

"The purpose and cause of the Incarnation was this: that Christ should illumine the world by His wisdom, and kindle it to the love of Himself."—Abelard.

Few things are more significant in recent theological literature than its reticence in regard to the doctrine of the Atonement. Thought has been directed with unequalled zest and force towards the person of Christ. There is a new literature of the Incarnation, which alike in its speculative grasp and its religious power is worthy of the age of Clement and Origen and Athanasius; but the particular meaning of the Incarnation for the individual soul in its relation to God, which the various doctrines of Atonement have tried to explain, has been treated with an absence of clear and definite thought, with hesitancy, if not with silence. The reason for this state of things is easy to understand. The chief influences, which have been at work in recent years, have been scientific thought and the revived interest in Greek theology. Both have tended in the direction of more spiritual ideas of God and of human life. Both have combined to overthrow the miraculous Deism, so congenial to the temper of Latin theology. Both have helped to restore to their just prominence the Immanence of God and the spiritual nature of man. Now it does not require much speculative insight to see that the ordinary doctrine of the Atonement, or let us rather say any form of the doctrine which is based upon the theory of a divine transaction, refuses to harmonise with this type of thought. It is a simple historical fact that the speculations about the Atonement, which afterwards crystallised into definite forms of doctrine, belong not to the East, but to the West. They are coloured by the belief in the Divine Sovereignty (the transcendence of God) and the juristic theories of the Empire. Augustine's doctrine of ransom is the product of a society based on slavery. Anselm's doctrine of debt reflects the study of law and the hold which legal ideas had upon the mediæval mind. Accordingly when our thinkers began to apply the two scientific methods of experience and induction to the facts of the Christian life, and our theologians turned once more for the pivot of their thought to the Greek doctrine of the indwelling Word, who lighteth every man, it was quite natural that the former interest in the Atonement should be weakened, and the doctrine itself come to be regarded almost as a survival from a vanished world. Perhaps few men put it to themselves so clearly as this; but there has been a half-conscious feeling of unreality, as of a religious idea which refuses to blend with the prevailing temper and interest of the mind, and a consequent avoidance of the subject both in writing and preaching. And if this is true of the professed students of religion, the same may also be said, in a modified sense, of the ordinary man who is neither thinker nor theologian. For him, too, the doctrine of the Atonement has drifted into the region of unrealities. Unknown to himself, his life, his working religious convictions, are modified by the environment of vigorous and progressive thought by which he is surrounded. Old interests lose their power over him. By a thousand channels great influences from the world of thought steal into his mind. His idea of God is more spiritual. He lays less stress on what is simply marvellous, accidental and external in religion. He is learning to test religious belief more and more by experience. And the effect on his hold upon the doctrine of the Atonement, which used to be so prominent in teaching and preaching, and was early instilled into his mind as of the essence of the faith, is simply this: he may never say, I no longer believe it; he may never undergo any strong revolt against it; but he thinks less and less about it. He lets it drop into that dark corner of the mind where we keep our threadbare arguments and spectral beliefs, the rusty and useless weapons of our spiritual armoury. It is neither consciously relinquished nor intelligently maintained.

For these reasons we are not surprised at the habit of reticence in regard to the Atonement, which we have remarked on as characteristic of the theology of our time. But we have asked ourselves, how long is this habit to last? We have felt that the time must come when these religious teachers, for whom the doctrine of the Incarnation is so central and all-sufficing, must examine their own position and speak a clear and definite message in regard to this difficult and uncompromising element of the traditional theology. We have also asked ourselves, will this clear enunciation, when it comes, be only critical and negative, a mere lopping away of the dead branches; or will it be a profound re-interpretation, in the light of spiritual philosophy and ethical experience of the great facts which every doctrine of Atonement has tried to explain. The first can be done by any candid mind, however narrow its range may be; but the latter is the work of constructive thought, enriched by religious experience, and enlarged by human sympathies.

We wish, in this connection, to call attention to two recent utterances on this subject, which appear to us to be of great significance, and to be worthy of the close attention of all students of religious thought. The first is contained in a remarkable sermon on "The Abelardian doctrine of the Atonement" in Mr. Rashdall's volume on "Doctrine and Development." In this sermon there is a serious and outspoken attempt to restate the doctrine in the terms of moral and spiritual experience, and an equally frank avowal of the impossibility of believing any form of the doctrine which seems to involve a legal fiction. Mr. Rashdall explains the real meaning of Abelard's doctrine in the following words, to which he evidently desires to give his own adhesion: "The whole life of Christ, the whole revelation of God which is constituted by that life, excites the love of man, moves his gratitude, shows him what God would have him be, enables him to be in his imperfect way what Christ alone was perfectly, and so makes at-one-ment, restores between God and man the union which sin alone has destroyed. And it follows from this view of the Atonement, that the justifying effect of Christ's work is a real effect, not a mere legal fiction. Christ's work really does make men better, instead of merely supplying the ground why they should be considered good or be excused the punishment of sin, without being really made any better than they were before."

Archdeacon Wilson speaks a similar message, with much greater fullness, in his recent Hulsean lectures, entitled "The Gospel of the Atonement." It is a brave, an outspoken, and an inspiring book, a serious and masculine attempt to re-interpret some of the deepest facts of Christian experience in the light of knowledge and by the methods of modern thought. His motive and aim are clearly expressed in the following passage of the first lecture: "In my judgment, the subject which at the present moment most urgently calls for our consideration is the Theory of the Atonement. And my reason for thinking this is simple and easily stated. I have a fairly long, and fairly wide, and very varied experience of conversation with men on religion. I was a layman till I was past forty. The result of my observation is unquestionably that here, in the theory of the Atonement, in the thought of Christ's work for us, which ought to be the foundation of Christian faith, and its great charm, lies at the present time the greatest obstacle to that faith. Sooner or later all questions of faith turn on man's relation to God. And it is man's relation to God that is expressed by the theory of the Atonement." This passage prepares us for what is to follow—a plain recognition of the reasonableness of the difficulties which the ordinary man feels in regard to the doctrine commonly considered orthodox. There is no attempt to gloss over the plain meaning of language or to juggle with words. Man's relation to God is not that of a slave before his master or of a debtor in presence of a judge, and therefore the ransom theory of Augustine and the debt theory of Anselm are equally out of court. All "transactional theories" are inconsistent with the divine immanence, the life of God in the world, which is one of the great religious lessons of science. We must think of our relation to God in terms of love and of spiritual fellowship, a relationship which has been manifested perfectly in Jesus Christ, "Any teaching," he says, "which implies a commercial transfer of penalty or merit—any doctrine which is characteristically transactional rather than characteristically ethical—has become unsatisfying and even impossible. Such doctrine has outlived the thoughts of God from which it sprang; thoughts not Christian in origin, but which profoundly influenced Christian doctrine. No greater relief to doubt, no greater impulse to faith, and hope and renewed Christian energy, can be given than by setting Christianity wholly free from the incubus of this misunderstanding." And again: "Let us say boldly that the Incarnation, that is, the life and death of the Christ—for the life and death were equally necessary—is the identification of the human and the divine Life. This identification is the Atonement. There is no other." This last sentence contains the central thought of the whole book. We cannot do more than refer, in passing, to the wealth of illustration and cogent argument which the preacher brings to the support of his position; the tender and searching pages in which he explains the reason why Christ's work for us must always be connected with suffering and the cross; the warnings lest "educated people should reject truth because of the conventional and unreal, and in extreme cases even the incredible, forms of doctrine with which the world associates it"; the intense alertness to the special difficulties of the modern English mind. The whole book is alive, full of intellectual eagerness and subdued moral passion. It is the utterance of a man who knows that he has a message and has braced his mind to speak it without hesitation and without fear.

We know that there are many, especially among those who may read this article, who will interpret the facts of their experience differently, or at least in different terms, and we believe that Archdeacon Wilson himself would be the first to concede their right to do so. In a striking passage, he tells us that he "cannot believe that truthfulness and infinite care in examining and accepting religious expressions of belief, combined with a blameless and beautiful life, is other than a religious virtue of a high order." But all who are pledged to the promotion of spiritual Christianity must, surely, give a warm welcome to a book which thus transfers the emphasis of Christian theology from a transaction without us to an experience within us. We shall watch with interest the response which it awakens. It is one of the boldest and most constructive books which the Church of England has given to us in recent years.

LITERATURE.

SPECIAL REPORTS ON EDUCATIONAL SUBJECTS.*

THE attention of the readers of THE INQUIRER has already been called to the second and third volumes of "Special Reports on Educational Subjects," issued by the Education Department, under the editorship of Mr. M. E. Sadler, the Director of Special Inquiries and Reports, but the books deserve fuller notice than they then received. The first volume of the series was published in 1897, and opened with an historical sketch of Public Elementary Education in England and Wales from 1870 to 1895, followed by a miscellaneous set of papers dealing with Drawing, Domestic Economy, Technical Education for Girls, the History of the Irish System of Elementary Education, Higher Primary Schools in France, Continuation Schools in Saxony, Education in Egypt, the Education of Girls and Women in Spain, the arrangements for the admission of women to Universities at home and abroad, and other topics.

The second and third volumes were issued together, and each contains nearly 700 pages. The papers vary greatly in value and interest; some of them will hardly repay the time spent in reading them, other are worthy of the most careful and serious study. The Charity Commissioners supply an admirable account of the origin and working of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act of 1889; Mr. Sidney Webb tells the story of the London Polytechnics—institutions which have much to learn before they can claim to be supplying the metropolis with either a good secondary or technical education; Mr. Hewins sets out the ideals and programme of studies of the London School of Economics, — ambitious and elaborate enough to satisfy the appetite of the most voracious student of political science. Mrs. Bryant contributes a thoughtful, helpful paper on the "Curriculum of a Girls' School." She pleads for system and variety in teaching literature, science and art, so as to ensure that clever girls shall not have their time wasted, nor dull ones become discouraged. Parents are urged "to make a holocaust of all stupid books," and to encourage their children to read books which possess some positive merit; the scholars should be stimulated to read and talk about some of the masterpieces of English literature, including fairy tales, stories of adventure, heroic romances, novels, and poetry. Mrs. Bryant contends that there is no religious difficulty in secondary schools. We do not quite agree with her. We have known cases where Anglicanism has been pushed forward in many ways, and where freedom of thought has not been accorded to the teachers. We are afraid Lord Halifax and the Bishops would never give Mrs. Bryant herself an appointment in a school over which they had control. Her description of the Christian teaching suitable for young people would, perhaps, satisfy Broad Churchmen and Unitarians, but it falls far short of what the Sacerdotalists or even the Evangelical Free Churchmen call Christianity. We wish it were true that "in the natural order of teaching the simple practical truths on which Christians are united come first, and at the bottom we probably all believe that they matter most."

Miss Lawrence, head mistress of a girls' school at Brighton, well known to readers of THE INQUIRER, contributes a paper on "Games and Athletics," in which she pleads warmly for cricket and hockey, at both of which sports the Brighton girls seem to have done well for several years past. The games, it is contended, cause the ordinary school-work to be done with more vigour and interest, and the effect on the health and the manners of the pupils is held to be good. Physical education, as provided by the London and other School Boards, is described in several papers. One of the most valuable papers in the second volume gives a summary of elementary education in England from 1833, the date when Government grants were first made, to 1870, the date of the passing of the great Elementary Education Act. Mr. Holman's sketch of the rise of public elementary schools in England, included in the Victorian Era Series, an interesting and readable book, should be studied in connection with these special reports by all who desire to master the history and development of State-aided education in England. Sir Joshua Fitch has a paper on the "Leaving Certificates" given to scholars in primary schools in France who have passed an examination, partly oral and partly by written papers, in composition, history, geography, arithmetic, elementary science, drawing, and in one modern language. Compared with the Labour Certificate issued in England, the French method is a great advance. The Merit Certificate issued in Scotland shows a nearer approach to the Continental standard. Sir Joshua Fitch pleads for the introduction by the Education Department of a certificate which would possess special dignity, and be an object of honourable ambition to the scholars in our public elementary schools.

The third volume opens with a full description of the organisation of education in Switzerland prepared by Mr. Morant, who laments that the people of England are so backward in the organisation and support of secondary schools compared with the people of Switzerland. The greater part of the volume is occupied by a discussion of education in Germany. Mr. Sadler deals at great length with problems in Prussian secondary education for boys, with special reference to similar problems in England. "Education, as a whole," Mr. Sadler informs us, "is regarded by the nation at large as a matter of fundamental public concern. To a degree almost incredible to us, parents in the humbler orders of German society are familiar with the aims, with the privileges, and even with the programmes of the various grades of schools. . . . And in this atmosphere of national sympathy with educational aims, men of the highest learning and position in all walks of life are incessantly working for the improvement of the schools, investigating their results, canvassing their curricula, defending or urging their claims." The outcome of the highly organised system of secondary schools in Germany is not all to the disadvantage of England; for while the average boy is benefited by it, the few clever boys with strong individual capacity probably do better under the English system. If the best sides of the German system could be combined with the best sides of the English system, we should then have, according to Mr. Sadler, the best system in the world.

The curricula or programmes of work in the higher schools appended to Mr. Sadler's paper or treatise are very instructive in showing the attention given to different subjects. Religious instruction is divided into Protestant and Catholic, and a special syllabus, covering nine years' school work, is set out for each of these great denominations. "The Protestant religious instruction," we are told, "aims at bringing up the young in God's Word, and fitting them to set a good and active example in the future, both by their religious and every-day life, and by their participation in the life and work of their parish." The general aim of the instruction in the Catholic religion is "to make the younger members of the Catholic Church acquainted with the doctrines and precepts as well as with the inward and outward life and work of their Church, to strengthen them in the conviction of the truth and Divine origin of Christianity and of the Church, and to guide them faithfully to preserve their conviction diligently, to foster it, and ever inviolably to acknowledge it by living in and with Christ and His Church." Three hours a week during the first school year, and two hours a week in subsequent years, are given to religious instruction. The young Protestants have Old Testament narratives from a reading book, passages from the New Testament dealing with the principal festivals of the Church, sections of the Catechism, with and without Luther's Commentary; while texts and hymns have also to be committed to memory. The lessons are graded for the different years; during the last year at school, instruction in the Articles of the Augsburg Confession is given. The young Catholics are taught the necessary prayers, they receive brief directions on the Holy Mass, they are instructed in Confession, and they have lessons on Faith from the Catechism, and they also read stories from the Old Testament out of a Bible history. In later years they are instructed from a manual in the true Catholic Faith, excerpts from the Church history of the middle ages and modern times are studied; during the last year at school they receive instruction in morals, "especially with a view to the refutation of these tenets and aspirations of the present day which are dangerous to moral life and to social order." The boys are to be taught that the real moral life rests upon obedience to the Church as the accredited defender and interpreter of the Divine ordinances.

* "Special Reports on Educational Subjects." Vols. II. and III. Eyre and Spottiswoode, 6s. 2d. and 3s. 3d.

Mr. Sadler also contributes an article giving an account of the provision made for higher commercial education in Antwerp, Leipzig, Paris, and Havre, with the object of showing how much we in England have to learn from Continental cities. A letter by a London banker is quoted in order to prove how poorly equipped young men are in England for commercial life, compared with young men trained in Continental schools and colleges.

There are other papers in these two bulky volumes which students of educational theory and practice will find most helpful. These special reports are hardly likely to find many readers among the general public; but members of School Boards, managers of elementary and secondary schools, as well as practical teachers and inspectors, will find in them many things which will add to their knowledge; many things, too, which should stimulate their interest and raise their ideals. Mr. Holman, in his little book on "English National Education," already referred to, says:—"We have all the raw material out of which to make a splendid system of schools. There remain but two things to be done to make practically perfect our system of education—namely, to make it national and to make it educational."

RETURNING HOME.

To leave unseen so many a glorious sight,
To leave so many lands unvisited,
To leave so many worthiest books unread,
Unrealised so many visions bright—

Oh! wretched yet inevitable spite Of our brief span, that we must yield our breath,

And wrap us in the unfeeling coil of death,
So much remaining of unproved delight.

But hush, my soul, and vain regrets be still'd;

Find rest in Him who is the complement
Of whatso'er transcends our mortal doom,
Of baffled hope and unfulfilled intent;
In the clear vision and aspect of whom
All longings and all hopes shall be fulfilled.

MORAL FREEDOM AND FOREKNOWLEDGE.

SIR,—Mr. Lummis, in his lucid letter, invites me to explain more definitely the difficulty which I profess to feel when I attempt to combine free-will in man with entire prescience in God. Of course I do not contend that this combination is a direct contradiction in terms, as is the combination of divine omniscience with divine ignorance. What I do assert is, that if in the case of God this combination exists there must be a fundamental difference between God's rational insight and the rational insight which He has conferred on man. Mr. Lummis appears to think that all that is needed for the reconciliation of human freedom with divine foreknowledge is, that God should have some faculty of foresight superadded to those faculties which man possesses; but, I take it, the real state of the case is that if God actually possesses this additional faculty He has a mode of insight which is not only utterly inconceivable by man, but is of such a nature that its existence renders invalid one of the necessary principles of human thought. It is a necessary principle of thought with us that the prevision of future events is only possible when the causes of these events are of such a character that they can act only in one determinate way. But if the human will is free, it is a cause capable of choosing between two equally possible ways of acting. If, then, in the case of God prevision is possible under such circumstances, such prevision violates a necessary law of human thought. But if one necessity of human thought is thus shown to be unreal and inapplicable to God's absolute thought, there is no guarantee that other necessities of our thought are not also merely relative to us; and hence we are landed in a scepticism which excludes us from all assured insight into absolute truth. I, accordingly, see no occasion for assuming that the necessity which governs our thought does not govern God's thought also; and I agree with Dugald Stewart that "there is no absurdity in supposing that the Deity may, for wise purposes, have chosen to open a source of contingency in the voluntary actions of His creatures, to which no prescience can possibly extend."

But here Mr. Lummis, following Professor Ritchie, will assure me that a God who is not omniscient is not so perfect a being as a God who is omniscient. I must confess my utter inability to see this. For, in the first place, if I am asked, Is not God, then, "omnipotent"? I should reply that it seems to me that, so far as I can see, the essential constitution of God's own nature must largely limit His possibilities. I am quite unable, for instance, to think that God could create a universe which should not conform to mathematical principles, or could inspire laws of thought and moral ideals at variance with those which He actually does inspire. And, in the second place, I doubt very much whether God's entire exemption from the human inability to foresee the moral decisions of men would, if it existed, at all conduce to the real perfection of God's life and God's nature. Such a faculty as Mr. Lummis is anxious to secure for God would, in my opinion, really convert the inner life of the Eternal into an intolerable monotony, in comparison with which the partial ignorance of man would seem a positive blessing. It is the partially unpredictable character of much of man's moral conduct which lends the chief interest to human life, and, so far as I can see, to the life of God also. If we knew beforehand the exact nature of every man's decisions and actions in all the emergencies and moral crises of his life, would not our main interest in the actual drama of humanity, as well as in the imaginary plots of play and novel, to a large extent collapse and vanish? Why, then, are we to suppose that this essential condition of much of the intensest human interest and human happiness is not also an essential feature in the experience of God? I, accordingly, heartily agree with Dr. Martineau ("Study of Religion," Vol. II. p. 279) that "foreknowledge of the contingent is not a perfection; and if rather than have a reign of universal necessity and stereotyped futurity, He willed, in order to prepare scope for a gift of moral freedom, to set up a range of alternative possibilities, He could not but render some knowledge conditional for the sake of making any righteousness attainable; leaving enough that is determinate for science, and enough that is indeterminate for character."

Mr. Lummis further asks me in what sense I assert "that the dogma that God's life and thought exist out of relation to Time" is unintelligible and inconceivable. I certainly do not mean that this dogma is inconceivable in a similar sense to that in which "colour is inconceivable to a man born blind"; for to a rational being who has experience of certain sensations the existence of a variety of other sensations is quite intelligible and even probable. But of life and action out of relation to Time we have not, and cannot have, the faintest experience, as indeed Kant has abundantly shown; and therefore to speak of God's life and activity as out of Time, is to use language to which no positive idea or conception can possibly be attached. If God's life does so exist, then all that we can say is that our necessary ideas of the world and its changes are merely relative to our finite minds, and are wholly illusory in regard to absolute truth and reality. I see not the slightest reason for thus throwing discredit on the fundamental principles of human thought and knowledge. What we really mean when we talk of eternal principles and of eternal truths is, I think, that these principles and truths belong to the very essence of God's nature, and do not, as the phenomena of Nature do, depend on His will. Hence they have no origin and no end in Time, but are, like God Himself in whom they inhere, "from everlasting to everlasting"; but this is a very different thing from the unintelligible dogma that God's life and volitional activity are out of relation to Time.

OBITUARY.

DAVID ROUGH.

CAPTAIN ROUGH, who sixteen years ago was one of the founders of the Bournemouth Unitarian Church, was born in 1813, and had been in his day a great traveller. Many years of his life had been spent in New Zealand, and his old age was rich in memories of countries he had visited, of "perils past," of difficulties overcome, and of duties faithfully performed. On April 17 he passed away, and in a memorial sermon preached at Bournemouth on the following Sunday, the Rev. C. C. Coe spoke of him as follows:—

The dear and honoured friend, whose loss this congregation must needs mourn to-day, was a convert to our faith—a convert who was led to cast in his lot with us, by conscientious fidelity to what he believed to be theological truth. But he never relinquished his sympathy with the Church from which he was compelled to dissent, and he had the greatest admiration for the liturgy of the Church of England, which is held even by heretics to be one of the most beautiful compositions of devotional literature. But his admiration was not altogether unqualified. I recollect that he once told me that he approved of the American version of the Book of Common Prayer, and that especially he did not think that it was right to pray against sudden death. His faith in Divine providence was so unqualified that he was ready to accept all the events of life with the most absolute resignation to the will of God. He held that a good life was the best preparation for death, and that death is truly swallowed up in life—when it is a sudden transition from one sphere of life to another. He felt with the poet that

A Christian cannot die before his time,
The Lord's appointment is the servant's hour.

During the last three or four days there has recurred to my mind a scene which I once beheld many years ago in the Isle of Man. We had gone on an excursion from Douglas by a boat which touched at Ramsay on its way to the south of Scotland. We waited for its return to take us back to our temporary home. It was an hour or two late on the return journey, but we felt no tedium by reason of the exquisite beauty of that summer evening. It was one of those occasions on which the beauties of Nature are most vividly revealed and which leave an impression upon the soul which will endure as long as memory survives.

It is thus that this present scene is transfigured to those who are waiting for the messenger who shall be sent to take them home.

The day dies slowly in the Western sky;
The sunset splendour fades, and wanes and cold,

The far peaks wait the sunrise, cheerily
The goat herd calls his wanderers to the fold.

My weary soul, that fain would cease to roam,
Take comfort, evening bringeth all things home.

The swift-winged seagull homeward takes his flight;
The ebbing tide breaks softly on the sand.

The red-sailed boats draw shoreward for the night,
The shadows deepen over sea and land,

Be still my soul, thine hour shall also come,
Behold, one evening, God shall lead thee home.

The life of our departed friend teaches us, who have known him since his residence in Bournemouth, and especially during the last few years, how we should learn in advanced age or in premature weakness to wait for death, so as to lose no blessings of this life, while we are cheered and comforted by the hope of a brighter and fairer world above.

He had spent the last months of his long and useful life in jotting down reminiscences of his past; and on the very morning of the day on which he died, the last instalment of fifteen articles arrived; and while waiting to hear whether the doctor could give any hopes of his recovery—which, alas! he could not—I read the concluding paragraph of his biography, which was to the following effect:—

"I have written most of these notes during the course of my 86th year, whilst suffering a good deal of pain, which prevents me from moving about as I used to do, or from taking an active part at public meetings or social gatherings, but I hope I may still be of some little service to others, and I can still thankfully enjoy the charms of natural scenery, the beauty of trees and flowers, the sweetness of sacred or simple national melodies, and the writings of good authors, recreations which happily remain with us when our physical powers are weakened, and the mind finds its surest rest in higher aspirations, and in humble resignation to the Divine will."

This closing paragraph of his reminiscences was almost the last word that he wrote, and it will enable even an entire stranger to see what manner of man he was.

The power of the spirit to rise superior to the weakness of the flesh was illustrated in a remarkable way in the experience of our departed friend. We who have seen his bodily vigour in spite of his eighty-six years might be tempted to suppose that he had been a strong man throughout his life. But we have to remember that for many years his health was far from good, and that he was liable to those fits of mental depression, the effect of physical weakness, which are so terrible to bear. By the sheer energy of the faithful spirit he was enabled to rise superior to these weaknesses. His vigour to the very last was wonderful, considering his advanced age. His constant attendance twice a Sunday in this church, his constant visitation of poor pensioners of his at Poole, to whom he went full-hearted and not empty-handed we may be well assured; his promptness to call on, and to sympathise with, visitors of our community who had come here as invalids—the hope which he expresses that he "may still be of some little service to others"—all these things testify to the unconquerable spirit which so long defied the weakness of the flesh and the inroads of disease.

There is another characteristic of our departed friend to which I venture to refer, which probably arose from his faith in Divine Providence and his constant determination to use such strength as remained to him to the uttermost. He was one who always looked upon the bright side of things. If ever he allowed himself to speak of physical pain or mental depression, he always followed it up by saying: "But I must not complain, I have so many things to be thankful for, God has been so good to me." He always esteemed it a mercy that his afflictions were not greater than they were, and that they were not so great as to render him incapable of helping himself and altogether dependent on the assistance of others. This was no idle profession, no sham piety. It was an effective element in the victory of the spirit over the flesh, which made his life vigorous to the last.

The sermon concluded with some favourite verses of Captain Rough's, on "Growing Old," which ended:—

Eyes that grow dim to the earth and its glory
Have a sweet recompense youth cannot know;
Ears that grow dull to the world and its story
Drink in the songs that from Paradise flow, Growing old peacefully,
Peaceful and blest.

THE REV. J. W. BRAITHWAITE.

THE sad news has reached us of the death, at Halifax, on Sunday morning last, of the Rev. James William Braithwaite, until recently minister of Christ Church, Nottingham. A student of the Home Missionary Board, Mr. Braithwaite entered on his first ministerial charge at Horsham in 1867, and remained there for five years. From 1876 until 1890 he was at Idle, in Yorkshire, and then removed to Nottingham. Since his resignation of the Christ Church pulpit, on account of failing health, he had lived with a sister at Halifax. Latterly he had been a great sufferer from cancer in the brain, and it was more than he could bear. He was unmarried, and was fifty-seven years of age at the time of his death.

No! Earth has angels though their forms are moulded

But of such clay as fashions all below;
Though harps are wanting, and bright pinions folded,

We know them by the love-light on their brow.

We still see angels by the sick one's pillow;

Their's are the soft tone, and the soundless tread;

Where smitten hearts are drooping like the willow,

They stand between the living and the dead. MARGARET D. SMYTH.

THE INWARD LIFE.

Selected from Emerson.

A BREATH of will blows eternally through the universe of souls in the direction of the Right and Necessary. It is the air which all intellects inhale and exhale, and it is the wind which blows the worlds into order and orbit.

Whoever has had experience of the moral sentiment cannot choose but believe in unlimited power. Each pulse from that heart is an oath from the Most High.

There is a principle which is the basis of things, which all speech aims to say, and all action to evolve, a simple, quiet, undescribed, undescrivable presence, dwelling very peacefully in us, our rightful lord; we are not to do, but to let do; not to work, but to be worked upon; and to this homage there is a consent of all thoughtful and just men in all ages and conditions. To this sentiment belong vast and sudden enlargements of power.

Every man takes care that his neighbour shall not cheat him. But a day comes when he begins to care that he do not cheat his neighbour. Then all goes well. He has changed his market cart into a chariot of the sun.

It is true that genius takes its rise out of the mountains of rectitude; that all beauty and power which men covet are somehow born out of that Alpine district; that any extraordinary degree of beauty in man or woman involves a moral charm. Thus, I think, we very slowly admit in another man a higher degree of moral sentiment than our own—a finer conscience, more impressionable, or which marks minuter degrees; an ear to hear acuter notes of right and wrong than we can. But once satisfied of such superiority, we set no limit to our expectation of his genius. For such persons are nearer to the secret of God than others; are bathed in sweeter waters; they hear notices, they see visions, where others are vacant. We believe that holiness confers a certain insight, because not by our private, but by our public force can we share and know the nature of things.

Within every man's thought is a higher thought—within the character he exhibits to-day, a higher character. The youth puts off the illusions of the child, the man puts off the ignorance and tumultuous passions of youth; proceeding thence puts off the egotism of manhood, and becomes at least a public and universal soul. He is rising to greater heights, but also rising to realities; the outer relations and circumstances dying out, he entering deeper into God, God into him, until the last garment of egotism falls, and he is with God—shares the will and the immensity of the First Cause.

Religion or worship is the attitude of those who see this unity, intimacy, and sincerity; who see that, against all appearances, the nature of things works for truth and right for ever.

THERE is nothing that has so hindered the supremacy of religion as the struggle for ecclesiastical supremacy. The ecclesiastic is not made by his function a religious man; his position rather makes him but a statesman of narrower interests, with ambitions circumscribed by the limits of his society.—A. M. Fairbairn.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

LISTEN, children, I am first going to tell you a tiny story about three little boys and a fairy, and then there will be something at the end of the story, which may, perhaps, not be quite so nice, but which will give you something to think about.

There was once a fairy, and her name was the Spirit of Sympathy. Now, most of you know what I mean by sympathy—it is the art of feeling with or for the joys or the sorrows of other people, is it not? Well, this fairy was called the Spirit of Sympathy. Her face was such a tender, sweet face, and she had the softest, most musical voice that was ever heard. She had a way of speaking, which, whether people were sad or happy, used always to make them feel that she was sorry or glad, whichever way it was with them. One day in spring, when the daisies and cowslips were making white stars and gold in the sunny fields, and a strong fresh breeze was blowing, a little boy was going home from school. He was very happy, and somehow, what with the sunshine and the sound of the birds singing in the old pink-blossomed apple trees close by, he started off in his glee and tried if he could race with the wind. Now, he forgot that wind can travel terribly fast, even on a sweet spring morning, and his feet would not go half quickly enough, so in trying to go faster still he tripped over a stone, fell, and hurt himself. Two other little boys were playing quite close to where this one fell, and both ran at once to help him up, saying at the same moment: "Have you hurt yourself?" Now, the sweet Spirit of Sympathy was standing beside the one friend, and she touched him with her hand. And the little one who had fallen turned away from one, but let the other, who had felt Sympathy's touch, help him up and dry his tears.

That's a very little story, isn't it? But even such small stories as this one can have a big meaning. Children, have you ever noticed how two people can say just exactly the same thing at the very same moment so far as the words go, and yet, by the different tone of voice in which they speak, can each mean something quite different from the other? These two friends both asked the same question, and yet the little fellow who had fallen, turned away from one and at once let the other help him. And why did he, do you think? I will tell you. When the first one said, "Have you hurt yourself?" he did so just because he knew it was the proper thing to say. It did not very much matter to this one whether his little friend was hurt or not. He himself was strong, and although, of course, he had tumbled many a time, still being so strong he always managed to pull himself together very quickly, and was up again before anyone else could reach him. He could never see what there was to make such a fuss about just because one fell down sometimes. So, when he asked the question, the tone of his voice quite plainly showed that he wasn't a bit sorry, and that he thought the little one a great baby for crying.

But, with the second friend, things were quite different. As he said "Have you hurt yourself?" the Spirit of Sympathy stood beside him and she laid one of her firm, soft hands on his shoulder, so in his voice there was such a sweet, comforting sound that the little one knew he was sorry he had hurt himself, and turned at once to him. This one, too, had often tumbled, but somehow he had learnt, what the other had not, that, when you fall, the bruises don't hurt half so much if someone comes at once and with kind words drives back the hot tears that pain has forced into your eyes.

Oh, the sweet Spirit of Sympathy! Boys and girls, you who do not know this fairy must try and make friends with her as soon as ever you can, for apart from the good you can do to other people by being sorry for them or glad at their happiness, it will make you yourselves ever so much happier. A brother or sister or friend comes into the room where you are preparing your lessons for school next day. He or she is feeling exceedingly happy at the moment, and comes in singing joyfully. It disturbs you, and you exclaim, crossly: "Oh, for goodness sake, stop; what a noise you do make!" But before you have said all the words, you wish you hadn't spoken. For, all in a minute, you see the face change, the joyful voice is instantly stopped. And you say to yourself, sadly: "I wish I hadn't said that. How horrid of me!" Yes, children, you want Sympathy to stand beside you always. Sometimes it is much harder to show that you are glad because someone else is gay than it is to be sorry for sadness or trouble. But it's quite as necessary. Make friends with Sympathy at once, and then she will always stand beside you and lay her hands on you, whispering sweetness into your hearts.

BERTHA GUTHRIE.

A PRAYER.

LORD, let me rest in thy deep silences!
My soul sickens with the jar and strife,
I am weary of the noise and fret of men.
Let me go where thy timid creatures dwell,
Where the rabbit hides and the wild thrush nests;
Let me hear the grass grow and the pine leaves fall;
Let me breathe the wild-rose and the violet's breath;
Let me see the shadows creep among the trees,
And the still, sweet darkness coming down;
Let me feel the fulness of thy love, unbound by creed or form;
Let my faith quicken and my soul grow strong with knowledge of thy nearness;
Lord, let me rest; renew thy life within me.—Lila Frost Sprague, in the "Christian Register."

BE not always asking, "Am I cared for?" Forget that question sometimes, while you care for other people.—G. S. Merriam.

THE FOLLOWING OF JESUS.

THE unexampled popularity and enormous circulation of CHARLES SHELDON'S books, both in this country and America, are a sign of the times. Whether the question is "What would Jesus do?" or "What would Jesus have me do?" or whether it is to be "In His Steps" or "In His Spirit," the main thought is the same—that our Christianity is largely in name only, that the conditions of our life and our habitual conduct belie our professions of brotherhood, and are contrary to the spirit of CHRIST. There is a keen sense of the contrasts of life, and a widespread desire for the amelioration of social conditions. JESUS declared the love of God and the brotherhood of men; why, then, have not his followers done more to bring the life of the world into harmony with such teaching? Mr. SHELDON'S books ask this question, and attempt an answer, if they do not furnish one. They picture for us a number of earnest men and women setting themselves in deadly earnest to follow Jesus, and thus coming into direct conflict with common usages of the world. The pictures are vivid, and touch living sympathies. Their popularity shows how quick is the response at any rate of emotion to such an appeal, and there are testimonies which show that the response has not been in emotion only, but that many readers have been roused to some fresh effort of unselfish service. We may not be satisfied that the heroes of these stories are always right in their methods, or that their lines of conduct, if generally followed, would really solve the social and moral problems of our time; but the lesson of fearless loyalty and self-sacrifice is undoubtedly true and good, and we must be thankful that it has gained so wide a hearing.

In the Christian World, and subsequently in the British Weekly, there has been a large amount of correspondence on the subject of these books. The Rev. C. F. AKED, of Liverpool, wrote to the Christian World that the teaching of "In His Steps" was discouraging, and led to despair, since many ordinary people felt that it was impossible for them to be Christians in the manner described, and so gave up the attempt; and, further, that the story contained no guidance as to how humble folk, who had to earn a living and could not leave their places, were yet to follow CHRIST. Mr. AKED'S reply is that for them the duty is to live "In His Spirit," on which another correspondent put this further question in a concrete form:—

Take the commonest of all concrete cases in the business world. Here is a tradesman making a net profit of 10 per cent. On this he can live and let live. He gives fair wages, pays his way, deals justly by everybody, educates his family, keeps them in comfort and respectability, and liberally supports his church and its charities. But now comes along one of the up-to-date cutting firms. They sweat their employes and adulterate their goods, and puff and lie quite unscrupulously. Or it may be he suddenly finds himself in direct competition with some great and well-conducted company that can afford to be satisfied with 2½ per cent. The man soon finds himself face to face with ruin. How is that spirit going to help him out of his difficulty? It is of no use to say that it will enable him to endure his trouble with fortitude and serenity. Of course it will, but that is not the point. The question is not how the Christian spirit may help a man to endure misfortune, but how it is to enable him to overcome misfortune, how the man is to make it consistent with the getting of a living and the respectable maintenance of his house and the bringing-up of his family.

To this the reply would seem to be that there is no immediate deliverance from such misfortune, but that the conditions of trade thus indicated need to be reformed, and that it must be a first duty of sincere Christians to find a better way.

From another side objection is made that "to follow CHRIST" is not sufficient, since in what he was and is to the world it is impossible for men to follow him. This is the objection of the Editor of the British Weekly, who with other orthodox critics finds SHELDON'S theology sadly deficient. "All experience shows," according to the British Weekly, "that the work of CHRIST can only be done by those who have yielded their hearts to His keeping and cleansing, and who have been redeemed by His blood." And then, in what appears to us a strange scepticism of the possibilities of good in this present world, it is added: "When all the nondescript bands that are seeking—and many of them seeking with a true nobility of spirit—the redemption of the world are scattered, dead and forgotten, the ransomed Church of CHRIST will live to meet Him, when the Last Advent shines from east to west, and the fire is kindled that will try every man's work of what sort it is."

In contrast to such a frame of mind we like to think of what the word of Jesus would be to those "nondescript bands." We have an impression that in the fire that will try every man's work the orthodoxy which prompts such a criticism as the above will suffer more severely than the plain humanity of those who, with a dumb longing for true brotherhood, are working according to their light for the Kingdom of God on earth. The work of CHRIST is done by all who trust in the Eternal Goodness, and strive to live together in this world as brethren, and children of the Father in Heaven. The orthodox Evangelical declares that no one can do that who does not accept his scheme of salvation, but we do not so understand the mind of CHRIST, or the growing testimony of the noblest humanity of our day.

When we are touched by the earnest desire to be better Christians and to make the world more Christian, we may not feel that we have to follow in HENRY MAXWELL'S steps, but we shall know that we must keep close to that spirit of inspiring brotherhood which urged him on, and in companionship with JESUS must face all the facts of life. That will affect not only our personal temper, and our attitude towards all sorts and conditions of men, it will determine our estimate of the material and the spiritual treasures of life, and set us thinking and doing for the better ordering of our social state in the light of CHRIST'S ideal of manhood and the Kingdom of God.

AN ASPIRATION.

Lord, thou who didst at whiles from men withdraw

To breathe the ampler air of quietude;
Lest all the precious moments run to waste,

Be thou in spirit with me when I taste
The sacramental joys of solitude.

For, often though we yearn to be at rest,
And, on the summit of a wind-swept hill,

Persuade our hearts that Peace, whose touch we sought,

Hath soothed our soul and senses overwrought,

The voices of the world constrain us still.

But I would hear thy tender voice alone
Borne through the vagrant eddies of the wind,

And in imagination walk with thee
Upon the wave-washed shores of Galilee,

Sharing thy calm serenity of mind:

That haply, in the busy days to come,

An echo of thy voice may linger still—
Some memory of that soul-communion

Make worthier every worthy action done, Enkindle and confirm the wavering will.

LAURA G. ACKROYD.

THE DRINK CURSE, AND HOW TO DEAL WITH IT.*

BY THE REV. JAMES C. STREET.

I SPEAK to-day to a body of experts. Missionaries, whose daily duties take them into the homes of the poorest of our people, are familiar with aspects of suffering, sin, and ruin which are hidden from the gaze of the world, and known, only by hearsay, even to many of those who are zealous for the well-being and happiness of the people. Yours is no second-hand knowledge. You see with your own eyes, hear with your own ears, and handle with your own hands. I am almost one of yourselves, and know by personal observation what goes on in the "great deeps" of a city's life, and of the miseries and disorder among many lives, and in multitudes of homes.

This knowledge on your part and on mine sets me free from the awful but easy task of demonstrating the existence and potency of what is rightly called "The Drink Curse." You and I, and many thousands of others, are familiar with the ghastly and revolting features of drunkenness and its attendant vices. We meet this grim and tremendous evil every day, and our work is, to a great extent, caused and shaped by it. No question will be raised by you as to the magnitude of the curse, or as to its widespread and tangled horrors. It meets you everywhere. It challenges you at every turn. It will not rest, and it will not let you rest. Much of your work is hindered, much of it spoilt, by the recurring flow of viciousness from this exhaustless fountain of evil.

The question which you and I have to answer is, "How shall we deal with this curse?" We have not to linger on the threshold to describe it. We know it, we are ever wrestling with it. It is our greatest hindrance, and our mightiest foe. Separately and collectively, without divergence in our testimony, we all agree as to its magnitude and its insidiousness.

I may therefore pass on.

But I must set forth that we are continually dealing with the evils incessantly flowing from this chronic curse. The drunkard is ever in our path—his wife, even when she is not a drinker or a drunkard, and more so when she is, and his children in their hunger and rags and ignorance make claims upon us every day. We have to feed and clothe, to step in at every emergency, to help when accidents or sickness occur, to be ready when new babes are born, to help the mother, to reach out a hand of assistance when death strikes home, and to interpose many a time between the publican, the police, and their victims. Nobody knows as we do what goes on in the slums and hovels of the victims of the drink. Neither pen nor tongue can adequately tell the story. I suppose not a day passes but some phase of misery, suffering, and sin arising from this great curse comes before us and we have to deal with it. In more than a metaphorical sense we have to stand at the doors of the public-house, and on the side paths and near the gutters, and take charge of the endless stream of waifs and strays—the human dregs of our city life—and be of what service we can to them. Some of the help we give, especially to the children, but sometimes to the men and women, seems to be of permanent value, and our hearts are cheered thereby, but we are sensible that most of it is only a temporary palliation, and leaves little solid result of good behind it. Still, we go on. We visit, we feed, we clothe, we instruct. We form societies for thrift, we encourage self-help, we find situations, we take charge of orphans and widows, we provide amusements and counter attractions to the public-house, we reach out a hand of helpfulness to those whom every other agency of philanthropy leaves on the road sides to perish. We never give up a case—we never cease to work. We grasp at every new suggestion of usefulness from whatever source it may come, and we turn eagerly to any one who can point out yet another way of helpfulness.

No one can say we refuse to apply any remedies we know. We gratefully and with thankful hearts use all. We call in the service of the church and school, the library and playground, the picture-gallery and the concert-room. We have ever the outstretched hand—the voice of cheer and help, and, even when our hearts sink within us, and we know that we are labouring in vain, we still go on trusting that some unexpected blessing may come and that God will help us in our direst need.

But as we work, the tide of evil still flows on. We grasp the hand of victim after victim, saving a few, but the majority escape us, and we make no headway. The tide is too strong and continuous for us. The awful deeps are always about us, and, do what we will, we are overpowered.

Why is this? It is because our agencies are all in the nature of palliatives. We are giving medicine to the sick, and food to the starving; but the foul drains from the dram-shop are ever poisoning fresh victims, and the resources of the wage-earners are squandered so that poverty is always being newly-created. We are dealing mainly, if not wholly, with effects, and are leaving the causes almost untouched. I know we must deal with effects. Moral hospitals are a necessity. We cannot let the sufferers go down to the grave unhelped. Though our labours are almost as hopeless as the task of Sisyphus, yet we must go on with them, for though we cannot save all, thank God we can rescue a few.

But we must not be content with the kind of work we are doing; there is other and more promising awaiting us—if, perchance, we are not already engaged in it.

All around, at every corner, in every street the public-house flaunts its seductions before the eyes of the people. It is ever in their sight. Its glare and glitter, its brightness and warmth, are like dazzling lights to moths, and draw almost irresistibly multitudes to destruction. The contrast between their own homes and workshops and the dram-shops is so marked that the temptation to enter them is overmastering, and, once under their influence, the victims are alcoholised to their ruin. The article dealt in by the publican differs from all others that are sold. You find no difficulty with the baker, the grocer, or the draper. When you have bought what you want there you go away, and have no hankering to run back again and again to buy more. But the drink creates an appetite for itself. It always produces a craving for more. Once under the spell of its influence you cannot be satisfied. Hence the multitude of houses for the sale of this drink—the gin-shop, the saloon, the bar-parlour, the snuggery, the common tavern, the licensed grocery—act as constant and ever-present temptations to the workman as he goes to or returns from his labour, to his wife who leaves her wash-tub or her house-cleaning, and to the children as they play in the street, or go to and from school, or are the messengers of their parents to the drink-shop. The people cannot escape from the neighbourhood of the traffic. They must live where their work lies, or where houses can be had suitable to their means. There is no real freedom of choice. The wealthier classes can, to a large extent, escape. They can go where the drink-shop is not allowed to come, and where its polluting presence and influence cannot meet their eyes or demoralise their children; but it is not so with the mass of the people, and especially with the poorest of the poor. They are compelled to be cheek-by-jowl with the gin-shop, and must ever be within its sights and sounds. Hence they live in the contaminated atmosphere created by the drink, and breathe its impurities every day. One cannot wonder then that they succumb. This is, indeed, inevitable. I cannot be severe in my condemnation of them. They are drawn into the mesh of a great snare, and many of them can never escape. The publican naturally wants to sell his liquor, and though he knows it is only consumed by human beings, and that its consumption inevitably causes the ruin of many of them, he yet pushes his trade, and says he must live. He shakes off responsibility from himself. He says he does not force any one to buy; it is not his business to regulate the affairs of his customers; he cannot tell what quantity is good for them or where excess begins: all this is the business of the people themselves. Sometimes he declares his regret that many of his customers will go to excess, and that he is very sorry; and when some poor victim is driven to the workhouse, or the gaol, or the grave by his drunkenness, the publican joins in a subscription for the benefit of the wife, or widow, and her children. There is often a blind, effusive kindness shown by him which proves that he is not bereft of the sympathies which belong to our common humanity. But in the meantime the people are surrounded by the temptations, are hemmed in by the snares, and are swallowed up in the maws of a merciless evil which entices and then destroys.

It is not the public-house which is the evil. That is, I doubt not, a necessity of our civilisation. We must have places of entertainment, of refreshment, and of public resort. It is the special article which is sold in these houses. Herein lies all the mischief.

Well then, as no one is forced to go into these houses, or to buy this drink, is not the remedy close at hand? Cannot every man work out his own salvation? Is not that the right, the only way?

Undoubtedly the working men of Preston, seventy years ago, were right when they taught that personal abstinence from the drink was the perfect cure for drunkenness, and the remedy for all the evils which alcohol has brought into the world. All honour to them and their heroic successors who untiringly have pleaded with the people to reform their own habits, and so to secure their immunity from the horrors entailed by the use of intoxicants. In the region of moral suasion multitudes of good men and women have been working, and never were working more arduously and continuously than now, and the traces of their work can be seen in every city, and in every hamlet, and in tens of thousands of homes all over the world. No doubt the Churches, in some slight degree, and especially the Salvation Army and Primitive Methodists in a larger degree, have helped in this personal purification, and in the rescue of the perishing ones—and all such agencies have been even more effective in strengthening the moral sense of multitudes, and so prevented them from entering upon the downward path that leads to ruin. Along this path of personal abstinence lies the safety for the people, and those who enter it and keep in it are never in peril. But it is not an easy path to enter, or to keep walking therein while the temptations to leave it are so numerous and powerful. It requires no little heroism and strength of will to break away from a long-continued habit, from the usages of neighbours and friends, and from the ordinary customs of the world. Any one who can do this is exceptionally strong. And the mass of the people who are the victims of drunkenness are by no means strong. The task of persuading them is a mighty one, and it can only be very slowly accomplished. See how we have worked and pleaded, and prayed—see how we have spent our strength and our means, and many our lives in this service—and yet how vast is the work left undone, and how unfathomable is the depth of sin, vice, crime and ruin, which, like a great sea, surrounds, and threatens to overwhelm us.

One of our great difficulties has been, and still is, from good men and women who cannot see that total abstinence is the right method at all, and who stand aloof, frequently smile at, and sometimes ridicule our efforts in this direction. They say: "Look at us. We are not abstainers; we use with moderation, with pleasure, and advantage these drinks which you think are so dangerous—teach the people to do as we do and your work will be ended." Yes; but you set us an impossible task. The people are not situated as you are. They are not trained as you are. The moral restraints among them are not so numerous. They have not the same alternatives as you have. You have many sources of help, and pleasure, and distraction which they have not. You ask too much. Besides, have you found no danger? Is all the evil connected with drink confined to the poor and the ignorant? Look around you—in your own circles, perhaps your own homes—is yours a real remedy? At all events, I plead with you, do not hinder by boldness, indifference, or hostility those who in teaching total abstinence are undoubtedly teaching an absolute remedy for the evils we are deploring.

It is quite true that if we could induce every one to become a personal abstainer the "Drink Curse" would be removed and ended.

It is our duty, I think, to work for this, and to plead with all whom we can reach to free themselves from personal contact with this tremendous evil.

But, my friends, are we not doing this? Have we not induced many to take this step? And yet where are we now?

How many have gone back? They were not strong enough to go on. The temptations and besetments were too strong and numerous. They fell away. It is said we have between five and six millions of personal abstainers in the United Kingdom—a splendid army of moral reformers!—but the Drink Bill last year was the largest in the history of our nation, and the flood of vice and degradation flowing from it was never so great. It is the interest of multitudes of distillers, brewers, wine merchants, publicans, licensed grocers, and shareholders in drink businesses, of the classes who support our military and naval services, and of the Government that has to pay the enormous cost of our swollen armaments, that this drink business should be maintained and extended, and every one knows and feels how potent are the agencies employed to press it upon the people. There is no interest in the United Kingdom so powerful, so rich, so unscrupulous, so deadly as this of the liquor traffic. It is almost omnipotent in Church and State. It can strangle Churches, and priests, and ministers. It can silence preacher and apostle. It can touch with its feelers every other interest, seduce public servants, cripple the work of the magistracy, poison the very fountains of justice, and bring paralysis upon every good work. Let it be seen, and let it stand forth in all its hideousness, and awakened consciences everywhere will cry out, "It is a common enemy, it is ruining our people, and we must fight it and destroy it."

Is this language too strong? Far stronger has been used by the most prominent of our responsible statesmen, judges and philanthropists, and I could cull from your reports, you brave-hearted missionaries to the poor, many a passage as strong as any that I have used. But those who have looked into this awful matter, and who see the ravages day by day, can find no words strong enough in which to describe that which they know. Any way, after many years of work and observation, I declare myself incapable of finding phraseology strong enough to set forth that which I have seen, and of which I can testify.

What, then, shall we do?

Preach total abstinence? Yes, with all the persuasiveness and power we can. Use every agency we know or can discover to ameliorate the condition of the victims? Certainly, with every power God has bestowed upon us. Preach deliverance to the captives? Aye, with lips burning with the fire from God's own altar. But is there nothing more to be done? Can we not put some new power into the hands of the people themselves? Can we not inspire them with the hope that by their own efforts they can do more than strike a blow for themselves and children—they can free themselves from the presence of the public-house? At present they are as helpless as sheep driven to the slaughter. They cannot prevent public-houses being open—they cannot close a single door. They have no voice, no vote. Helpless—in the toils—they are a prey for the traffickers, and the booty of selfishness and greed. If they could deal with the public-house in their own street or court, fight an open battle with the places whose evil doings they know, would not their manhood have a better chance? and would they not be encouraged to struggle until they gained the victory? Give them, in some way, power of this kind, and you put upon them a sense of responsibility never experienced before, and you strengthen them in the work of their own true enfranchisement. At present how helpless they feel—like dumb driven cattle—but let the touch of a new power come to them, and who shall tell to what height of manliness and moral strength they shall reach? If the people could only be made to feel that the continuance, the increase, the lessening, the destruction of this Drink Curse was in their own hands, they would be quickened into a new life, and it would be like a breath from Heaven sweeping over their lives and hopes. I plead, therefore, for direct personal power for the people, that by their own voice and vote they can deal with a public evil in a public way. And even then there will still be left for you and me rich fields of labour wherein we can work for the uplifting, the purification, and the salvation of the people.

A MISSIONARY TOUR IN AUSTRALASIA.

HAVING just completed what may perhaps be described as a missionary tour, I may be permitted to say a few words on my experiences and impressions. I find I have travelled 4,200 miles by sea and land in seven weeks, preached eight times, lectured four, and been formally "welcomed" thrice. In my journey I had to touch at some celebrated places and had a peep at part of the great natural beauties of this Southern hemisphere, including Hobart Town and harbour, Dunedin, Wellington, and Auckland and Sydney, with their wonderful harbours. Had I time I might try to describe some of these scenes, though I know beforehand that any description of mine must be even more conspicuously a failure than any I have read. I am fortunately exonerated from any such task as lying outside a missionary's work. And, after all, the churches at Hobart, Auckland, and Sydney had for me a higher interest than the beauties of their surroundings.

At Hobart I found a comparatively small, but united and earnest body of workers who conduct services regularly and carry out the general work of the movement under obvious disadvantages, but with great credit to the cause and themselves and with no small advantage to the community. Hobart is fortunate in having amongst its members laymen who are well-fitted and willing to undertake the responsibility of conducting public worship, and to my appeal for a Sunday-school, volunteers of experience and ability in teaching were forthcoming at once. The population is not large—some 37,000 in all—but the conditions on the whole are distinctly favourable to the growth of a strong and self-supporting church, which would discharge a most necessary function in the religious life of the place. I met with many expressions of sympathy and discovered an amount of goodwill to the movement that was cheering and markedly encouraging. Some two families and a few individuals joined the church during my visit, and these accessions constitute a substantial addition to the preaching power of the congregation as well as a numerical and financial gain. The formation of a Sunday-school is evidence of earnestness and desire for work, and the establishment of a minister's sustentation fund evinces determination and a healthy spirit of self-help, which I hope will soon be crowned with success in the form of an energetic and enthusiastic minister, who will find very able and loyal co-operators. In the meantime, I hope to be able to render them occasional assistance.

Auckland is, in many ways, unlike Hobart: it has a population of upwards of 60,000; is a large mercantile centre, with a growing shipping trade; and is, further, the centre of a large tourist traffic with the hot lakes and surrounding districts, and seems destined to become, from the natural advantages of its position and climate, a large residential settlement for Anglo-Indians and others who cannot endure the severities of a Northern winter or the violent extremes of the Australian mainland. I have already sent a full report of what I saw here to the B. and F.U.A., and can only now say that I met some fifty-six people, mostly men, who have pledged themselves and their means to the loyal support of a minister, should one be sent out. The field is very large; the work would for a time be very difficult; but neither the people nor myself have any serious doubt about the ultimate issue. In one way Auckland is less fortunate than Hobart, in that it has far less preaching power in the congregation, hence the need of a minister is very urgent. The feeling against us and our work is decidedly bitter, so far as the churches are concerned; but there is a very large element quite uninfluenced by this bigotry, and prepared, to a considerable extent, to support us. And there is a really solid and splendid nucleus to begin with. And just now the ground is entirely unoccupied, and we have an almost unequalled opportunity in this "Corinth of the Pacific." Shall we use it?

From Auckland to Sydney is a four days' journey of some 1,281 miles. Having engaged to preach in the Unitarian Church, Hyde Park, I was met at the boat by some members of the Church Committee, and received a hearty, but informal, welcome from the Committee itself at a private conference, which welcome was repeated in a public manner in the church on the following Thursday night. I cannot too much thank our friends at Sydney for their kindness and cordiality to me during my visit. The Sydney Church has just passed through a very severe crisis, as is known, the gravity of which cannot be over-estimated. I am glad, indeed, to be able to report that there are signs of a recovery which, if it be not very speedy, is, I think, sure. The morning congregation was somewhat small, but it was as large or larger than it has been for some years, and the evening one was at least three times the size of the morning, and seemed intelligent and earnest. Numerically and otherwise, it was distinctly a good congregation, especially as the night was wet and otherwise unpropitious. Dr. Zillmann, who is now ministering to the church, is a gentleman of culture and power, and he and his wife are working very hard indeed to build up the church again, and he is supported by a united and earnest Committee and congregation. The subscriptions have increased by a substantial amount, and it is hoped that the financial strain will soon be finally terminated.

The condition of our churches out here is not satisfactory. The reasons are many and various, and I cannot discuss them now; but the impression left on me by my journey, as well as by my experience in Melbourne, is that we need (1) a drawing together of existing churches to strengthen the feeling of comradeship, and to encourage and stimulate each other in our work by breaking down the isolation of our church life; and (2) a good missionary, with heart and soul on fire to inaugurate services at some of the large centres of population where our work is urgently needed and we could do much good. I know that many appeals are made to the generosity of our friends at home, and seldom made in vain, and it is only after long and anxious thought that I venture to add to their number. But I feel that we are not doing what we might do, nor all we ought, if we leave Australasia out of our account. If a man were sent out here on a three years' mission to break up new ground and to revive the interest and deepen the life of our churches, I feel convinced that much good could be done, and the necessary money would be well spent. I, therefore, respectfully appeal to the Unitarians of England to help us in Australia to extend our work and power for good. R. H. LAMBLEY.

THE AUSTRALIAN CHURCH.

THE progress of the liberal faith in the Australian Colonies is not to be judged entirely by the number of churches bearing the Unitarian name. For a number of years there have been three distinctively Unitarian Churches, in Adelaide, Melbourne and Sydney. Thirteen years ago the Rev. Charles Strong, who had been pastor of the leading Presbyterian congregation in Melbourne, was appointed minister to a new religious organization which assumed the title "The Australian Church."

Two years ago the Rev. Donald Fraser, M.A., of the Presbyterian Church in Newcastle, New South Wales, "came out" with almost his entire congregation and established an Independent Presbyterian Church. The title was, later on, changed to "Australian Presbyterian," and now, so as to "fall into line" with other similar societies, the title is simply "Australian Church."

Last year, when I resigned my position as minister of the Hyde Park Unitarian Church, my friends urged me to remain in Sydney, so I consented, and we established an "Australian Church" in this city.

During the present year, a young and promising minister of the Wesleyan Church at Lucknow, a mining town in New South Wales, has "come out," and first established an Independent Wesleyan congregation, and then also fallen into line by joining the new "Australian Church" movement.

In Melbourne the Rev. Dr. Strong preaches in a large and handsome church. The morning congregation is a very fair one, but that in the evening numbers from seven hundred to over a thousand. In Newcastle the services are at present held in the large and very comfortable theatre. The building is frequently crowded on Sunday nights. In Sydney we have occupied the somewhat dismal Protestant Hall for nearly six months, but will shortly be removing to the Oddfellows' Temple. We had crowded congregations at the inaugural services, when the Rev. Dr. Strong visited us, and since then our evening congregations have sometimes numbered about five hundred. In Lucknow and the adjoining circuit there are supposed to be about a thousand adherents, but I am not personally acquainted yet with this latest addition to the ranks.

The objects of the "Australian Churches" have been thus defined, and accepted by each society:—

1st.—The establishment of a free, progressive, and unsectarian religious brotherhood, untrammelled by any final dogmatic theological creed or priestly ritual.

2nd.—The united worship of God in spirit and in truth.

3rd.—The preaching and teaching of a gospel of divine love and humanity, as proclaimed by Jesus of Nazareth, interpreted in the light of growing knowledge and human needs.

It may be said that there is nothing in such a programme inharmonious with the principles and intentions of the distinctively "Unitarian" churches; why, then, for instance, should I have severed my connection with the Sydney Unitarian church? My action was not prompted by any change of opinion upon religious ideas or beliefs, but I will confess that I have come round to the opinion of Dr. Martineau (as expressed in a very kind letter to me about twelve years ago, when our new church was being built in Melbourne) that the name "Unitarian" is not desirable as the badge of any society of liberal Christians.

The congregations of "Australian churches" presided over by Dr. Strong in Melbourne, the Rev. Donald Fraser in Newcastle, and the Rev. Matthew Walker in Lucknow, would not have adopted the title "Unitarian"; and even here in Sydney, while the membership of the Unitarian church varied between seventy and eighty, our new movement has already over a hundred financial members.

There is no feeling of antagonism, so far as I am aware, on the part of our Australian Churches, to the Unitarian Churches—as such; indeed, any show of such unfortunate sentiment is rather from the other side.

In these colonies there are liberal-minded men and women who do not desire to become identified with old-world controversies, and they have a feeling that by leaving (say) a Wesleyan church and joining a Unitarian church they simply leave one sect for another. They rather like the idea of an Australian Church, which professes to be "free and unsectarian," and in time, we trust, they may throw their energies into the new movement. Some of us are presumptuous (or hopeful) enough to believe that our "free and unsectarian" congregations are but the germ of a great and comprehensive and truly liberal Australian Church in the future.

Speaking of myself, my sentiments toward the Unitarian movement in Great Britain and in America remain precisely as they were, and after twenty-three years' service under "the flag" I am certainly not conscious of any disloyalty to the cause of Liberal faith when joining the new movement, especially when I remember that by doing so I bring myself yet more nearly into harmony with one so honoured and revered as the Rev. Dr. Martineau. If permitted, I will occasionally send to my old friend, THE INQUIRER, particulars as to the progress of our Australian Churches.

MRS. BROOKE HERFORD ON "BAZAARS."

At a meeting of the Women's Congregational Union of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, held on Thursday afternoon, April 20, the subject of the forthcoming London Bazaar was brought forward. Mrs. Brooke Herford's paper, in introducing the subject, was of more than local interest, and we are glad to commend it to our readers. It was as follows:—

"I have all my life," said Mrs. Herford, "been one to cry aloud against bazaars, and to hold off from recommending them. There is always a great deal to be said against them, but I have found out that the evils can be lessened, and have been lessened, and the good they do lies deeper than the money obtained. Experience of this has made me change my opinion, and makes me feel that I must stand up here and speak in favour of one. I know I am speaking to many who have the same prejudices I had, but can hardly have had the same opportunities of seeing the good side. I think, as a body of Christians, we Unitarians, more than any other denomination, find it difficult to give a good and strong pull together. Individualism is run almost to death amongst us. And that person spoke the truth who said Unitarians seem to consider it a confession of weakness to entirely agree with any one. Now, one good feature of working for a bazaar is, that it strikes at the root of this Individualism.

"We are all well acquainted with some of the very reasonable objections to bazaars; we have all used them at one time or another, and much is said about the way in which the money required could be got by subscriptions. Comparatively easily does the person get off who writes a cheque for a large sum, or the one who sends a shilling; and this method of obtaining money may seem very simple to the on-looker, who knows nothing of the labours of the collectors—many journeys, many letters, long and much entreating done with more diffidence and dislike than they get the credit for.

"Some say a ball! I dare say the money could be raised by a ball, or by subscriptions, but not with the little trouble that is supposed—and without the good which I consider justifies a bazaar.

"The good I speak of is the opportunity for bringing together the congregations of a district working only as a general thing for their own interests in an isolated way.

"An attempt has been made in London to overcome this isolation by bringing the congregations together socially, each congregation inviting in turn some others to their congregational parties. These hospitalities are good in their way; but much more is gained by co-operation in work for a common interest, the organising of it covering many weeks of meetings.

"Many very small congregations in the North, so pressed with their own needs and giving all they thought they had to spare for the support of their own chapel, felt it was very unreasonable to be asked to do or give anything for the great Manchester bazaar. A little encouragement, however, started them working; and in one such congregation the factory girls met in the evenings, and were taught to make pretty and really saleable things. And apart from the good these girls got from learning to do such nice work, this little congregation has learnt a lesson in unselfishness; and the small help it was able to give by this work—bringing it into a fellowship with more important churches—has strengthened and encouraged it, as no giving of shillings or half-crowns could have done. I know this to have been true of many small churches. And though our own church, being one of the largest and strongest, may not need such encouragement, yet I feel sure that it will be a gainer by heartily co-operating both in the giving and the working which are required for the success of this coming effort to place our London work on a stronger basis."

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

THE YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

ONE Sunday evening of last month I had a congregation considerably in excess of our average attendance. On the way home I was moved—by some good spirit was it?—"lest I should be exalted above measure," the scanty measure of a Unitarian minister—to look in at a large Methodist chapel from which the last loiterers after service were slowly straggling out. A courteous attendant at the door at once took me in charge and showed me round. There were sittings, he explained to me, for 2,500; but they were obliged to provide chairs for every available free space, as their usual numbers on the Sunday evening were more than they could accommodate. Indeed, that night with just the ordinary service and the regular preacher, there was evidence enough that the place had been packed with people. And I? why my "splendid congregation," as kind and enthusiastic supporters called it, was perhaps a little more than one-tenth of the number of these Methodists. I hope there are brethren who are more successful in attracting numbers than I have ever been; but I am sure that the most popular preacher of us all would count that service an extraordinary success which attracted one quarter of the people who habitually frequent the Methodist church of which I speak. No, if we are to judge ourselves by numbers, we must all alike stand condemned as miserable failures. The poor joke at women's expense by which Plautus got a laugh out of a Roman audience will literally apply to our congregations:—

Nam optima nulla potest eligi; alia alia Pejor est.

There's no one of us can be called excellent, judged by the standard of other denominations, only some are worse than others. We are not dead, that is evident. We are not dying; for dying men grow worse and weaker, and our churches are not, as a whole, weaker or less useful than they were twenty years ago. But by the rule of proportion we are failures. State it thus:—

As Unitarianism is to Methodism or Ritualism, so should the numbers attending Unitarian churches be to the numbers attending these other places of worship. But they are sixty-fold, they are a hundred-fold of our number, the frequenters of Trinitarian churches, therefore Unitarianism is worthless in comparison with other forms of Christian faith.

Let who will accept the conclusion; and "whosoever is fearful and afraid" to be in company with so few, opposed to "a host which is as the sand by the seashore for number," to such a one the wisest and kindest advice is that of Gideon, "Let him return and depart early"; early, because his presence in our midst is to our injury and his own, and soon or late he will probably go with his heart full of bitterness and disappointment. For my own part, I am convinced that few as we are we shall remain few, the orthodox churches have nothing to fear from us, victory as of the valley of Moreh we are not foolish enough to anticipate, perhaps do not even desire it.

For Unitarianism is not a body of doctrine like Calvinism, and Unitarians do not pretend to be "the Church," militant on earth against all forms of faith different from their own. It is for principles we stand rather than for propositions, and if we maintain these principles effectively, if we make them known to all who want to learn, and train the children up in right understanding of them, we are doing well and prospering, though our numbers remain very few.

From this point of view, which I believe to be the true and just one, I can report well of the general state of the churches included in the Yorkshire Union. Since I last wrote we have had three notable "functions," which all went off most satisfactorily, and beside their immediate success gave gratifying proof of life and vigour in our midst.

First came the bazaar at Huddersfield, a small event whose issue was of great importance to the congregation which promoted it. Fitzwilliam-street Church is a handsome building and very well situated, passengers by train may see it on the right as they enter the station from Leeds, and if not told will certainly not guess that it is only "a Dissenting chapel." But for thirty years past the cause so worthily represented in stone has suffered sorely from misfortunes of a curiously varied sort; and at one time the church was closed for many months—some thought, and some hoped, that it was closed for ever. It was owing chiefly to the vigour and determination of our veteran secretary, Mr. Blazeby, that service was resumed, and for a time, with the help of a large grant from the Union, things went well under the pastoral charge of Mr.—and I must add, in mere justice, Mrs.—Rawlings. Then came new difficulties, the pecuniary ones bad enough but by no means the worst. The debt increased year by year, and some, faint-hearted and discouraged, were of advice to give up the effort altogether. Happily better counsels prevailed; it were indeed shame upon Yorkshire Unitarians if we could not hold our own in a large and thriving town like Huddersfield. With the advent of Mr. Mellor, who was welcomed by, I believe, a quite unanimous congregation, there came a general improvement, and the bazaar has put new heart into all. It was to have been opened by Lady O'Hagan, but she was detained on the Continent at the time and made generous amends for her failure to keep her engagement by a donation of fifteen guineas. The result was that, after paying expenses (about £25), a balance remains of £208, enabling the treasurer to meet all the liabilities for which he was responsible. As the energetic and able secretary, to whom so much of the success is due, writes to me:—"Now every penny of indebtedness has been paid and we are left with about £38 in hand." It may seem but a small thing, and a cheque from one of our rich and generous friends would have done it without trouble, but it represents a great effort on the part of a congregation of whom none are anything near rich in the common sense of the word, and they deserve to be congratulated on their perseverance under many difficulties and the happy issue out of them which they have at present obtained.

The day following we had a real triumph at Bradford, and Mr. Ceredig Jones was rightly jubilant over it. "The proudest day of my life" he called it, in his evening speech, and he had good cause to be proud, for there has been no such occasion of rejoicing at Chapel-lane for forty years past, and it is due to the minister's tact and labour and persistence that so much has been accomplished. Of course he could not have done it alone. He had a willing and active treasurer, Mr. Byron Boothroyd, and a united congregation, without whom he had himself counted for nothing; but, after all, I venture, minister though I am myself, to say that everything depends upon the minister. If he is inefficient, tactless, unpopular, indifferent, the congregation will be like himself and nothing will be done. When good work is being accomplished, though the minister may give nothing and have little share in it, yet is it sure evidence that he is doing his part, and inspiring willing givers and workers to do their best for the cause. The occasion of the Bradford jubilation was the opening of the new schools, which have been erected at a cost of about £1,500. The formal declaration was made by Miss Brown, of Leeds, who, in her interesting speech, referred to the connection of her father, well known here as a former treasurer of the Leeds Infirmary, and one of the old-time pillars of Mill Hill Chapel with Bradford, and subscribed £50 to the Building Fund in memory of him. The congregation have every reason to be gratified at the success which has attended their efforts, and not satisfied with having raised £1,500 are intending to make it £2,000 by means of a bazaar in October next, and so put the chapel in thorough repair, and make some much needed improvements. Meanwhile, the new schools are already doing good work; there are now 265 scholars on the books, but what is most remarkable, about half that number are over sixteen years of age. Indeed, Bradford has set a conspicuous example of "How to retain our elder scholars"—that problem we are accustomed to hear debated, often with little profit, at Sunday-school gatherings. They have also a "Young People's Guild," with a membership of over a hundred, which has been now twelve years in existence, and done much to keep faithful and united those upon whom the future of the church depends. It is difficult to discuss the condition and prospects of Unitarianism in general, but, assuredly, Chapel-lane Chapel in particular is not dying, but very much alive.

The third event to which I alluded is too recent to speak yet of its success, and no reports have reached me. But the opening of the bazaar at Dewsbury on Saturday last certainly gave promise of good returns, for despite the wretched weather, the room was more than comfortably crowded. As a rule, I would rather see a layman in the chair on such occasions—especially when we have amongst us men who give distinction to any post they fill, and who are always ready to be of service; nevertheless, I was glad to take the chair for Lady O'Hagan who opened the bazaar, for I deeply honour the courage and fidelity with which she and her family have adhered to an unfashionable and unpopular faith. If all in high social position who share our beliefs as well as our disbeliefs were to declare themselves and come forward to help, as this distinguished family has done, there would be no doubt in the minds of any, friends or foes, about the future of our cause. In my next letter I shall be able to tell about the result of this bazaar. I will content myself meanwhile with saying that some of us who have been anxiously watching the course of affairs at Dewsbury begin to feel very hopeful, the congregations are good and increasing, and a spirit of self-reliance before unknown now begins to make progress.

The one gloomy outlook among our Yorkshire churches has been in the metropolitan city. I have heard rumours of an approaching settlement, and I earnestly hope that before long the clouds which have so long overhung this ancient and venerable place of worship will have rolled away, and St. Saviourgate Chapel have a pastor not unworthy of the distinguished men who have beforetime occupied its pulpit.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Appeal: Mansford-street Church and Mission.

—Miss Dora Cadman writes:—"May I appeal to any of your readers who have old clothing and other articles in their homes which they would like to get rid of to send a parcel to The Parsonage, Mansford-street, Bethnal Green, E., for the jumble sale which we purpose holding in the school during the last week in May? The goods will be of great use to some of our poor people, and the proceeds of the sale will be given to the London Bazaar Fund as part of the contribution from Mansford-street Church.

Astley.—The annual school sermons were preached by the Rev. J. E. Stead, of Park-lane. The anthems, "How beautiful upon the mountains" (Spinney), "Seek ye the Lord," and the "Gloria" were rendered by an augmented choir. Numerous friends were present from neighbouring congregations. The evening congregation was exceptionally large, the school having to be thrown open, over four hundred being present. Collections and donations amounted to over £20.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—The Sunday-school anniversary services of Waverley-road Church were held on Sunday, April 30, when sermons were preached by Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal, of Manchester College, Oxford, the Rev. William J. Clarke, of Hurst-street Chapel, and the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Kidderminster. The collections amounted to £6 4s. 6d.

Blackpool: Bank-street.—On Wednesday, April 26, a special congregational meeting was held to consider the resignation of the Rev. William Binns. A resolution, moved by Mr. Thomas Underwood, seconded by Mr. Charles Pollard, was passed, regretfully accepting Mr. Binns's resignation, and bearing warm testimony to the value of his services during the six years of his ministry at Blackpool. Mr. Underwood spoke of the literary labours and eloquence of Mr. Binns, and the great loss the Sunday-school would suffer in Mrs. Binns's retirement from its superintendence.

Blackpool Unitarian Lay Church.—The anniversary service took place on Sunday evening last in the Masonic Hall, South Shore, where services are held all the year round. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin officiated, and gave an excellent sermon on "The Practical Test of our Principles," the leading idea being that the only real test of the value of either a theology or a church was to be found in its effect on the character and the life. The Hall was beautifully decorated, and special music was rendered. Every seat was occupied, and the collection amounted to £10 0s. 6d. At the close of the service, Mr. J. M. Taylor, until this year the secretary to the church and school, was presented with a little token of good wishes to him and his family, for health and happiness in their new place of residence.

Burnley.—Mr. Councillor James Bibby, the president of the Trafalgar-street Unitarian Church and one of the superintendents of the Sunday-school, was recently appointed chairman of the Guardians of the Burnley Union.

Choppington.—On Saturday last, despite the worst of weather, a very successful sale of work was held at this church. Mrs. Baxter Ellis, of Newcastle, performed the opening ceremony, and was accompanied on the platform by her husband, Alderman Baxter Ellis, Robert Elliott, and the Rev. Arthur Harvie (minister in charge). A concert was given in the evening by Newcastle friends. The net result of this effort is a sum of nearly £60, which will be devoted to repairing the building, providing new stove, hymn-books, &c.

Chorlton-cum-Hardy.—The congregation which meets at the Masonic-hall has sustained a severe loss in the death of Mr. Charles Scholes, an active, earnest, and universally respected member of the church. His remains were interred in the burying-ground of the Unitarian Chapel at Blackley, on Monday, April 24, and last Sunday the funeral sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Ruddle at Chorlton-cum-Hardy. In the course of his sermon, Mr. Ruddle said:—"Of those who knew him best none has forgotten to mention the gentleness of his character; every one knew the delicate sensitiveness of a soul that never could be rude or unkindly or unfair, that could only be as much astonished as pained if any should wish to be ungentle towards him or towards others. . . . It is comforting to be able to say that in greater measure than in many cases is possible the sterling worth of his character received recognition while he yet lived and worked among us."

Clifton.—During April a course of Sunday evening lectures by the Rev. J. Warschauer on Mr. Sheldon's "What would Jesus do?" has attracted good congregations. The lecturer, after giving some account of the book, pointed out that the real reason of the success it had achieved was to be sought in the emphasis laid by the author upon the doctrine of the universal Fatherhood of God, and the necessity of working out salvation by character and action, and, further, in the fact that the Jesus of Mr. Sheldon was in essence human—a perfect Man whom his brothers were capable of imitating. In this sense the enthusiasm with which the book had been received was a triumph of Unitarian principles. At the same time, as a subsequent lecture, entitled "The Failure of Formula," showed, it was not by the adoption of a motto that the regeneration of the world could be accomplished; had the remedy for moral and social ills been such an easy one, humanity would have discovered it and acted upon it ere now. The solution of the problems that pressed upon us was not so simple, and Mr. Sheldon's book, with its rash generalisations, bore witness to sympathy with the submerged classes rather than to a careful study of social conditions. In a concluding lecture, "Following Jesus—in Letter or in Spirit?" the imitation of externals was deprecated as at once ineffective, unspiritual, and in the present instance quite impracticable; every age had its own problems and needs—those of the England of to-day were neither those of the Athens of Pericles nor of the Palestine of Jesus. What we were to imitate in Jesus was rather his spirit, his boundless love to God, his resignation to his Father's will, his singleness of purpose, his love to mankind. In this way, and in this way only, though external conditions might change, he was still the supreme Exemplar, not of an age but for all time, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

Coventry.—A well-attended conversation took place in the lower schoolroom of the Great Meeting on Wednesday, April 26, the choir and a number of other friends contributing to the pleasure of the evening.

Crewes.—The annual report of the Free Christian Church shows that progress has been made both in church and school, and it is hoped that before the end of the present year the whole of a long-standing deficit may have been cleared off, and funds be secured to renovate the organ. To this end a sale of work is projected for next winter. The Rev. R. S. Redfern makes an earnest appeal for more teachers in the Sunday-school and for more regular attendance, especially at morning service.

Dewsbury.—A bazaar in aid of the funds of Unity Church was opened last Saturday by Lady O'Hagan, who, in wishing the congregation success in their work, reminded them that it was not the material, but the spiritual, prosperity of a community that must be sought after. She trusted that the result of the bazaar would inspire them with renewed zeal and courage for fresh efforts. A vote of thanks to Lady O'Hagan was moved by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds, the Rev. Charles Hargrove being in the chair. On Monday the bazaar was opened by the Mayor of Dewsbury, and on Tuesday by Mr. R. Thornton, a member of the congregation. The proceeds amounted to over £300.

Dukinfield.—The Chairman and members of the Dukinfield Urban District Council, together with the members of the School Board, and other public and philanthropic bodies, attended service at the Old Chapel last Sunday morning, when the Rev. H. S. Tayler was the preacher.

Liverpool Sunday School Society.—The annual soirée was held on Thursday, April 27, at the Unitarian Institute, Mr. F. Robinson presiding. There were about fifty members and friends present, including the Revs. Dr. Klein, J. Crowther Hirst, J. L. Haigh, J. Morgan Whiteman, and T. Lloyd Jones. Miss H. M. Johnson, who was appointed visitor for the past year, read her report of the eleven schools forming the Society. She gave a detailed account of the teaching in each school, showing that in most classes really good religious instruction was being given; and she was greatly impressed by the reverence shown by all scholars during the hymns and prayers, and by the marked improvement manifested since she visited the schools ten years ago. On the motion of Dr. Klein, seconded by Mr. Richard Robinson, a resolution was passed expressing sincere sympathy with the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, the retiring president, and regret at his enforced absence owing to ill-health. Miss F. Melly drew the attention of the teachers to the recent action of the School Board in adopting the Free Church Catechism, and expressed a hope that they would all earnestly strive to impart to their scholars a greater love of freedom in religious thought and a more earnest desire to seek after the truth. Miss J. McConnell, the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Cooper also took part in the discussion. The Rev. W. J. Jupp was elected president for the coming year; Mr. F. Robinson, vice-president; Miss Burroughs, 41, Rodney-street, hon. treasurer; and Miss A. Hall, 1, Sandringham-drive, hon. secretary.

London: Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel.—Flower services were held on Sunday last, when the services, morning and evening, were conducted by the Rev. Frederic Allen, and a children's service in the afternoon by the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., who had a large congregation of young people to address. The chapel was decorated with flowers (sent by kind friends in the country), which were distributed in the neighbourhood on Monday. Special hymns were sung at each service, with two anthems in the evening. The winter session of the Literary and Social Union and Unity Temperance Society concluded on April 17 with an "at home," given by the President and Mrs. Allen. This was held in the Lecture Hall, and the proceedings were of a very pleasant character.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. F. K. Freeston, who is at present abroad, announces in his "Church Calendar" that he hopes to resume his duties on the second Sunday in June. During the present month the services are to be conducted by Mr. Herbert Rix, B.A., and the Rev. J. E. Stronge, of Kilburn, has kindly undertaken any sick visitation or other pastoral duties for which there may be need.

London Sunday School Society.—The seventh annual musical festival was held at Essex Hall on Saturday evening, April 29, conducted by Mr. F. W. Turner. The children of eleven schools took part in the festival—namely, Bell-street Mission, Blackfriars Church and Mission (Stamford-street), Brixton, George's-row Mission, Hackney, Highgate, Islington, Kentish Town, Limehouse, Mansford-street Church and Mission, and Stoke Newington-green. The schools were distinguished by differently coloured scarves, and occupied the greater part of the body of the hall, the audience being chiefly in the gallery. The chair was taken by Mr. F. W. Lawrence, M.A., who after the singing of an opening hymn, welcomed the schools, and said that each year a larger number of schools took part in the festival. In former years a competition had been held, that evening there would be no competition, but in the concert that was to be given the choirs would render music of a higher and more difficult character than before. The banner won in the competition of last year by the Highgate choir was then delivered up to the President, to be held by the Society until again awarded. In taking his place as conductor, Mr. Turner explained that while he had held rehearsals of various sections of the united choirs, the difficulties of all meeting together in London were so great that only one united rehearsal in the hall had taken place. The concert which followed was given entirely by the children and teachers of the schools; the Limehouse band contributing one item, as overture to the second part of the programme, with great spirit. Except for a little faltering in the first duet and chorus, Mendelssohn's "I waited for the Lord," of which the music is difficult for children, the whole programme was rendered without a hitch, and was thoroughly enjoyed by the whole company. The body of children's voicessinging without accompaniment and with admirable precision and expression produced a result on which the choirs are to be warmly congratulated. Indeed, such a concert might well have been given in a larger hall, and to a much larger audience. The united choirs gave four pieces; the choir of Stoke Newington-green gave a trio, "The Swallow"; Highgate Choir, a "Sleigh Song"; and Mansford-street choir, Mendelssohn's "I would that my love"; while solos were contributed by Mrs. Teasdale, Mr. Savage Cooper, and Mr. W. J. Clark. During the interval refreshments were provided for the children. At the conclusion of the concert, the President having been obliged to leave earlier, Mr. Turner spoke a few earnest words to the children, and after a closing hymn, pronounced the Benediction. One question asked during the evening may be here repeated for the consideration of those directly interested in the schools, "Why are there so few boys' voices in the choirs?" There were no votes of thanks passed, but that was from no lack of warm appreciation of the efforts of all those who had contributed to the success of a delightful evening.

Mossley.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached, morning and evening, by the Rev. C. Roper, B.A., of Manchester, and in the afternoon by the Rev. J. A. Pearson, of Oldham. There were large congregations, and the collections amounted to £49 14s.

Nantwich.—Last Sunday the Rev. J. Morley Mills preached on "Cromwell, Protector and Liberator." The Nantwich Guardian gave a good summary of the sermon, which was an eloquent tribute to the great Protector.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last, when appropriate sermons were preached by the Rev. J. E. Manning, M.A., to large congregations, especially at the evening service. Special hymns and anthems were well rendered by the children, and the collections were in excess of those of the last two years.

Shepton Mallet.—The work of the Unitarian Circle closed on Wednesday, April 26, with a very successful social meeting in the schoolroom, over fifty being present. During the evening an orchestral band rendered some excellent selections of music to the delight of all. Songs and recitations were also given. A stall of work occupied one end of the room, and gave pleasing evidence of the activity of the sewing meetings in the various articles displayed, nearly all being disposed of, the proceeds of which will enable them to materially assist the various agencies of the chapel. In supporting a vote of thanks to friends for their kind assistance, the Rev. L. T. Badcock stated that the session had been a most useful and instructive one, several lectures having been given, one by himself, and others by Mr. Phillis, Mr. Higgins, the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, and Mrs. Broadrick, while the stall in that room did not represent half the amount of work which the sewing meetings had succeeded in producing, as the greater part had been distributed among the poorer families in connection with the Sunday-school.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

WE publish in another column the list of Whit-week meetings, which promise to be of great interest. Already a considerable number of ministers have signified their intention of being present, and we may look forward to a large attendance of other friends also. Mr. Wicksteed's Essex Hall Lecture will be a timely and valuable utterance, which should not be missed. At the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association a welcome innovation is proposed. After the regular business in the afternoon there is to be an adjournment for tea, and then, in the evening, special addresses by the President and others are to be given on "Our Word and our Work."

THE proceedings of the Tsar's Peace Conference, which is to assemble at The Hague on Thursday next, will be watched with the keenest interest by the friends of international goodwill and humanity all the world over. This month's Concord contains an interesting article by Mr. Hodgson Pratt on what he looks to the Conference for, in the direction of a Council of Mediation, a High Court of Nations, and an International Code. There is also an article by Dr. Clifford on "War, Christianity, and God's Providence."

A STRONG protest against seven-day newspapers has been published. Having shown how hardly the growth of such a practice must press upon newsagents and journalists, the protest says: "Already the world is too much with us, and all attempts to rob the country of the day which has brought rest and peace to millions should be resisted to the utter-most." On grounds physical, economical, and moral, people are urged to show their disapprobation of this "uncalled-for and inexcusable attempt to secularise our day of rest." The protest is signed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and twelve Bishops, a large number of leading non-conformist ministers and other public men. From many sides it is urged as the only way to resist the growth of this mischievous innovation, that the public should refuse to buy and advertisers should refuse to use the Daily Telegraph and the Daily Mail and other publications of the same houses, until their Sunday issues are abandoned.

ST. JAMES'S HALL was crowded on Tuesday evening at the annual meeting of the National Anti-Vivisection Society, and an overflow meeting had to be arranged. The Duke of Portland was in the chair, and the first resolution was moved by Lord Coleridge in a very forcible speech, declaring that the torture inflicted upon animals by licensed vivisectors was unjustifiable, and pledging the meeting to support measures in Parliament to put an end to it. Canon Wilberforce, who afterwards spoke, said that he would support all measures for the restriction of the practice, but only as a step towards abolition.

THE hundredth annual meeting of the Religious Tract Society was held on Friday week at Exeter Hall. Mr. Edward Rawlings, the treasurer, in the chair. Among the speakers was Dr. Butler, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, who spoke of the "antiseptic" character of the literature issued by the Society. As to tracts, he said, they must not be dull, nor shallow, nor goody. There was nothing goody in the Bible, nor in "Pilgrim's Progress," nor in "Milton." The old description of a good tract was that it should be "plain, direct, entertaining, and full of ideas." Of the £50,000 asked for as a Centenary Fund, nearly £45,000 is now raised.

ON Wednesday Parliament rejected, by a majority of 154, Mr. Charles McArthur's Church Discipline Bill, introduced at the instance of the Liverpool Laymen's League. Its object was to enforce discipline and maintain the Protestant character of the Established Church, by the abolition of the Bishops' veto, restoring the authority of the courts, and substituting deprivation for imprisonment of recalcitrant clergy. But although this Bill was rejected, the feeling of a large majority both in Parliament and in the country undoubtedly is that order and obedience to the law must be enforced in the Church, or disestablishment is inevitable. Meanwhile the Archbishops are sitting at Lambeth Palace, but not as "a court," to hear the pleadings of the Bishops of London and Norwich, and two clergymen who refuse obedience, in the matter of the ceremonial use of incense. The result will be the expression of a pious opinion, which it is hoped will be accepted as morally binding by the contending parties in the interest of peace. But this will not decide the question of the ultimate legal authority in Church matters.

THE sixty-seventh annual Assembly of the Congregational Union of England and Wales opened on Monday afternoon, and at the business meeting Mr. Carvell Williams was elected chairman for 1900. Resolutions against a Roman Catholic University for Ireland and against seven-day journalism were passed. On Tuesday the Rev. H. Arnold Thomas, M.A., the chairman, delivered his address, his subject being, "The End of the Commandment," the burden of it being "It is good to be good."

THE scheme for raising a Congregational Twentieth Century Fund of half a million was accepted, but only after a somewhat hot discussion as to the apportionment of the Fund, a specially urgent plea being made for a larger proportion to be devoted to the augmentation of inadequate stipends of ministers. Finally it was agreed that the Committee should be left with the some discretion as to the disposal of the Fund.

THE "Autobiography and Diary of the late Samuel Davidson, D.D., LL.D." (with an account of the Davidson Controversy, by Mr. J. A. Picton, M.A.), edited by his daughter, will shortly be published by Messrs. T. and T. Clark, Edinburgh.

"WE look forward to the year 1900 with peculiar interest, as it will mark the beginning of another great epoch in human history, with possibilities which no one can measure. Already several religious organisations are devising ways and means of celebrating this event by raising special funds for the extension of their work." So runs the opening of the London Appeal to Unitarians, which has been widely circulated, and which we print this week in full. But these sentences are ambiguous. The new century does not begin until the close of 1900, and it is for the year 1901 that the Wesleyans, Congregationalists and Baptists are raising their great Twentieth Century Funds. We trust that the desperate heresy veiled in the above sentences will not be a stumbling block to any of our friends, and prevent their generous support of a good cause.

WAR AGAINST WAR.

A LITTLE volume of poems by Richard Schmidt-Cabanis has just been published in the interest of the German Peace Society in Berlin. "Stechpalmenzweige" is the title—Holly-branches, "armed poems of peace."* The opening poem, "Dem Kriege Krieg," appears in English and French translations, as well as in the original. The English translation, by Miss Peacover, is as follows:—

War unto war! the popular voice resounding
That ne'er was wholly still, is heard afar;

Calling for Peace, in place of War abounding
With mutterings, deeper than artillery, sounding

War unto War!
The stream of Truth lay fast in fetters bounden

But mightier rose its flood with gathering roar;

Through weir and dam a path the tide hath founden;

Resistless now 'twill urge its course unbounden—

War unto War!
Stirred with such faith, no heart but throbs, with other Pulses of jubilant hope than e'er before.

'Tis not man's call to hold as foe his brother:

'Tis Freedom, Joy and Peace one with another!

Then—War to War!

Has not this age its sickening cup been filling

With wars in South and North, enough and more,

Dealing by wholesale in the trade of killing?

A tiger-host were sated to o'erfilling—
Then: Down with War!

Must we with fear-set eyes, in horror gazing,

Mark untold woe, and every hellish scar:
Red meadows, trampled corn, the vision dazing,

And heart-break wail and groan, mid homesteads blazing?

No! Down with War!

Our shoulders labour 'neath a world of sorrow

Such as the fabled Atlas never bore;

In seas of tears our griefs expression borrow—

Shrink we from this grand conflict of the morrow?

No! Down with War!

What if the brows of earthly gods do lower,

Doubt not our cause has victory in store;

Be haughty scorn or venomous scoff, our dower,

The people have, to save the people, power—
Then: War to War!

Set anvils with the sword-beat plough a-ringing,

Spread the white banner to the sun afar;

Poets! no longer blood-stained honours bringing,

A purer, manlier strain awaits your singing—

War against War.

* R. Boll, 23, Georgenstrasse, Berlin, N.W. (Price 1 mark.)

War against war! A myriad hearts are sending Prayers for our victory unto heaven's high bar;
Up! and these self-made bonds of misery rending,
The mingled rays of sacred brotherhood blending,
War against War!

"OUR FATHER'S CHURCH."

AN unusually interesting meeting was held at Milan last Sunday. Through the kind intervention of Professor Bracciforti, who is one of the oldest members of "Our Father's Church," Mr. J. Page Hopps was asked to preach in the Episcopal Methodist Church at the Sunday evening service. The church was thronged, and the keenest interest was manifested from beginning to end. At the close of the sermon, at the suggestion of the minister of the church, the whole congregation rose to thank the speaker, and a large number came forward to shake hands on parting. The subject of the discourse was "The Ideal of Our Father's Church," and the following is a brief sketch of it:—After an ardent word of greeting from many friends of Italy in England, the speaker said: "We want to end the animosities of nations; we should have, instead, a Brotherhood of nations, a United States of Europe. The emotion which prompts this aspiration gave birth, in another sphere, to 'Our Father's Church.' No one nation expresses the whole of politics: so no one Church expresses the whole of religion. Many experiments of government are needed; so are many modes of faith and expression needed.

"And yet, though Churches vary in expression, they are all one as to the essence of Religion: and that essence is set forth in the great phrase 'Our Father.' There is a sense in which all belong to 'Our Father's Church,' the very worst as well as best, because all belong to the Father, and even He cannot alter that. But, in the inner and spiritual sphere, love and obedience, or reverence and righteousness, do bring into the Father's Church in an interior sense. So then, our divisions can only be verbal or ceremonial. With all of us, Religion is the same. It is a grand psalm of the soul sung to many tunes. Let us, then, get our feet upon the rock, and know that we have them there. This will help us to understand one another, and this alone can unite all devout souls in faith and hope and love. The ideal of 'Our Father's Church' is not an organization, it is a testimony. It does not aim at creating an ecclesiastical institution, or another sect; on the contrary, it testifies to the vital truth which unites us all, which is there whether we wish it or not, and which holds us even though we do not hold it. As Methodists, then, standing where you do, wish us 'God-speed,' nay! but in spirit belong to us, feel that you have been and are members of 'Our Father's Church,' and live that out, with an enlarged charity, a quickened ardour, and a wider and brighter hope for all."

We may add the interesting fact, that a few Sundays before leaving home, Mr. Page Hopps preached, by invitation of the rector, in a well-known West-end of London Parish Church.

WORDSWORTH.—I.

"HONOUR him," said Emerson, "whose life is a perpetual victory." It were doubtless too much to say of any human life that it is a perpetual victory; yet if, while lived for worthy ends, it has throughout the calm victorious note, we know that to honour it is to be ourselves made wiser and happier; and this, allowing much for his limitations and defects, is the honour we are constrained to give to Wordsworth. Taken as a whole, in its large and leisurely completeness, his life, as an English poet has that rare note of triumph which must place him among the great helpers and up-lifters of mankind. To have unity and singleness of aim, to achieve the purpose towards which all conscious effort is directed, and to maintain throughout a serene and unconquerable happiness of heart—this is to be a victor in life's stern conflict; and this it was given to Wordsworth to enjoy.

It was in his twentieth year that, walking alone among his native hills, in the light of an early summer dawn, he received the baptism of a consecrated life.

I made no vows, but vows Were then made for me; bond unknown to me
Was given, that I should be, else sinning greatly,
A dedicated spirit. On I walked
In thankful blessedness, which yet survives.

Fourteen years were to elapse between that morn of consecration and the time when he should thus record it; and seven of those years were to be years of stress and tumult, and he was to know much of "fightings within and fears without"; yet the joy of that hour remained to him, and the strength of its high purpose did not fail.

The education of Wordsworth for his calling as a poet was long and strenuous. He has told us the story of it in a poem which is one of the most candid and impassioned records of soul-development known to the literature of England. We can understand the reticence which kept the "Prelude" from publication during the lifetime of its author, even as we can understand the emotion with which Coleridge heard him read or recite it, a few months after its completion.

A song divine of high and passionate thoughts
To their own music chanted.

So to his friend, listening "till the deep voice had ceased," it seemed. To us, reading that calm, sustained history, it is given to see the shaping of a poet's mind, the ordered progress of a spirit, strong in itself, yet also finely sensitive to manifold influences that wrought upon it from without. Through those eight years of school life, with all the wild, free fellowship of joy in Nature, followed by the somewhat easy uneventful career at Cambridge, and the long vacation-wanderings in the Lake Country and the Alps; through the months of inactive yet observant life in London, and then the two years of stirring excitement in France, ending with those weeks of fiery enthusiasm in Paris, when the Revolution was in all its fury there; through two more years of unsettled life in England, his mind now throbbing with sympathy for the great cause of human freedom, now fierce with anger against his own country for opposing that cause, now dark with doubt and even despair, as France herself became the oppressor of the free; and, finally, through the calm brief period of restoring peace when Nature regained her influence over him, and his beloved sister became his companion once more: "Maintained for me a saving intercourse with my true self. . . preserved me still a poet, made me seek beneath that name, and that alone, my office upon earth"—through all these changeful years we trace the movement of a strenuous and untiring spirit. Greatly influenced by external things—the varying face of Nature, the stirring scenes of human life, the fellowship of those he loved—disciplined and tested by these; there is yet the sure unfolding of a self-disciplined, self-determined soul. To read that poem, in which Wordsworth tells the inward history of the first twenty-seven years of his life, is to be brought into most vital relation with a surprising and unique personality; it is to be made conscious of a prevailing unity and singleness of aim, the study of which braces, illumines, and expands the mind.

The years which followed close on the period at which the "Prelude" closes were the great years of power. Between the age of twenty-seven and forty-five he achieved that for which, at nineteen, Nature had claimed and consecrated him. Tennyson and Browning wrote great things in their youth and in their old age. Excepting one or two bright gleams of poetic thought in later life, Wordsworth's wealth of song was gathered in the prime years of manhood.

Among the hills and hollows of the Quantocks, wandering there with Dorothy and Coleridge, his genius found its first authentic voice. "Lines written in early spring" and "Tintern Abbey" came then, and the poet knew at last his power and saw with unclouded clearness the purpose of his life. Two years later he is settled with his sister in the little labourer's cottage at Grasmere, there

In honoured poverty to weave
Songs consecrate to truth and liberty.

Very wonderful is the conscious strength of this man at whom reviewers shall scoff, from whose verse the public for many years shall turn carelessly away. So poor and yet so happy is he, so unambitious and yet so proud in the consciousness of high poetic duties.

I must not walk in unproved delight
These narrow bounds, and think of nothing more,
No duty that looks further, and no care.

Of ill-advised Ambition and of Pride
I would stand clear, but yet to me I feel
That an internal brightness is vouchsafed
That must not die, that must not pass away.

Possessions have I that are solely mine, Something within which yet is shared by none,

Not even the nearest to me and most dear,
Something which power and effort may impair;

I would impart it, I would spread it wide:
Immortal in the world which is to come.

A great happiness has come to him. Not that which most call happiness, born of worldly prosperity, or fame, or life's material comforts; of outward good and human praise he has the smallest share; even with physical health he was, at this time, not strongly endowed—but a great inward joy that came of insight and love, of peace with himself and a sense of harmony of soul with Nature and the spirit of universal life. So simple and so free to all, this inward gladness seems to him, that he must tell in song the sources and the secret of it, confident that others shall attain it also.

What one is,
Why may not millions be? What bars are thrown
By Nature in the way of such a hope?

These innocent and deep delights which surge in his own heart must belong to the race; and the time, he thinks, will surely come when men "shall find these a simple produce of the common day."

I, long before the blissful hour arrives,
Would chant, in lonely peace, the spousal verse
Of that great consummation; and, by words Which speak of nothing more than what we are,

Would I arouse the sensual from their sleep
Of Death, and win the vacant and the vain
To noble raptures.

To indicate in simple words the reality of this joy in which Wordsworth so greatly exults, and the attitude of mind and life which for him was essential to its possession, may be attempted in a second paper.

EDWARD CARPENTER.

DURING the last fifteen or twenty years the writings of Edward Carpenter have exerted a distinct influence on thought and life in this country—not perhaps a wide-spread influence, but real and deep. He had things to say which came from his experience and insight, and were not a mere echo of other men's sayings. For this reason he was worth listening to; and, happily, has been and is listened to by an increasing number of serious minded men and women. He belongs, in some degree, to the class of teachers of whom Ruskin and William Morris are distinguished examples; but his temperament is calmer than theirs, and without desiring to detract in the least from their genius, it must be added that the balance of his mind is steadier. He is swayed, occasionally, by some will-o'-the-wisp of a scheme or doctrine for human regeneration, but not so often or so violently as they have been. He is more consistent; but his consistency is of purpose rather than of modes and forms, to which, indeed, he resolutely refuses to be tied. As he says in his new book*:—"I have not the smallest intention of boxing my life or that of others within the four corners of any cut-and-dried principle" (p. 238). So much the better, surely. Such openness of mind, united with steadfast purpose, is a good equipment for the conduct of one's own life, and the guidance of others in the conduct of theirs.

The distinctive purpose of this book is to show "that the democratic idea as it grows and spreads will have a profound influence on Art and artistic methods, and that Art in its relation to life generally is, in these days, passing into new phases of development" (p. 1). Strictly speaking, not in these days only, but at all times Art, in common with every other form of activity, is "passing into new phases of development." To our author, however, the present phase seems to have a special significance. He thinks "We are approaching a great culmination in the history of the human race. We are approaching a period when mankind will rise to something like a truer understanding of Life and to a subjugation of materials to the need of expression. Hitherto this has been impossible. Hitherto the scramble for existence has so dominated society, that the mass of men have been forced to forego any effective expression of themselves" (p. 215). That hitherto this has been impossible, excepting in isolated cases, is beyond dispute. It is true, moreover, that there is a slowly growing recognition of the need for "effective expression." But the signs of the recognition among the masses of any such need are few and uncertain. The cry of the people who are or believe themselves to be down-trodden is not for freedom to give effective expression to themselves, but for opportunities to rise to the top in the "scramble for existence" (excellent phrase). And there is only too much reason for fearing that, in most instances, those who succeed in rising to the top will not differ in behaviour, essentially, from those who are at the top at present.

To elucidate his subject Edward Carpenter discusses the arts of music, painting and letters, as expounded by Wagner, Millet and Whitman—representatives, as he believes, of the democratic idea. He shows how each of them has striven to liberate his particular art from the conventionalities which, in course of time, have overgrown it, and to restore it to its original simplicity, in direct relation to life. Wagner found that music had wandered afar from speech and actual life into pure "Tune and Tonality," and he made it his task to bring it "back again, instruments, discords and all to the human voice; to the primal needs of actual speech" (p. 16). His music, we are told, "is nothing if not the direct outcome and reinforcement of speech, and so of the feeling beneath speech." What Wagner did for music Millet did for painting. He "succeeded in putting on canvas a thing which may almost be said not to have been attempted before—the rude outline figure of humanity, the actual primitive life of the worker on the land. . . . Never has the basic conception of simple humanity face to face with its own needs on the vast laborious earth been given with such force, such directness, such tenderness as here" (p. 19). It is shown how Millet keeps as close "to facts and to nature" as the most persistent realism could wish, yet by reason of his sympathy, his realism is no mere literalism, but a study of life. "Two men, rude and dirty, carrying a calf on a hurdle from the fields" is a subject sufficiently commonplace, and, unless the artist seeing facts and nature, could also see into them, is vulgar; but under the brush of Millet it is redeemed; for "the overpowering impression conveyed is not of coarse men engaged in the common task of carrying a calf on a hurdle, but "of their tenderness for the new-born thing." In the same way Whitman, taking for his subjects "what is commonest, cheapest, nearest, easiest," discovers that what seems to be the mere labourer is in truth man labouring, with the instincts, possibilities, aspirations, which belong to man, crushed down it may be, but existent, and waiting only to be awakened; so making—

Each of us inevitable,

Each of us limitless—each of us with his or her right upon the earth,

Each of us allow'd the eternal purports of the earth,

Each of us here as divinely as any is here.

The characteristics common to the work of these three men are, says our author—(1) strong realism, (2) a direct sense of the Whole, of the universal and unseen, by which alone the brute-facts can be redeemed and set "in place," and (3) a most intimate prophetic sense of the life of the people, meaning thereby, as I understand him, a sympathetic appreciation of their needs and possibilities, a perception that even in the lowest what he terms "the vast, unuttered human heart" is "a revelation in dim outlines of the gods." With these qualities of truth, breadth of view, and sympathy, nothing is unfit for use. The beautiful, said Millet, is that which is "in place"; and this, adds Edward Carpenter, "is the key to the appearance of so-called realism in modern art" (p. 5). Anything is proper if only it be "in place"; the most precious material, when out of place, becomes worthless, or worse. That literalism, so often mistaken for realism, which gives facts, incomplete, out of true relation, out of place, is not realism at all, but on one point or another, actual unrealism—untruth. As Edward Carpenter says: "If the portrayal is effected in such a manner as not to bring out the associated emotions, or if it bring out the emotions in such a disjointed way as not to combine with each other to a total effect, the method is mere imitation and the artistic result nil" (pp. 57, 58).

Clearly, Edward Carpenter values art, not "for art's sake," but for the sake of Life. To him, indeed, Life is "the greatest of the arts." Perhaps, in truth, Life is the sole art, these others being suggestions and marginal notes in aid of it, and of no value alone. In life, as in these subordinate arts, there must be those three things—truth, breadth of view, and sympathy. The "scramble for existence" makes this difficult, often impossible. How shall those truly express themselves whose whole time is occupied with earning bread in a trade for which they have no affinity, and whose effect on them is not to develop their characters but to crush them? The only true work is work in the direction of one's life; all other, whether under a task-master or by reason of one's own perverted will, is the toil of slaves. True work does not wither the faculties, but aids them to expand. In our social system work and life are divorced. There is a class which absorbs the leisure and is enfeebled for want of honourable work, and another class which does the drudgery and is stunted for want of joy. For most workers, existence is made up of wasting toil, and recreation; while the one serious business of life, the unfolding of character, is left unfulfilled. The ideal life is one of continuous and steady growth to which every occupation, whether for bread-winning or for diversion, shall minister. In that perfect social state which all good men and women aim for, but will never reach or see, the tasks of life and its pleasures shall be one, and there shall be no distraction or waste of life in the effort to live.

Although this can never be reached, how shall it be approached? Not surely by any state-organisation, socialistic, anarchist or otherwise. For state-organisations which aim at the perfecting of men fail just because men are not perfect. Thoreau, instead of organising the world, thought it a better plan to begin by organising himself; and his Walden experiment is a suggestion for all who do not think "the daily round, the common task" too insignificant a starting point for their march toward Utopia. Edward Carpenter has discussed the simplification of life in his earlier writings. He adds a few wise words now, the purport of which is that "simplification" must not be confounded with austerity. It does not necessarily involve a wholesale rejection of possessions after the manner of Thoreau, who, by way of experiment more than as an example to be generally followed, reduced the necessities of life to their lowest possible point. His aim was to discover what he could do without, rather than what he ought to do without. The essential point is to decide what to retain by some deeper standard than legal or social right. It is just the old question of Truth of Life; and the test for each individual to apply is—Which of these things, that I have already, or can procure, manifest my personality and reflect my character and help my development, and so stand in some real relation to me? Whatever they are, they are really mine; but of all others, if I retain them, I am the custodian, nothing more. When it was mentioned in the newspapers that the Vanderbilts had to pay other people £20,000 a year to help them to guard their accumulations, it became evident that, after all, they were not owners, but custodians; and with such a burden of responsibility they do not excite our envy, but claim our pity, although they sleep on beds whose castors are made of gold.

WALTER LEWIN.

In literature as in the ministry a man's esoteric reputation is often very different from his exoteric reputation. There are men who are talked about and admired by the multitude whose achievements, and personality are looked down upon by the inner circle of their own profession. Sometimes, no doubt, such detraction is due to jealousy; frequently it is due to the professional narrowness and pride which despises the verdict of the common people. But often also such criticism is due to a larger knowledge and appreciation of what is best in art and life. On the other hand there are men who unaccountably fail to influence the multitude whose reputation for brilliancy and power stands very high amongst their intimates and fellow-workers. Such men often become the lights and leaders of later generations. It may be laid down as a general rule, indeed, that the best men in art and literature are recognised first by their equals or superiors and only later by their inferiors. There are exceptions to the rule no doubt, but on the whole it is both dangerous and unpromising if a man's inside reputation is less than his outside one. In time the great man will succeed in gaining the approval of the multitude; but he ought first to be able to gain the approval of his intimates and fellow-workers.

Now, Joubert is a typical example of the writer who has never been able to advance beyond the approval of his intimates. He was beloved and admired by some of the leading men of his time, men like Chateaubriand and Fontanes. He has been praised by two of the greatest critics of this century, St. Beuve and Matthew Arnold. Mr. Arnold loved to rescue obscure writers from unmerited oblivion, and it is owing to him that Joubert's name at least is known to most people who read literature. But even Mr. Arnold could not make Joubert widely recognised or popular, and it may be said with considerable confidence that no one ever will. He was the friend and helper of those who wrote great works and did great deeds; he stimulated their thought and strengthened their ideals. He won the honour, love and gratitude of men whom the world honours and to whom the world is grateful. That is not an unenviable position, nor an unimportant work. Such men have their reward, although they are not recognised by the world. Mrs. Oliphant, in her recent autobiography, says: "At my most ambitious of times I would rather my children had remembered me as their mother than in any other way, and my friends as their friend. I never cared for anything else." Joubert had that reward. He was beloved as a friend who could evoke mental and moral activity in those who knew him best. It is no use complaining of the world as foolish and blind. In the long run the masters in literature and art, the men who have a direct message to the people, are recognised by them. Joubert had no message to the people; he spoke and wrote for the few. He did not deal with large human problems in detail. His talent consisted in the expression of brilliant, detached, suggestive thoughts. He was always starting hares and never catching them. The long weary continuous run which is necessary for the searcher after truth or beauty was beyond his power. He gave his friends something to run after, gave them the desire of running, but never dreamt of joining in the chase. His book, portions of which are here presented to us in an excellent translation, is a collection of happy thoughts, of texts for sermons he expected his friends to write, of seed-ideas which he expected them to cultivate.

The following are examples of his teaching. An essay, not to say a book, might be written on them all. "In political institutions nearly everything that we now call an abuse was once a remedy." "Poets have a hundred times more sense than philosophers. In their search after beauty, they light upon more truths than philosophers find in their search after truth." "Often an argument is good, not that it is conclusive, but that it is dramatic—because it has the character of its propounder, and springs from the depth of himself. There are arguments ex homine, as there are some ad hominem." "Even the games of children have laws, and could not exist without them; these laws are a constraint, and yet the more strictly they are observed the greater is the enjoyment." "One man finds in religion his literature and his science; another finds in it his joy and duty." "The ceremonies of Catholicism are a training in refinement." "The sole merit of the arts, and the object at which they all should aim, is to make the soul imaginable by the body." "How many learned men are working at the forge of science—laborious, ardent, tireless Cyclops, but one-eyed!" Many of these thoughts are at once felt to be true: all of them are striking and suggestive. There are hundreds of others, of equal or greater merit, in this book of translations from Joubert. There are few books indeed more full of provocations to thought, and yet somehow it is a little wearisome and unsatisfactory. We don't feel as if the writer had done quite as much as he might have done.

This epigrammatic solution of so many problems gives rather the impression of cleverness than of the patience, the elaboration, the long efforts, the final harmony which are the signs of genius. It is not that we are lazy and want everything done for us: no great writer will do this. Joubert's ineffectiveness is seen when compared with such a writer as Pascal. Both present us with suggestive and somewhat disconnected thoughts; both clothe their thoughts in a style of great literary excellence, although no doubt Pascal's is incomparably the finer of the two. But Pascal's is a work of genius and Joubert's rather a work of great talent. There is passion and an underlying unity in Pascal. There is a cold clear light in Joubert, turned with wonderful effect upon one object after another as the fancy takes him.

Renan has been called a Rambler through Reality: it is a much truer description of Joubert. He is a literary loungeur, seeing many things as loungers do that escape those who are intent upon one object. Loungeurs have their place in literature, and are sometimes very delightful, interesting people as Joubert was. They may have delicate perceptions, subtle insight; as lookers-on they see a good deal of the game, and it is useful to hear what they have to say about it. But the men and women who alone win and deserve to win the lasting recognition of the world, are those who play the game. They alone can speak with authority. They may not speak sometimes so well, but there is more lasting value in what they say. That highest praise of all cannot be given to Joubert. There was something of the valetudinarian about him always. He was a delicate, sensitive soul, but ineffective; and ineffectiveness means weakness somewhere. This has to be said in justification of his comparative obscurity. But, on the other hand, he was a man beloved by his friends, and felt by some of the greatest artists and thinkers of his time to be a kindling influence. Anyone who reads this book with sympathy will gain some understanding of why he was so much beloved, and will recognise the suggestiveness and beauty of his thoughts.

HENRY GOW.

THE JEWISH QUESTION.*

PASTOR HOCART, of Brussels, inspired by a noble flame of indignation, has desired to take his "part, however humbly, in the present great fight for liberty, justice and fraternity against the spirit of intolerance, hate, and persecution," by the publication of these lectures, which were called forth by the anti-Semite movement in France, and delivered in the course of last autumn. Like a true-hearted Christian minister, he has felt the call of brotherhood for the persecuted race, and the fear of trenching upon politics did not hinder him from freely and fairly facing the malicious foes of the Jew, who by pen and slander have waked the slumbering superstition and passion of the ignorant masses. Nor is his the easy word of a mere armchair philanthropist. Personally acquainted with some of the social efforts made among the population in France, he also listened to the discussion of the Dreyfus case by the Belleville public; and if on the one hand the cry "A bas les Juifs" was only too prominent, on the other the voice of the anarchist, "Vive l'humanité," gave him a text and a sorrowful joy. "What can we have come to," says he, "if it is reserved for the anarchists to resist the mad fanaticism of men who call themselves Christians? Long live humanity! Let us indomitably repeat this old fashioned cry: it means long live the Jews, as well as the Africans, the Cubans, and the Chinese, with justice and liberty for all oppressed peoples."

The too notorious writings of M. Drumont—"La France Juive," "La Fin d'un Monde," &c.—serve as the basis of M. Hocart's operations; but he has taken much pains to gather other materials for his indictment, not only from Drumont's supporter Brunetière, but from scholars who really know their history dispassionately, such as Leroy-Beaulieu, James Darmesteter, and Théodore Reinach. Starting with the story of the legend of the Wandering Jew as told by M. Gaston Paris, he gives a short view of the origin, nature, and aim of the present anti-semitism which, after the Jews had gradually attained emancipation, has since 1860 been growing in Germany and Russia, and has lately burst forth in France. He contests the arguments of the anti-Semites one by one, shows how history has been falsified by the supposed consent of centuries to hatred of the Jew; and proceeds to take up in detail the "ethnographic grievance" under the special sections of "The Semitism of the Jews, and their National peculiarities," and "The Physiology and the Psychology of the Jew." To those of us who have not read the books of Drumont and his friends—and, perhaps, few in England besides Mr. Conybeare have done so—the citations of their mode of reasoning and of the sort of objections advanced will be instructive and edifying. For instance, the statement is made that the present war against the Jew is only part of the eternal duel between the Semite and the Aryan, and three historic episodes are brought forward by Drumont to support it—the Trojan war, the Punic wars, and the invasion of Europe by the Saracens! This is, indeed, out-heroding Herod. M. Hocart makes him a present of another proof which he had forgotten, the taking of Babylon by Cyrus in 538 B.C.; and, glancing at other wars, demolishes these "pompous affirmations" by reminding his readers that there are other Semites besides the Jews; and asks why does not Drumont preach a crusade against the Arabs of Algeria?

On the question of the isolation of the chosen race and their exclusiveness many interesting explanations are given; the familiar "mission for monotheism" could hardly be avoided, but with some force M. Hocart presses on orthodox believers in the infallibility of the Old and New Testaments—like Stöcker and Drumont—certain passages in Isaiah and Romans—"By what right, ye orthodox, do you revolt against your Bible?" The book is full of interest in the details of life and position, statistics as to numbers and consequent influence, and historical and religious facts relating to the Jews, which incidentally come in the process of refuting Drumont's positions and correcting his mis-statements. The fourth lecture is devoted to the "Religious Grievance" of the anti-Semites, the conclusion of which, after looking fairly round, is that "anti-Semitism is a party of persecution." Lastly, the "Economic Grievance," the complaint of which we are most accustomed to hear in one form or another in most countries, and an Appendix upon the institutions of Jewish charity, ancient and modern, conclude the little volume. The author admits the faults of the Jews; he even began with some adverse prejudices, but determined to fight on the side of justice without fear or favour; and it is to be hoped that his courageous effort may, along with others, have some little effect. KARL WITTE'S ESSAYS ON DANTE.*

"WHY swim across the Charles River when you can cross by the Bridge?" said Emerson. "Why read Witte in the original when you can get him in this excellent translation by C. Mabel Lawrence, B.A., and Philip H. Wicksteed, M.A.?" say we. Henceforth no Dante student need burden his shelves and exhaust his pocket that he may possess the whole mass of "Dante-forschungen." If he does, he will be like a man who, being hungry, buys a stack of corn instead of a penny loaf.

The essays here gathered together all deal with matter of essential interest, whether to the student who studies his Dante only or to him who, in an honest upright heart, loves the poet as well. The only possible exception to this would be the first essay, but the introduction of this would be justified were it only to show the much greater degrees both of tolerance and common-sense to which the study of Dante subsequently led Witte's mind, thereby suggesting one of the most valuable results of all faithful study of the "Divine Comedy." The two essays on Dante's "Trilogy" and Dante's "Cosmography" form together as good a general introduction to the "Divine Comedy" as may be found anywhere in equal compass. The rest, with one or two exceptions, deal with deeply interesting but controverted questions into particular points in the life and thought of the poet—his ethical system, his relations with the Conti Guidi, Gemma Donati (and other women), the dates of his work, the value of Boccaccio's "Life." Around Dante there gathers the undying charm of a mighty secret: his personality, like that of Shakespeare, is sufficiently great to make it worth the travail of the ages to find him out. Was Beatrice, for instance, a creature of flesh and blood, or an ideal figment of the imagination? What but genius of the highest rank could have left such a question open to doubt? The translators have done well in selecting those portions of Witte's work which make prominent this thought-suggesting aspect of Dante's personality.

Some of the essays—e.g., that on the "Date and Authorship of the Ottimo Comento"—deal with matters where the spirit of minute scholarship has to work "like a mole i' the earth"; but these essays involve no break, except to the most "general" reader, in the deep interest pervading the book from cover to cover. Witte was equally master of the wisdom of Dry-as-dust, as of that higher wisdom of the pure heart which alone can solve the mystery of the various "ladies" whose smiles and salutations play such a meaning part in the symbolism of the poem.

This is not one of those translations in which we can identify the dictionary used by the translator, and almost count the number of times in each page when he was forced to consult it. The English is readable and pleasant. The Notes and Appendices are characterised by all Mr. Wicksteed's acumen and scholarship. Our review of the book may be summed up in two words: "read it."

CAPRI.

AFTER five weeks at Rome, where one of us had influenza, and three weeks in Naples, we started, April 6, for Capri, provided with a fair supply of the bronze money and paper lire (francs) so necessary for getting on and off a steamer in Italy, where the erection of a comfortable quay for the convenience of passengers would create such a disturbance among the boat-proprietors, as neither Government nor capitalists care to face. Two steamers start at the same hour, so we had to run the gauntlet of the two companies' touters; but our tickets were in our pockets, and we escaped molestation.

We had a sunny forenoon for our two hours' passage across the blue water, stopping only for a few minutes at Sorrento, where, as usual, at all landing-places, many small boats brought us fresh passengers, and then were ready to land others from the Naiade. At Capri we got into a boat, and found the pleasantest help from women and men at the landing-place. Two women carried our one portmanteau and two hold-alls on their heads to the omnibus of our hotel, Quisisana, and the payment was given to a motherly person who looked as if she could have carried one of us on her head, without turning a hair, all the way up the hillside to the hotel.

All visitors to Capri will remember that the carriers of luggage, building materials, water, &c., are chiefly young women and boys; the former placing the load on the head, the latter on the neck or one shoulder—the narrow, walled-in, steep and roughly-paved lanes making carts or wheelbarrows equally impracticable. When we have heard sighs and regrets that women should bear such heavy burdens, we have replied that they were more favoured than thousands of our young sisters in England, or any other "civilised" country, who have to sit in rooms, not always too well ventilated, stitching for at least eight or ten hours a day. Certainly our Capri young women, many with Greek features and bright modest expression of face, with square-toed feet not confined in fashionable shoes, walked erect and contented in the crisp sunny air.

The road up to the village of Capri was beautiful with orange trees, many of them still covered with matting to protect them from the four winds of heaven. We alighted in the picturesque little piazza, at the foot of a flight of steps which led to the church on one side, to the post-office on the other, and straight on to a gallery containing shops, houses, open spaces, up and up to the vineyards and olive terraces. On the piazza we and our luggage had to be inspected by a very polite official, who assured us that we might trust him; and before we knew where we were, we saw our luggage, again on two female heads, disappearing under an archway and down an incline. We followed pretty quickly, and soon reached the overcrowded hotel, where, after waiting nearly four hours, we were shown into a small bedroom, looking North and East, and politely told that if we paid half as much again as we are paying and have paid at Naples, we could be "taken in." Feeling ill-used, for we had ordered a room to the South, and received a telegram that a room would be ready for us, we, nevertheless, stayed, rejoicing in our view to the East, over the garden towards Monte Telegrafo, and the south-east promontory, Punta Tragara, with the cliffs of Faraglioni standing out in the blue sea. On a former visit to Capri, in March, we had suffered from the cold; but even now (April 6) we soon found out that a month later would have been more comfortable for us. We had some warm days before we left the island, on April 20; but Capri is a summer resort for the inhabitants of towns in Italy; and friends assured us that life is very tolerable there in June and beginning of July; when, too, the sea-bathing is said to be good. The wild flowers were a constant interest to us. A large white cistus, and a pink convolvulus with beautiful silver foliage, made the narrow walk on the declivity to the south of the island a great pleasure; and there, too, we could sit and read without fear of cold.

Dwellers in Italy are never tired of telling us that we Forestieri always run away too early in the year; that we do not know what the beauty of this country is, so long as we dread the heat of May and June. They do not consider, how, when we see here the wealth of roses, carnations, westeria, acacia, &c., which surround us already, even in the town, we sigh for our dear English home with its comforts and its garden.

One of the greatest attractions of this bay has always been the presence of the burning mountain, of which we never lose sight, and which never ceases to inspire a sense of awe and mystery. Day by day have we seen the thick columns of steam and smoke coming forth, not alone from the summit, but also from the western side, where the lava is still pouring out; and night after night we walked up to see the red glare of this burning river. The force behind all beauties and wonders of the world seems laid bare in Vesuvius. In sight of him we cannot forget the power over which men can never have control. We stand and gaze; we feel, and our soul says silently: "Lord! what is man that Thou art mindful of him?"

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "Psalms of the West."

THE morning broke in peace; sweet and fresh were the green things of the earth apparelled in all their beauty. The air breathed hope and quietness, the deep blue sky spread its tent of light to cover up the awful stars. Songs of joy spread upwards in ecstasy, flowers unfolded their tender petals, and memory ceased its gnawing.

The remembrance of the noblest, whose life was cut off in its promise, the remembrance of the perfect soul changed to a hope that made time of no account in the heaven that received the divine unchanged. And earth seemed a goodly home to dwell in, my soul was satisfied with the power of blossoming life, the calm of the truce of spring.

Surely all things work together for good; surely their harmony is mighty, the union of beauty in majesty. The world rejoiceth in the sun which blesseth it immeasurably; the sun beholdeth his beams working wonders on the earth, for whose sake he liveth. Each exists for the other, each by itself has neither life nor purpose. So also the sea liveth for the air, the air for the sea, the mountains for rain; and rain for the streams that flow down and water the nations. Clouds and rain gather the dust from the air and bring it to the ground; the earth purifieth and straineth the water, and men drink it pure from the wells. So sleep prepareth for work, and labour endoweth the weary with plentiful rest in sleep.

Every creature hath his path marked out; to man alone the everlasting choice is apportioned. Man can make heaven or hell on the world according as his judgment declares, and in his mind's will doth he hold the balance of the fate of nations.

Great is the strength of the present to mould or mar the future; a righteous generation will glorify for ages the history of the race of man; to bring wisdom and knowledge from their high places to pass kindly among the children of men; to leave the pride of hard discourse and make gentle the hearts of the poor; to forsake luxury and vain decoration, and array the humble in the communion of science; that the learned may know their littleness, and presumptuous ignorance in abasement acknowledge its vanity; that even the barbed prejudice of the dullard may decay, the foolishness of tradition be melted in searching humility; that intemperance vanish from the face of the earth, and all means of health be used in accordance with reason; that empires of felicity may be no more drowned in wine, and that the multitude seek no more so furiously for poverty in cups of poison; for in pervading temperance man shall be blessed, and in command of himself in accordance with reason shall the enemies of his soul be discomfited; that religion be holy and pure, gracious and broad as heaven.

Then shall all kingdoms unite in praise; the cities of the earth shall speak as friends across mountains and oceans, the songs of the islands shall be heard in the midst of the continents. The morning and evening shall be full of sweetness; the daily work of all shall be pleasant and prosperous. Races and peoples shall be as one family, united as friends with the grace of honour in well-doing, to subdue the evil of nature and draw forth the bounty of abiding love.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Little Things that Grow Big.

My little boy, Norman, wanted some gold-fish in a glass globe, to feed as pets. As I did not buy them at once, he said he only wanted little gold fishes in a little glass globe, and they would not cost much. I told him the fishes would grow, and the glass globe would not grow; and I bought him some other pets instead. He has had, at different times, birds, guinea-pigs, hedgehogs, tortoises, and white rats. What are your favourites? Would you like a young elephant for a playmate? You laugh at the idea; but a young elephant may be a very interesting companion.

When Sir J. Emerson Tennent was at Colombo, in Ceylon, he had two young elephants sent down to his house, and the smallest one became a general favourite with the servants. The coachman had a little shed built for him near his own quarters at the stables; but his favourite resort was the kitchen, where he received a daily allowance of milk and plantains, and picked up several other delicacies besides. He was innocent and peaceful in the extreme, and when his master was walking in the grounds he would trot up to him, twine his little trunk round his arm and coax him to take him to the fruit-trees.

But, you know, little elephants grow big, and then they are expensive to keep, because they eat such a lot. A large elephant will eat every day two hundred-weight of green food and about half a bushel of grain. They are fond of the leaves of the palm and the cocoanut; they like the leaves of the fig-tree, the bread-fruit and the wood-apple; they will eat the stems of the plantain, the stalks of the sugar-cane, and the feathery tops of bamboos. Pine-apples, water-melons, and fruits of every description are voraciously devoured; and a cocoanut is enjoyed for its milk, being first rolled under foot to detach it from the husk and fibre, and then raised in the trunk and crushed easily by the ponderous jaws. In Ceylon it takes two men all their time to gather branches and grass for one elephant, and a third man has to be employed as superintendent to take care of him.

There is a rare sort of elephant called the white elephant, which is an object of wonder to Asiatics. Such creatures have formed part of the stud of the Kings of Siam, and been regarded as an emblem of royalty. Sometimes an Asiatic Prince will give another Prince one of these animals as a present. When the Prince of Wales visited India, in the year 1876, he had an elephant given to him, and brought it home. But he did not keep it long: I believe he sent it to the Zoological Gardens; and I don't wonder at that, because elephants eat so much.

When we receive a present which costs us more than we can afford, we call it a white elephant. It has become a proverb that this or that gift is "a white elephant," because it threatens to ruin us. Suppose a working man, who pays ten shillings a week for his house, has a larger house given to him. At first he rejoices because he will have no rent to pay; but soon he finds that as there are more rooms he must buy more carpets and more furniture, and as there are more windows he must have more blinds; the flower garden is so large that it requires a gardener; and besides all this, he is called upon to pay heavier rates. He is weighed down with expenses, and he says: "I was better off without the house; it is a white elephant!"

I think, therefore, that even when a person is offered a small elephant he would be wise to decline it, because little elephants grow to be big ones, and big ones are expensive to keep.

There is nothing more amusing than to watch two kittens playing with one another. They do have such fun, crouching and springing, rising up and wrestling, struggling and rolling, and running and tumbling again. They will bite and kick at their mother too; but she does not seem to feel it, and she likes them to learn to use their teeth and claws. Now young tigers are as playful as kittens, and make very amusing companions. Sometimes our English sailors, who go abroad and put into foreign ports, get hold of a young tiger, and bring him away on the ship, and make a pet of him. They feed him, and play with him, and let him try or pretend to bite and scratch. At first he cannot hurt them, or he does not wish to hurt, because they are kind to him. All goes well for some weeks; but every week the little tiger grows bigger, and his limbs stronger, and his claws larger, and suddenly, on some little provocation, his fierce nature comes out. He gives a sailor an ugly scratch on the arm or the face, and proves himself a dangerous animal. After this he is not to be trusted, he must be kept in a cage, or else he will tear and devour, and be the terror of the ship.

It is a sort of temper that rises up in the tiger and makes it fierce; or we may say it is a sort of tiger that rises up in our own breast when we are angry. Sometimes when we see a little temper in a little child it amuses us, and we only laugh to see it stamp its little feet, or dash its toys about and break them. But that little temper is like a tiger which may grow big and dangerous. It wants chaining up while it is still little.

There is one thing which sometimes grows a good deal, although it is not a beast and does not get fierce; I mean a story when it is repeated. You are told about a strong man who lifted a hundred-weight and held it above his head for two minutes; but when you repeat the story you say that he held up five hundred-weight, for five minutes, and danced about the stage all the time. Perhaps you have partly forgotten what you heard; you have certainly allowed your fancy to embellish it, and you think the story sounds better in the way you tell it. But if a fruitful fancy of that sort is not put under restraint, you will by-and-by be over-mastered by it, and unable to describe anything accurately or speak the truth at all. You say now, you are only in fun; but a young tiger is only in fun. The worst of it is that little tigers grow big. G. ST. CLAIR.

THE RENEWAL OF SPRING.

WITH the first day of January, as we are now accustomed to reckon our time, we enter on a new year; but it is only on such perfect spring days as we have lately had that we are thoroughly convinced that a new year has really come. Is there anything more beautiful than such days of an English spring? The clear air is full of sunshine, not yet hot enough to be exhausting, and the fresh winds are blowing through the trees; one looks up through a perfect glory of white fruit blossom into the depths of the blue sky. Over the whole land the new thrill of delight is felt. On the roadside the token of it hastens before the eager traveller. Across the meadows, on the hillside, in the woods, every tree proclaims it in its fresh and living green. The multitudinous voices of the birds tell of it, and no less the children's voices in their laughter and their happiness over newly-gathered flowers. Out of the Infinite Heart of joy in beautiful things this new creation of the spring has come; every year it comes to us with fresh benediction, to waken our dull hearts to love and praise.

What is thus felt in the universal gladness of the land has a yet deeper and more intimate meaning in those quiet places of the earth that are rich in human associations—in the trees clustered about the village church, in the roadside leading up to one door, in the orchards' amid which the red-tiled roofs are seen, in the old garden in which, it may be, familiar voices will be heard no more. There for generations careful hands have been busy, delighting in each growing thing, with patient faithfulness doing the simple duties of the day; and they have left an impress, for those who know, even on the commonest things, and on the lives of those who come after. Their task may now be ended, but not the fruition of what they have done. The loveliness that wakens at the touch of spring is as rich as ever, the flowers are once more in bloom, the birds are building again in their accustomed corner; on every side is the message of life, and undying hope. And there is a heritage in all that beauty, not to be seen by the eye of strangers, but drawing yet more closely the bonds of hidden fellowship with those who have passed from the familiar scene, yet not beyond the circle of the home love. Such is the message to innumerable hearts of the fresh glory of the spring. With each new year the call is renewed, that we should give thanks and trust more completely the Giver of all Good, and that we should make our human life not only richer in pure joy, but worthier of its high affinities with the Unseen and the purest fellowship of living souls. Is it not at this time that we feel most profoundly the truth that we TENNYSON'S words?—

Thy voice is on the rolling air;
I hear thee where the waters run;
Thou standest in the rising sun,
And in the setting thou art fair.

Far off thou art, but ever nigh;
I have thee still, and I rejoice;
I prosper, circled with thy voice;
I shall not lose thee tho' I die.

The springtime comes to us not only with its own delight, unclouded as that is, but as herald of the long summer days to come and the whole promise of the year. Now we begin to dream of what we shall enjoy, and may well ponder also what we can do to see that everyone has some share of that abundant store of happiness. It is a mark of the better humanity of our day, that there is actually so much thought and patient effort in that direction. Few, indeed, are those who must be altogether shut out from the gladness of the spring. Even in the city every little patch of living green is now glorified, and the parks bring to tens of thousands of the toil-worn some little portion of the great renewal. Then it is the season for looking forward and making plans not only for one's own summer holiday. Workers for the many children's country holiday funds now renew their efforts, and those who have pleasant gardens near great cities consider how they can be used to give pleasure and refreshment to those who have no gardens of their own, and what they can do out of their abundance by affording drives into the open country to those who otherwise would seldom see a green field. There are many ways, from the simple sending of flowers to the providing of a home, by which the gifts of the beautiful earth and of human sympathy may be shared. To such beneficence the renewal of the spring gives a fresh impulse, and thereby adds no little measure to the gladness of the world.

THE LONDON APPEAL.

WE have already more than once called the attention of our readers to the effort which is being made at the instance of the London District Unitarian Society, to celebrate in a worthy manner its Jubilee, which falls next year, and to strengthen and extend the work of Unitarians in the cause of Liberal Christianity in the metropolitan area.

The Appeal of the Committee charged with the organising of this effort has now been issued, with a first list of donations, and it will be found printed in full in our present issue. From this it will be seen that it is hoped to raise at least £12,000, of which a part, not exceeding a third of the Fund, may be used to meet the needs of existing churches, in paying off charges on the buildings or securing freeholds, while the rest is to form a Permanent Chapel Building Fund, to be used for granting loans towards the purchase of sites and the erection of buildings with Open Trusts.

That such a Fund is needed, no one acquainted with the position and work of our London Churches will question. What has been done of recent years, and what is the nature of the present call for closer union, for redoubled efforts in strenuous faithfulness, will be found stated in the Appeal. There is a great opportunity for showing the sincerity and the strength of our religious life, and by forgetting ourselves in devoted missionary efforts, to secure a measure of life and a power of beneficent service beyond anything we have hitherto possessed. This effort has passed beyond the initial stages of questioning and hesitation. It is resolved that the work shall be done, and what remains to be seen is how much more than the modest sum named can be achieved. Already the first list of donations amounts to £5,100. The Fund is to be raised by two concurrent efforts—by donations and by a bazaar. Let those who object to bazaars complete the £12,000 by their own direct gifts; and then let the bazaar, for which so much hearty work is already being done, realise another £8,000, and London Unitarians, with the help of friends throughout the country, will have shown at the close of the present century that they do not intend to die, that they have faith in their leaders and their cause, and that to them religion is a matter of vital concern. We say with the help of friends throughout the country, for promises of generous support have been already received, and it is eminently fitting that the work of the metropolis, which is of interest to our whole community, and has after all peculiar difficulties of its own, should be sustained from all parts of the country.

The method of direct donation is so simple that no distance need be a hindrance, and it is possible that these words and the Appeal may meet the eye of friends even across the oceans, who may be glad to send some token of their sympathy; while as to work for the bazaar, we published last week some good words of Mrs. BROOKE HERFORD's, which should have persuasive power to enlist many more recruits.

The Appeal says, Help in both ways; but in any case, help!

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

The sixty-fourth annual meeting of this Society was held on Wednesday evening in the school-room of Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, the Rev. Dr. Brooke Herford in the chair. There was a large attendance of subscribers and friends.

After the singing of an opening hymn, the Chairman called upon the Treasurer, Mr. PHILIP ROSCOE, who made a statement as to the accounts, and appealed for more annual subscriptions. The year ended with a balance of £205 2s. 9d. in hand; but if it had not been for three legacies amounting to £360 10s. 0d., there would have been an adverse balance of £55. The list of annual subscribers diminished by a natural process, and in the past year subscriptions had fallen by £50. It was not healthy to live on bequests, but they must secure fresh annual subscribers to put the work on a sound basis.

The Rev. Dr. G. DAWES HICKS, as secretary, in presenting the Report of the Committee, stated that he had received letters from Sir Philip Manfield and Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, regretting their inability to be present.

The Report bore testimony to the zeal and devotion of the missionaries in maintaining the various activities of the missions in full and vigorous life, and acknowledged with sincere gratitude the services of the earnest bands of workers, on whom so much also depended. It had been resolved not to extend the Rhyl-street premises, but necessary repairs and improvements had been effected at a cost of over £100. The loss sustained in the death of Mrs. Pollard last October was sorrowfully recorded. A tablet to her memory had been erected at Rhyl-street. At George's-row the work of Mr. and Mrs. Summers had been continued with undiminished vigour, and at Bell street Mr. Kirkman Gray had completed his first year's ministry with excellent results. Legacies of £100 from Mrs. Sadler, £250 from Mrs. Emma Green, of Hackney, and £10 10s. from Mrs. Frankau had saved the treasurer from an adverse balance, but a further assured income of £300 in annual subscriptions was needed to put the Society on a sound financial basis. Six London churches, and the Free Christian Church, Brighton, had made collections for the Missions, and it was much to be desired that other churches both in London and in the country would do likewise. The Report concluded as follows:—

"The records of each year testify abundantly to the fact that a rational and unsectarian Christianity has lost none of its saving power, confronted though it be with the difficult and perplexing conditions of modern civilisation, and the very circumstance that your Committee have so few new departures to chronicle is, perhaps, one of the best recommendations that can be urged for the work under their care. Within the last quarter of a century, a whole network of institutions, aiming at the social, intellectual, and moral elevation of the poor, has come into being, and powerful orthodox churches, also, are turning their energies in similar directions, and contemplating already large schemes for the century about to begin. Your missions, then, stand no longer in the isolated position they once occupied, but take their modest place in a widespread movement, that is making for the uplifting of man.

Here they have still a distinct function to fulfil. Whilst seeking, by every means in their power, to aid and to further the cause of educational enlightenment, and to furnish opportunities of pure and healthy recreation, in the thickly-populated centres where they are situated, they strive, also, to engender in those who come under their influence that spirit of religious trust, natural to man, which sweetens the fountains of human life and awakens a sense of the reality of the divine. It is because they are firmly convinced of the success which has attended these endeavours in the past, and are no less assured of still greater results in the future, that your Committee renew their appeal now for the increased support, so pressingly needed, without which the work cannot be thoroughly and efficiently done."

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the Report, together with the missionaries' reports and the treasurer's statement, referred to one of the notes of the social unrest of the day as a certain disappointment that the Churches did not take a larger part in the reconstruction of the world. They went quietly on, for the most part, trying to make Christianity a reality in worship and in life, caring for the sick, the poor, the children, helping as far as they could, and to some that seemed an evasion of the problems of the time. But if they looked back to the first Christian age, when the world was even darker than at present, with more war, cruelty, oppression, poverty and hopeless servitude, what did they find? Christianity inspired not only a craving for, but a passionate confidence in, a new and better world. And though the vision was not fulfilled in any way they could see, they did not feel Christianity to be a failure. Though it did nothing for them, it did a great deal in them. For the outward reconstruction of society the early Church could do nothing, but it effected those changes of individual character and feeling which resulted in what Dr. Martineau had called "a new edition of human nature." And when they looked at the great spaces of history they saw how imperceptibly this had wrought great social changes in the world. Therefore they should take comfort in their present work, not disparaging it because it seemed so merely personal a thing, so helpless for any large reconstruction of the world. It was just Christ's Christianity they had, striving for the newness of individual life. He did not say that outward change was not needed, or that it should not be their concern, only they must remember how it was with the religion of Jesus Christ, who made new men, and made the whole world new to them before they began to change one outward thing.

Mrs. HELEN BOSANQUET seconded the resolution, and spoke of the dangers and difficulties of missionary work among the poor of London. The poor in that rich city had been taught for generations that the surest passport to benefactions was religious professions, and thus the combination of spiritual and relief work made one of the missionary's great difficulties. The work was so hard to carry out safely and wisely, that if she were a missionary she should beg to be sent empty-handed, to test the strength of religious belief, and what power it had really to help. Some old benefactions in London had been given half for the clergyman who preached, and the other half to secure for him an audience. And it might be said that a great part of the alms given was practically on that basis. A second danger was the tendency to become so completely absorbed in their own centre of work as not to take notice of other agencies, and so, perhaps, to become rivals or hinderers of the good work others were doing. There was a Mission in one of worst squares in London which had become a curse to its neighbourhood; it was so generously supported, and the people were so deluged with gifts as to thwart all the agencies making for thrift and self-help, and striving to raise the tone of the people. But the advantages and privileges of the work, when wisely carried out, were very great. By personal intercourse with the people, living as neighbours among them, the missionaries understood their trials and temptations, and when help was necessary they knew what the past had been and what hope there was for the future. So far as their work was by personal influence it could not but be good. The change wrought in people, not what was done for them externally, was the important thing. There were special Missions for watching over those in temptation to drink, and for promoting thrift, but always the first need was of a man with strong personal influence. In that Mission she had so strongly condemned there was one redeeming feature: they had organised a number of the men themselves, who spent their spare time in personal visitation among the poor of the district. That was good work. To give relief was a fine art. They must be strong to resist the temptation to fill services and classes by the judicious sprinkling of little gifts: they must disregard the unpopularity their principles might at first bring upon them, and must learn to say No, when Yes was easier. And they must be wise to see that relief given aimlessly increased the confusion and difficulties of the poor. They must look at the wide results as well as immediate ones. It was frightfully hard not to give money at once to a poor over-worked woman; but the reason why women were so underpaid was because wages were subsidised by charity and the Poor Law. It was hard not to help those who were out of work; but of the 60,000 annual increase in the population of London, 20,000 came from the country, because they could earn higher wages, and London was easy to live in for those who did not care to work. Every bit of indiscriminate relief given increased that flow of population, intensifying the evil. They must be wise to make plans for those they were helping, to see how they could be pulled out of their difficulties, wise to spend plenty of money where it was really useful, and to withhold it where it was not. Their great work was in the inward change rather than outward relief.

Dr. COLLINS, L.C.C., moved a resolution of sympathy with the missionaries in their work, and with the many helpers associated with them. He referred to his acquaintance with Mr. Corkran and with the neighbourhood about St. Luke's, where, during his residence at St. Bartholomew's, he was brought into close contact with the inhabitants of perhaps the worst slums in London. In the County Council they were endeavouring to improve the condition of the houses of the poor and their whole environment, and thus they prepared the way for the missionaries' spiritual work. At present the advantages of education, primary and secondary, were largely wasted on the very poor, when they had to go back to the surroundings of such homes as they were forced to live in. The fact was that land in London was so costly, it was too valuable to house the poor, and the rate-payers would have to face the fact of the sanitary menace this involved. Dives would have to put his hand in his pocket, if he did not want to have Lazarus at his door and the possibility of epidemic spreading from east to west. It would be a bad day for London, if it should be cut up into little sections, and ceased to look on those questions from the point of view of unity, if the richer quarters ceased to care for those less fortunate. For if one member suffered, all must suffer with it. He recognised that their Mission, without sectarianism or parochialism, was working for the betterment of the individual, and he therefore had the greatest pleasure in moving that resolution.

Miss ANNA SHARPE seconded, and appealed for more ladies to help in the work of Provident visiting at the Bell-street Mission. They had ten or twelve ladies who regularly went the rounds on Monday mornings, and two more were required, as well as other occasional helpers to take the place of regular visitors unable to go. It was work in which much happiness and satisfaction was to be found.

The resolution having been cordially passed the missionaries responded.

The Rev. F. SUMMERS asked for some subscribers' letters for the City-road Chest Hospital, and referred to the work of the Hampstead Convalescent Home for which more funds were required. He referred to the interest and profit of the recent Conference of Domestic Mission Workers at Liverpool, which he had attended, but argued that the philanthropic trading sometimes advocated was a mistake.

The Rev. J. POLLARD acknowledged the great kindness he had received in his recent bereavement, and asked for donations for the Poor's Purse.

The Rev. J. KIRKMAN GRAY referred to the question of child labour, with which a committee of the School Board had lately dealt. It had its ghastly and disastrous side, but there was also labour by which the children learnt to be helpful at home and to care for one another. It was a terrible thing that land was too valuable for the poor to live on it, and wages too low for the poor to live on them. He appealed for workers at Bell-street. The loss sustained there by the removal of Manchester College from London had never been made up, and men were specially needed for the boys' club, and the eldest boys could not be kept in the school because there was no teacher. Those who came to help would find that they received as well as gave. There were many things in the district to make him sad. He often heard laughter there, but seldom saw a smile. The laughter was superficial, and there was not the true inward joy in life that shone out in smiles. He asked for helpers to work among the people to secure for them something of that true joy of life.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, seconded by Mr. HAROLD WADE, the officers and committee were appointed, and the CHAIRMAN closed the meeting with prayer.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

THE annual report of the United States Commissioner of Education always contains much that is interesting and noteworthy. Dr. W. T. Harris, amongst other subjects, calls attention to the character and condition of Sunday-schools. "While the education of the American people, supported by taxes and public funds, is becoming more and more rigidly secular in character, and the lines drawn more closely which separate it from ecclesiastical and religious instruction, yet the true importance of religious instruction is coming to be better understood among scientific and philosophical thinkers." He has included in his report an elaborate essay by Mr. James H. Blodgett, who believes that the genesis of the Sunday-school may be traced to the pre-Christian customs of the Jewish people. The Roman Catholics, whilst insisting on the religious element in the week-day teaching, are now also making an increased use of Sunday-schools, and would probably not admit any complete cessation of such schools from the days of St. Carlo Borromeo in the sixteenth century. The Lutherans claim a continuous history of nearly four centuries for their schools. In some parts of Germany the Sunday-school is part of the compulsory system, and certain secular subjects were taught in them, though religious training was the main object. It is quite certain that Raikes, who is so generally regarded as the founder of Sunday-schools, had many predecessors. The catechetical instruction enjoined by the canons of the Church of England must generally have fallen into disuse before the charitable enterprise of Raikes. His was a plan for a charity with paid teachers, and the cost was found to be so great a difficulty, that even in his own town of Gloucester the schools were once suspended for lack of funds. Sunday-schools are new fields of voluntary effort, but it appears that in a few American cases, where the claims upon his time are unusually great, the superintendent is paid by the church. In 1821 the State of Delaware adopted a law by which not more than $200 per county—afterwards increased to $500—was allowed for the benefit of "Sabbath schools." The renewed interest in Sunday teaching that followed the movement originated by Raikes naturally affected the United States as well as the Mother-country, and efforts for the formation of a central society were made as early as 1791, and in 1824 the American Sunday School Union came into existence. By this, and various denominational societies, an extensive literature for the use both of teachers and of scholars has been published. Full statistics are not available, but the International Sunday School Convention reports that in 1875 there were in the United States 64,871 schools, 753,060 teachers, and 5,790,683 scholars; whilst in 1896 there were 132,697 schools, 1,394,630 teachers, 10,893,523 scholars. Many American schools have a "home department" for the benefit of those who, whilst unable to attend the school, are willing to study the lessons at home. This plan is said to be very useful among the scattered negro population of the South. There is naturally a wide divergence in the character and quality of Sunday-school teaching.

Thus "the Protestant Episcopal makes great use of Church catechisms. The International Sunday School Convention embraces denominations with a general similarity of practice. . . . The Friend and the Unitarian reach over the lines of Biblical texts to a range of topics limited only by human welfare. . . . The work of the present Hebrew continues that of his devout ancestor. The earnestness of Roman Catholic instruction is suggestive. The fulness with which the Latter Day Saints, youngest among great religious bodies, have adopted systematic methods of instruction will indicate a source of their power to those who advocate other views." The Sunday-schools of the Church of Rome are under ecclesiastical control, and the teaching is often in the hands of members of those religious orders which make education their life work. "In the best schools the organisation has a high degree of regularity and definiteness." Turning from the oldest to the youngest ecclesiastical organisation, Mr. Blodgett gives a somewhat full description of the Mormon schools. An effort is made to collect in every school a "nickel" for each scholar. Twenty per cent. of this money is used locally, and the remainder forms a central fund. The classes are graded. There is a "primary," a "first intermediate," a "second intermediate," and a "higher department." In the last, which includes all over sixteen years of age, the studies range over the nineteen centuries of Christianity, and, no doubt, stress is laid upon the "fifth study," which deals with "the Restoration of the Gospel in its fulness by an angel to the Prophet Joseph Smith." Whatever may be thought of the Mormon doctrines, it is clear from the official handbook that the leaders of the "Latter Day Saints" understand the value of thorough and systematic teaching.

Sunday-school libraries are frequent objects of criticism, and it is clear that there is no general agreement as to what kind of books should be placed in them. Some admit general literature, whilst others reject everything not definitely bearing upon religion. The Hicksite Friends have adopted the plan of travelling libraries. Large numbers of periodicals are put in circulation by the agency of the schools. The "International Bible Lessons" are printed in many of the American religious periodicals and newspapers, and in the aggregate must have an enormous circulation.

In some parts of America the schools, from climatic and other causes, are not held during the whole of the year—a circumstance that, no doubt, will detract from their efficiency as teaching agencies. Yet it is certain that their influence must be very great. The statistics, imperfect as they are, show that they have a remarkable hold upon the population. In addition to the scholars in the Convention, Mr. Blodgett adds, for the Hebrews, 13,506; the Roman Catholics, 1,500,000; and the Latter Day Saints, 81,903. "This indicates," as he observes, "something like 12,500,000 scholars in Sunday-schools of all qualities and degrees of excellence." What this means may be gauged from the fact that the total enrolment of pupils in the day-schools and colleges of the United States is 16,255,093 pupils. It does not appear, then, that the progress of national education is damaging the Sunday-school. On the contrary, by relieving the Sunday-school teacher of the task of elementary secular education, it allows him to devote his time and energy more completely to the moral and ethical teaching which it is the mission of the Sunday-school to supply.

ULSTER UNITARIAN CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meeting in connection with this Association was held on Monday evening, the 9th inst., in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, and was very largely attended. At seven o'clock tea was partaken of by members and friends, and at eight the chair was taken by Mr. JAMES MOORE. Among those present were the Revs. Principal Gordon, E. P. Hall, J. A. Kelly, William Napier, T. Dunkerley, S. H. Mellone, George Slipper, W. J. Davies, A. Ashworth, R. J. Orr, R. M. King, and W. Weatherall; Mr. H. J. McCance, D.L.; Professor Fitzgerald; Messrs. John Rogers, James Davidson, J. M'Kisack, C. J. M'Kisack, Dr. Orr, J. Roberts, W. Roberts, C. Gordon, James M'Williams, R. M'Crum, William Martin, R. M'Crum, jun., R. M'Giffin, W. T. Hamilton, R. W. Baxter, H. Hunter, George M'Murray, &c.

Letters of apology were received from the Rev. J. Kennedy, Charles Thrift, A. B. Hamilton, and W. S. Smith, Mr. Wm. M'Ninch (Treasurer), and Mr. F. D. Ward, J.P.

The Hundreth Psalm having been sung, the Rev. WILLIAM NAPIER opened the proceedings with prayer.

The Rev. J. A. KELLY (Dunmurry) read the report of the Committee of the Association, which contained the following:—

The alterations reported last year as having been made in the depository have given entire satisfaction. It is with pleasure we have to report the continued demand for literature expository of Unitarian Christianity. Many tracts and pamphlets to satisfy this demand have been given away. Especial mention might be made of the declaration of our Scriptural principles, for which there has been an increased demand. In this connection we have to state that a large order given to the American Unitarian Association has reached us, and no doubt the books, tracts, and pamphlets comprised in it will prove most serviceable in the work which we have in hand. Your Committee are engaged in bringing out a new edition of the Book of Prayers, by the late J. Scott Porter, and of the Catechism, "The Child's Guide to Christ." With great satisfaction we report the successful issue of the effort so thoughtfully commenced by Dr. Jolliffe, to which reference was made in the last report. The total amount received was £102 6s., and we would again express our warm thanks to Dr. Jolliffe and those friends who came forward and helped to so happy a conclusion. Your Committee would suggest that, as the twentieth century is near, the Association should not let the opportunity pass without some special effort being made to signalise the event. We have to report that after careful deliberation we have recently undertaken the work of the Postal Mission. Mr. John Hunter, having resigned the post of joint secretary on account of ill-health, has been succeeded by the Rev. J. A. Kelly. The thanks of the Association are due to Mr. Hunter for his long and valuable services. It is with heart-felt sorrow we have to refer to the death of Rev. Robert Spears. In conclusion, we would appeal for more earnest co-operation from our friends everywhere in order that our hands may be strengthened and our hearts cheered for the successful prosecution of the important work which has been given us to do.

The financial statement showed a balance in hand of £52 odd.

The CHAIRMAN, moving the adoption of the report and statement of accounts, referred to the objects of the Association, which were as follow:—“(1) To maintain the sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures as a rule of faith; (2) to diffuse a knowledge of the Christian revelation based on the sole Deity of God the Father, and the divine mission and authority of the Lord Jesus Christ; (3) to defend the right of private judgment, the sacredness of religious liberty, and the supreme importance of the Christian life; and (4) to promote the religious education of the young, especially through the instrumentality of the Sunday-school.” Unitarians, he said, were misunderstood in many places, and they knew that in recent years their increase had been small, but all the same their principles were good and their views had spread through all Churches; with that, at least, they should be satisfied. They held that in secular education they should be all united, that boys of all religions should mix together, and he was happy to say that, with the exception of the opposition of a single Church, that idea was consummated. The complement of that was they should have Sunday schools to support their secular schools. He knew that Society gave great attention to Sunday-schools, and his hope was that it would give even greater attention to them in future.

Rev. J. A. KELLY, in seconding the motion, referred to the fact that other Churches were about to do special work in connection with the approach of the twentieth century. An opportune time was coming, and they should try and see if they could not raise a fund for objects connected with their Association. Why should they in that matter be behind the Methodists or any other body? They asked the support, assistance, and co-operation of all who had the interest of that Association at heart.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. JAMES DAVIDSON (Windsor) moved the next resolution, in which the meeting warmly welcomed the presence of the Rev. E. P. Hall in Belfast, and returned to him its warm thanks for his able and impressive sermons in aid of the Association. The reverend gentleman gave them two able and eloquent sermons, in which he adhered strictly to what might be called the fundamental principles of that Association.

Rev. THOMAS DUNKERLEY seconded the motion, which was agreed to unanimously.

The Rev. E. P. HALL said that he felt honoured in being called upon to preach sermons for the Ulster Unitarian Christian Association, for he knew no society for which he could more unreservedly work than that one. He thought, however, they should aim at making that annual meeting a more important “gathering of the clans.” The Unitarians should come there yearly to that meeting in such numbers that the hall would not be able to receive them.

Rev. Dr. MELLONE moved, and Principal Gordon seconded, a resolution in which the meeting renewed its adherence to the principles and objects of the Association as set forth in its rules.

A hearty vote of thanks to the Chairman having been passed, Principal Gordon pronounced the benediction, and the proceedings concluded.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

EASTERN COUNTIES.

I SHOULD like to confine myself in this letter to the giving of certain impressions of the religious life in general throughout East Anglia. On the face of it it ought to be, of all places in England, the most keenly interested in everything concerning religion. No counties equal this district for wealth of churches, and for the outward and visible signs of their being present-day realities, too, in many lives. Go by train, or road, or field-path, in any direction in Norfolk or Suffolk, and you are sure to be struck with the one thought—the abundance of church-provision. Not only in the towns and the villages, but often in the midst of a cluster of fields with not a house in sight, or clinging close in the shadow of a lonely wood, will rise the beautiful flint tower which is a perpetual feature in local scenery. So that the stranger, coming with the memory of the furious religious discussions that have graced, or rather more frequently disgraced our English life lately, with a mind filled with the noise of anti-Romish or English Church Union public meetings—such a man would at once exclaim, “Why, here is the very place in which I shall feel the pulse of the whole movement. A district with churches dominating every horizon one makes must surely be one of the main battle-grounds of the latest thing in Anglican crises, and I shall be able to see here religious life at its most earnest point. Probably I shall find everyone eager to discuss his view with me; the main topic is sure to be religion and its concerns.” If the stranger trusts to his eyes mainly, he will imagine the counties to be given up to the Established Church. Nonconformity is evidently so weak that it cannot flourish in the open: as you wheel through the villages it is the church and not the chapel that you cannot help seeing. And therefore he who goes by sight will, in every way, be deceived in East Anglia. He will find that beautiful buildings do not by any means imply religious fervour, that the Church Crisis is mainly discussed over pipes in a Nonconformist's study, and that Nonconformity holds rather more than its own in almost every district.

All this is disappointing to those who expect light from the diocese of Norwich, and it is somewhat difficult of explanation. True this part of the country is rather slow to move, and perhaps the Crisis may turn up in the next century. “Anything out of the rut,” said a Churchman to me the other day, “is likely to be fatal to the East Anglian,” and one can hardly be sure that the old designation of the diocese does not still hold good—“the Dead Sea.” And yet it is not for the want of urging by individuals. Now and then somebody makes a stir, and for a time the tomahawks are busy. One cleric takes away the retable or super-altar from his church, uses it in the rectory as pigeon-holes for his letters, and, when ordered to restore it, simply abuses the bishop and goes on preaching about the Second Coming. There was all the chance of a row in it, but the powder seemed damp and there wasn't enough steady heat to dry it. Another put up a fine rood-screen and for some technical reason was ordered to remove it, but calmly ignored the demand and nothing has happened, though it is rumoured that his use of incense is to be the bishop's next bother. And surely the goings on of the Ritualist vicar of Gorleston would have brought matters to a head long ago—if there had been sufficient vitality. One cannot imagine earlier bishops demanding, say, candles to be extinguished at a confirmation, and being met with a cool rejoinder from the vicar, standing watch in hand, "If you don't go on with the service in two minutes, I shall not have it held at all." Such things as these should have given excitable spirits a chance, but the fact evidently is that the Eastern Counties give very little thought and attention to the so-called Crisis. That there are extreme High Churchmen in places goes without saying; that their services are, like man, "fearfully and wonderfully made," is also true; but, in the main, the English Church here is composed of Evangelicals and Indifferentists—men either keenly eager to save souls or else calmly satisfied to perform certain duties in a gentlemanly manner. At any rate the Crisis has never reached an acute stage. But religious life is evidently well cared for, both by Anglicans and Nonconformists. I have spoken of the great provision of buildings. But enter them, and, except in the rarest cases, they are clean and bright and evidently much used. The tumble-down church is the exception, almost as extinct as the port-wine and leg of mutton parson. Here and there a roof is held on by tarpaulin with huge stones attached, or an interior suggests an ancient dustbin, or windows, being broken, are simply boarded up; but, as a rule, the church and the chapel are well kept and suggest good congregations. In one of his letters Matthew Arnold complains of the exaggerated value that people give "to what they call religion," that they endow "religious ideas and discussions with too large and absorbing a place in life," and he goes on to say that "whoever treats religion, religious discussions, questions of churches and sects, as absorbing, is not in vital sympathy with the movement of men's minds at present." Now the people and ministers and clergy of East Anglia do not seem in danger of deserving Arnold's dismissal; "the discussions and questions of churches and sects" are not by any means "absorbing" to them; they find room for a variety of interests; and yet of all their activities, outside the necessities of their daily business, there is still nothing which so generally attracts them as religion. Neither politics, nor literature, nor technical knowledge, is their main concern, but simply religion, a religious spirit which rightly recognises that its roots go deeper than the formula which expresses it.

And if one may close with a particular application, does not such a field, with its steady-going religious life and its ignoring of Church Crises, seem to promise the opportunity and the coming of a still simpler expression of faith as time passes? And surely it should be possible, before very long, for congregations of people in open sympathy with us to be formed in such centres as Lowestoft, Cromer, Thetford, Felixstowe, Harwich, Colchester, and Stowmarket. At any rate, the absence of violent controversies, and the permanence of the religious attitude, may make us reasonably think of such things—and hope.

EDGAR DAPLYN.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bristol: Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission.—Last Sunday afternoon an interesting presentation was made to Mr. Thomas Casling, who, for forty years, has faithfully laboured as a teacher in the boys' school. The attention of the Sunday Companion newspaper having been directed to his long and distinguished record, the editor was pleased to award him their "honourable service" medal, which is a very handsome silver one. His fellow-teachers also united in giving him a marble timepiece, on which was the following inscription:—"Presented to Thomas Casling by the teachers of the Lewin's Mead Domestic Mission Sunday-schools, as a mark of esteem, after being forty years a teacher. May 7, 1899." The Rev. J. Wain, in making the presentation, spoke of the untiring zeal with which Mr. Casling pursued his Sunday-school duties, and of the reward which teachers received when in later years they observed men and women around them the better Christians for their efforts with them when they were boys and girls at Sunday-school. The recipient, who spoke with emotion, thanked the teachers and the Sunday Companion for their kindness, and commented upon the great change for good which he had seen come over many of the homes in St. James' during the forty-nine years he had been associated with the Lewin's Mead Mission.

Chatham.—On Sunday week the Rev. G. S. Hitchcock concluded a course of three lectures on "Religion in Victorian Poetry," in which, taking Palmerston, Disraeli, and Gladstone as representative statesmen, he described the character of the poets whom he identified with their periods, Rossetti and Swinburne being connected with the romanticism of Disraeli, and Davidson, Watson, Kipling, and Buchanan with the moral purpose and humanity of Gladstone.

Devonport.—A very successful social meeting was held in the Christ Church Schoolroom on May 1, to mark the close of the session of the Literary Society and as a farewell to the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, whose temporary ministry was about to terminate. Members and friends to the number of about sixty were present, and an excellent programme of music and recitations was provided. After an interval for refreshments, the Rev. H. B. Smith delivered a short address, in which he thanked the congregation for the warmth and kindness with which he himself and his efforts amongst them had been welcomed, and referred to the valued friendships he had formed in Devonport. He added some helpful words on the highest aims of a true Church, which were listened to with the greatest interest. Mr. Endicott, in replying on behalf of the members, assured Mr. Smith of the general regret at his approaching departure and of the esteem and respect he had inspired during his short ministry, and wished him God-speed in the new work he was about to undertake.

Dukinfield.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached in the Old Chapel on Sunday last by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury. The subject of his address in the afternoon was "The King's Sons and Daughters." A band of little children from the school sang sweetly some special hymns at each service. The collections amounted to £61.

Horsham.—On Sunday last the congregation re-assembled in the chapel, having held their services in the school-room during its renovation. The walls have been freshly colour-washed and the paint renewed; the large window has been converted into a memorial window, and bears the inscription:—"In memory of Sydney Price, for forty years a secretary of this congregation; a tribute of respect for his high character and of the gratitude for his many valued services. Also of his fellow-workers, William Nash, died Oct. 14, 1896, and of James Kensett, died Nov. 12, 1896, life-long and faithful friends of this church." The design is very tasteful, and was the work of one of the members. The Whit-Sunday services are to be conducted by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin. (See advt.)

Leeds.—Last Sunday afternoon Mill Hill Chapel was crowded on the occasion of the united floral service of the scholars, teachers, and friends of the three Unitarian Sunday-schools in Leeds—Mill Hill, Holbeck, and Hunslet. The Revs. C. Hargrove and John McDowell conducted the service. The address was given by Mr. Hargrove, the subject being, "Why we call ourselves Unitarians." After extending a hearty welcome to all connected with the Holbeck and Hunslet schools, Mr. Hargrove replied to the question "What is it that brings us here to-day?" by remarking that they were assembled together as Unitarians, and though the name was disliked by some people, he thought it was a name of which they need not be ashamed, but of which they ought to be proud. As Unitarians, they did not believe that there were three persons in one God, they did not believe in everlasting punishment, in the atonement, and other tenets taught in other churches. But he would have them remember that the disbelief of these things did not make them Unitarians. The question was—What did they as Unitarians believe? There were three things they did believe. First, they all believed in Religion; and what was religion? Religion was relationship to God our Father. Secondly, they believed in Liberty. A man's religion was entirely and absolutely his own business, his own responsibility; therefore no one had any right to interfere in any way with another man's religion. Thirdly, they believed in Goodness. Those were the three principal things which he trusted they would all remember, impressing on their memory also the fact that not only did we believe in being good, but in doing good. The special hymns were sung in a hearty and praiseworthy manner, Mr. A. F. Briggs presiding at the organ. It was truly a soul-stirring service, brought to a conclusion by the chanting of the Lord's Prayer.

Lewes.—On Sunday last a flower service was held in Westgate Chapel, which had been very tastefully decorated. The children of the Sunday-school and others brought baskets and bunches of flowers, which were afterwards sent to the Lewes Victoria Hospital and the Workhouse. The Rev. T. A. Gorton preached in the morning on "The Message of the Flowers—'Beauty,'" and in the evening on "The Message of the Flowers—'Hope.'" Special hymns were sung, and a solo by Miss Blaber.

London: College Chapel, Stepney-green, E.—The annual meeting was held on Thursday evening, May 4, and was presided over by Mr. Harold Bailly. There was a large attendance of members, scholars' parents, and friends from other congregations. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, Miss Tagart, Mr. Shrubsole, F. G. S., Miss Florence Hill, Mr. Genever, Rev. J. Toye, Mr. Tavenor, Mr. Noel, and Mr. Dancely. A resolution expressing the deep sorrow of the congregation at the death of the Rev. R. Spears and the heartfelt sympathy with Mrs. Spears and family in their great affliction, was moved by Mr. Cook, and seconded by Mr. Higgins, and carried in silence. The report which was read by Mr. Evans, the secretary, was very encouraging. The attendance at the services has been well maintained, the members, though still few in numbers, are active in Sunday-school, Band of Mercy, Guilds, and other little societies connected with the chapel. Great encouragement has been felt by the settlement of Mr. Tavenor as lay-worker, who, under the guidance of Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, is taking charge of the congregations of College Chapel, and West Ham-lane. The statement of accounts showed a small balance on the right side, but members were urged to increase their subscriptions and donations, as the satisfactory state of finances was mainly due to the great exertions of one or two members and friends. In the course of the evening's proceedings the opinion was expressed that there was a great need of a closer drawing together of the Unitarian congregations of the East-end, and a resolution was carried, proposing a provisional committee, consisting of the East-end ministers, several laymen and Miss Florence Hill, to formulate some plan and bring it before the several congregations. Another item of interest was the presentation to the chapel of an oil painting made by the members of the Elder Scholars' Guild; one of the youths formally presented it on behalf of his fellow-members in a short speech. It was accepted on behalf of the chapel by the chairman and secretary.

Pentre, South Wales.—On Thursday evening, April 27, a lantern lecture was held at Bethania Congregational Church, Treorchy (kindly lent for the occasion), Councillor Jones, of the Abergorky offices, in the chair. The Sunday School Association set of slides of about sixty beautiful photographs, illustrating "Palestine and its People," were thrown on the screen and explained by the Rev. David Rees. The lecturer's remarks were interspersed with appropriate hymns and songs, sung by Miss Davies, the Evangelist, of Treherbert, whose singing was rapturously received. There were about 500 present. The lecture was given for the benefit of a widow, one of the older members of the Pentre congregation, and the kindness and Christian feeling shown by the members and officers of the Congregational church were very warmly appreciated.

Rawtenstall.—On Sunday week the Rev. E. Turland preached his farewell sermon as stated minister of Bank-street Chapel, at the close of a six years' ministry. Mr. Turland has received various farewell gifts, including a photograph of the chapel and a copy of "Alexandrov's Russian Dictionary" from the members of his French class.

Whitchurch.—On Wednesday week a successful entertainment was given in the schoolroom of the Church of the Saviour, consisting of songs, recitations and gramophone selections. A vote of thanks to the performers was moved by the Rev. F. W. Turland, and seconded by Mr. C. Groome.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

At the ANNUAL MEETING held on May 10th, 1899, at Rosslyn-hill Chapel, Hampstead, the Rev. Dr. BROOKE HERFORD in the Chair, the following Resolutions were passed:—

I.—Moved by the Chairman and seconded by Mrs. Helen Bosanquet:—

"That the Report of the Committee, together with the Reports of the Missionaries and the Treasurer's Statement of Accounts, be received and adopted."

II.—Moved by Dr. Collins and seconded by Miss Anna Sharpe:—

"That this Meeting offers to the Revs. F. Summers, J. Pollard, and B. Kirkman Gray, its sincere sympathy with them in their labours for the welfare of the neglected and destitute, and for the general improvement of the working population around them; and it also records its appreciation of the services rendered by the many earnest helpers, associated with the Missionaries in their work."

III.—Moved by the Chairman and seconded by Mr. Harold Wade:—

"That the best thanks of this Meeting be given to the Committee and Officers for their services during the past year, and that the following be elected for the year 1899-1900:—
Treasurer, Mr. Philip Roscoe; Committee, Mr. P. M. Martineau (Chairman), Mr. J. Brabner, Mr. G. L. Bristow, Mr. Howard C. Clarke, Rev. E. M. JUBILEE

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY, 1900.

An Appeal to Unitarians to assist in raising at least £12,000 for the support and spread of Liberal Christianity in the Metropolitan Area.

We look forward to the year 1900 with peculiar interest, as it will mark the beginning of another great epoch in human history, with possibilities which no one can measure. Already several religious organisations are devising ways and means of celebrating this event by raising special funds for the extension of their work. In view of the decay of old faiths and the growth of materialism, the friends of liberal and progressive Christianity should also bestir themselves; for, man needs the wisdom, love, and strength of true religion to help him to live his life worthily and well in the sight of God and of his fellows. The sin, sorrow, and suffering of the world can only be removed and alleviated, and the highest and purest happiness can only be secured, by the abiding influences of pure and heart-felt religion.

Thankful for the noble services rendered on behalf of truth and freedom by our forefathers in the past, conscious of the call to faithful service which the present demands of us, it is surely fitting that we Unitarians should mark our gratitude and prove our earnestness and sincerity in some practical and helpful way.

Conferences and Committees have met and discussed how best to do this; and it has been decided to raise the sum of not less than £12,000 during the year 1900. The London District Unitarian Society, which will then be fifty years old, has done and is doing splendid work for the cause of truth, freedom, and fellowship in religion. It has opened ten new churches during the last twenty years. It would like to do a great deal more. Compared with other denominations, we London Unitarians are doing very little for the religious needs of the vast and increasing city in which we live. There are many important districts within or just outside the metropolitan area, with populations far exceeding large provincial towns, where the Unitarian movement is without a representative or a home. There are fields of thought and life ready waiting for us, if only the men and the money were forthcoming. The congregations at Forest Gate, Kilburn, Plumstead, and Wood Green, worship in halls or schoolrooms; the land stands vacant at the side, awaiting the future churches; at Lewisham the congregation has only the lease of a building, for which a heavy rent is paid; the congregation at Kentish Town is hampered by the payment of an annual ground rent. It is time that something large and generous was done to remedy these defects, and to put our work in London on a sound financial basis, and thus give our whole movement a strong forward push.

The plan suggested is a two-fold one,—by Donations and by a Bazaar. Let all good Unitarians of every age, class and condition, deny themselves something and subscribe to the Special Fund. And we hope, too, all will work for the Bazaar, to be held in 1900. This central Bazaar will bring us all together, and will arouse interest, and kindle enthusiasm in our work. It will give our young people something to work for; they will gladly, we feel sure, work together for one common object. It will do us good to combine, east and west, north and south, rich and poor, young and old,—all in one united effort to help forward the cause of religion.

We mean to raise the whole sum by the month of May, 1900; so we must begin at once. Will you help in one, or if possible, in both of these ways? (i.) Send a promise of a Donation to the Treasurer, to be paid in one sum or by instalments; and persuade some of your friends to do the same. (ii.) Begin some piece of work yourself, and help in organising a little circle of fellow-workers at your church or home.

At the Bazaar there will be no raffling, and no spirituous liquors sold.

Do you ask, "What is to be done with the money when obtained?" Our reply is that it will be expended with thoughtful, judicious care, in the following ways:—

(1.) A portion of the Fund, not exceeding one-third of the net amount raised, shall be devoted to paying off debts or charges on, or purchasing the freehold of, some of our chapels and halls in or near London. The particular congregations to receive this assistance, and the amount of the assistance to be given to each such congregation, shall be settled by the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society, regard being had to the efforts made by each congregation to help itself.

(2.) The remainder of the Fund, not less than two-thirds of the whole, will be formed into a Permanent Chapel-Building Fund, for granting loans towards the purchase of sites and the erection of buildings with OPEN TRUSTS. This Fund shall be vested in a body of twelve Trustees, who shall be nominated in the first instance by the Council of Ministers and Delegates and the Subscribers to the Special Fund. The Trustees shall have a voice in the selection of the site, and shall themselves decide what amount they will advance towards the cost of its purchase and of the erection of the building.

(3.) The sum so advanced shall be a charge on the land and building, and shall be repaid in such manner and subject to such conditions as the Trustees shall in each case deem proper. The Trustees in their discretion may remit payment of interest. The income of such portion of the Fund as is not out on loan, and the interest on any loans, shall either be paid to the Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, or added to the capital of the Fund, as the Trustees may in each case determine.

This is a special opportunity for a vigorous and united effort; and we appeal to you personally, and solicit your sympathy and generous support in making this united effort a success. It will be a great encouragement to us if you will respond quickly and give liberally. We are, faithfully yours,

JOHN T. BRUNNER, President.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EIGHTY years ago next Wednesday the child was born in Kensington Palace, who now is venerable in her old age, and crowned with more than the splendour of her Royal state, with the honour and affection of her people in lands which encircle the whole earth. No woman ever held before such a position as our Queen holds in myriads of hearts, ruling as a constitutional monarch, and by the divine right of goodness. When we think of her, and what this country and the Empire owe to her, we always like to remember with gratitude the simplicity of her early home, and the good mother who guarded the young life, and then also the husband, noble in his simplicity and sincerity, whom the people at last learnt to understand. The Queen last Monday revisited the room in which she was born and the home of her childhood, in which, more than sixty years ago, she received the news of her accession. What tender chords of memory were touched we can well imagine, for her people have not been shut out from sympathy with this woman's heart. With no conventional observance, but with loyal sincerity we say, "God bless the Queen!"

THESE are days of other memories also. Yesterday, a year ago, Mr. Gladstone died, ten years older than the Queen, and in his death honoured as a man is seldom honoured. It is well to recall those days of solemn watching as the end drew near, and in the ultimate silence the wonderful impression of true nobility and greatness, the dominion of the man, while what was mortal of him was borne to its last resting-place in the Abbey. The national memorials are not yet completed, but Gladstone remains a part of what is noblest and best in our national life.

THE delegates of the nations are now gathered for the Peace Conference at The Hague. They meet in "the House in the Wood," of which an interesting account by Mrs. Lecky appears in this month's Nineteenth Century, in the "Orange Hall," where among the decorative paintings are seen the figures of "Strength" and "Wisdom" opening the door through which enters the Angel of Peace. Prophets of hope and of unbelief are busy to the last moment in the magazines and elsewhere, but now we shall soon know what the event is to be. The sad tale of Finland is told in both the Nineteenth Century and the Contemporary, but while this must give us serious pause, we are not in the least inclined to surrender to the cynicism either of Mr. Sidney Low or the Rev. Father Ryder, both of whom give a very unattractive colour to the Nineteenth Century this month.

THE Bishop of London, Mr. John Burns, and the Rev. Hugh Price Hughes were the first three speakers of the deputation which waited upon the Home Secretary on Friday week as opponents of seven-day newspapers. The Bishop said he had never known a question on which there was such unanimity in all classes of society. His experience was that the well-being of the community was the determining element which agitated public opinion at the present moment. Mr. John Burns said that workmen, both skilled and unskilled, were unanimous in their protest against the publication of the seventh-day paper. They wanted Sunday as a free day. It was in his view a question not so much of religion as of the maintenance of home life. The innovation meant industrial degradation. Mr. Price Hughes, speaking not only for the Wesleyan body, but the Evangelical Free Church Council, claimed to speak for six million inhabitants of this country. Sir M. White Ridley, in a sympathetic reply, said that he did not see how Government could interfere in the matter, but that it could be effectually dealt with by the public. The practical protest of ceasing to buy and to advertise in the Daily Telegraph and the Daily Mail, so long as they persist in their Sunday issue, seems to be growing in force, and has so far succeeded that we hear with the utmost satisfaction of the surrender of the Daily Mail.

WE publish to-day a letter as to the London Appeal, which raises a question well worth considering. The appeal for a great fund to strengthen the work in London is fully justified by the circumstances of the case, but our correspondent is no doubt right in saying that if addressed to the country for a national object, the effect would be greater. And why should not this still be done, and the effort enlarge its scope, so as to meet the needs not of London alone but of our whole body throughout the country? A permanent chapel-building fund is needed for London, but it is needed also for the country, as Mr. Alfred Worthington showed to the National Conference some years ago. The Committee of the Conference, which now has power to act, is to meet during the coming week. We should be sorry to think that it is too late for them to approach the London Committee with a view to considering the national question. We should say, ask for at least £50,000, and let it be a veritable Twentieth Century Fund, to be administered in the interest of our whole community.

PREACHING in Cairo-street Chapel, Warrington, on the subject of "Religious Toleration and Liberty of Conscience," in connection with the Cromwell Tercentenary, the Rev. W. H. Drummond gave instances of the Protector's true liberality of mind, and drew the following conclusions :—

"The tolerance of Cromwell was the tolerance of a deeply religious man. It was the only kind of tolerance which they need be at all anxious to possess. There were some people who made a great profession of Liberalism, but it was the Liberalism of indifference. They were sceptical about everything, and so they did not care whether men felt or believed anything deeply. If they were intolerant at all it was of large-hearted enthusiasm and the splendid heroisms of faith. Better be a bigot than that; better to have hold of one small shred of God's truth and to cling to it narrowly than to believe in nothing at all. But it was better still to believe in spiritual freedom because they believed in God. Their faith in liberty must be rooted in religion. It was their timidity which made them narrow. They were afraid for truth, they were afraid for God because they saw such a little way into His purposes. Once let their minds lie open to the living influences of His grace; once let their minds be kindled into ardour by the slow and sure unfolding of His truth; once let their souls be penetrated by some feeling of the largeness and mystery of God's purposes for them and for the world, and they would desire to give all men liberty to worship God according to their conscience, and to seek for the larger truth which might yet break forth from His word; not because they doubted or denied, or held their own convictions lightly, but for this reason, that religion was such a deep and real thing to them and they had learned that it was no small part of Christian piety to honour the voice of reason and conscience, their own or another's, which was the word of God in the soul of man."

BRITISH & FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

It has been arranged this year to make the religious service at Essex Church a little fuller than usual by introducing two simple responses, a collect, and a chant, in addition to the hymns, lessons, and prayer. Mr. John Harrison, himself a minister's son, will preside at the organ in succession to the late Mr. William Tate, who for so many years acted as hon. organist at the anniversary meetings. As Wednesday is the Queen's birthday, we believe it is intended to sing the revised version of the National Anthem at the close of the service—the music by Dr. Bridge, arranged for churches, being used.

At the annual meeting on Wednesday afternoon, in addition to the ordinary business resolutions, Sir Roland K. Wilson will submit one dealing with the Peace Conference; Mr. Edwin Clephan, one on the issue of Sunday editions of daily newspapers; and the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, one on the action of the Liverpool School Board in introducing the Free Church Catechism into rate-supported schools. At the subsequent evening meeting, the President will give an address on "Our Word and our Work." He will be followed by the Rev. C. J. Street on "Our Attitude towards Social and Public Questions." Dr. W. Blake Odgers will speak on "Our Unitarian Gospel and its Demands upon Us." The Rev. A. N. Blatchford will give an address on "Our Message to Young Men and Women." Judging from the number of tickets already disposed of, the conversazione on Thursday evening promises to be a great success. About one hundred ministers from all parts of the country have intimated their intention of being present; and many of our leading laymen and women will also be present. Among visitors from abroad who are expected are Senator Hoar of Massachusetts, the Rev. James Hocart of Brussels, and others. The luncheon at the Holborn Restaurant is a new feature in the proceedings. The President and the Chairman of the Anniversary Sub-Committee (Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke) have invited the delegates or representatives of District Associations and Societies to meet the Committee and officers of the Association, in this social way, as there are so few opportunities in the rush of business for friendly intercourse and conference.

THE WEEK'S MEETINGS.

Tuesday, 23rd May.

- 4.30. Reception of Delegates and Ministers by the Sunday School Association.

All Meetings held at Essex Hall, unless otherwise stated.

The Book-Rooms of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Sunday School Association at Essex Hall are open daily, 9 till 6, and visitors are invited to inspect the Books, Tracts, and Photographs on sale.

The Reading and Reception Room at Essex Hall, where ministers and members of the Association may make appointments with their friends, receive and answer letters, &c., will be open daily from 10 A.M. to 10 P.M.

IN THE BOOK-ROOM.

THE meetings of next week afford to many of our friends a welcome opportunity of looking over the new books and other publications of our two Associations and other works of liberal religion which are found on the tables of the Book-room. We will not urge our friends to buy, for we know the fascination of those tables, and are well assured that they will not leave Essex Hall empty handed. But we will take the opportunity of drawing attention to some of the most recent publications.

Among the pamphlets published by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, there is the new series of Sermons for the Times, of which three numbers have been issued, the first containing Dr. Klein's two sermons on "Religion and the Service of Truth" and "The Church and the Churches," the second an Address by Professor W. H. Hudson on "Faith and Life," and the third the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke's "Christianity and Social Problems." Then there is a McQuaker Lecture, by the Rev. James Ruddle, on "The Authority of the Bible," the Letter to Evangelical Free Churchmen on the New Catechism, and the Rev. J. Harwood's "Christianity and Sacerdotalism." These have already been widely circulated, and should not be missed by anyone who has not already had them. The Rev. C. J. Street's Letters on the "Irish University Question," reprinted from THE INQUIRER, will also be found on the table, and the sermon on "Militarism: the Enemy of Civilisation," by the Rev. Joseph May, of Philadelphia, a part of which appears in our present issue.

We also draw special attention to a little "Catechism of Religion," by the Rev. H. W. Hawkes, of Bootle, issued by the writer, as he says, with "no shred of authority" attaching to it, yet interesting to compare with the new Evangelical Catechism, and good and helpful in itself.

And we would urge any of our friends who do not know the New World to look at that substantial and valuable quarterly, which is published in Boston, but represents the liberal religious scholarship not of America only, but of this country and the Continent as well. The current (March) number contains an article on "Religion and Modern Culture" by Dr. Sabatier, of Paris, and one by Mr. G. Buchanan Grey, of Mansfield College, Oxford, on "The Growth of the Prophetic Literature."

Of new books there are the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke's "Gospel of Joy," and his "Ship of the Soul" in Clarke's series of "Small Books on Great Subjects," the Rev. M. J. Savage's "Our Unitarian Gospel," and a new volume of sermons by the Rev. T. R. Slicer, of All Souls' Church, New York, on "The Great Affirmations of Religion." This striking book we hope soon to notice more fully. The new edition of the Rev. J. Hamilton Thom's "Christ the Revealer," and the Rev. J. Harwood's selections from Blanco White's "Rationalist à Kempis," with memoir of the author, a booklet by the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, "Is Nature Cruel?" a volume of Hymns by the Rev. M. J. Savage, and a charming little illustrated edition of the Rev. W. C. Gannett's "Year of Miracle" we hope will not be overlooked.

Friends who have not yet seen the "Life of Henry Morley," by the Rev. H. S. Solly, will find it on the table, also a volume of essays on "Prophets of the Century," which contains an essay on "Robert Browning" by Dr. Blake Odgers, Mrs. Bernard Bosanquet's recent volume, "The Standard of Life," and two volumes of Putnam's new illustrated series of "Heroes of the Reformation, on Luther and Melancthon."

Of the Sunday School Association books we trust that everyone has already got the two volumes of the Helper, but if not, let it be understood that they are books to be bought.

WORDSWORTH.—II.

STRESS of poverty drew Wordsworth home from Paris at the end of 1792. Had his supplies not failed him it is probable he would have remained among the Revolutionists and would have thrown in his lot with the Girondist cause. Then amid the horrors of '93 he must have run a close chance to end his career with the leaders of that party, at the guillotine. This was not the only occasion on which poverty was to Wordsworth something more than a blessing in disguise.

He came back to England, nursing in his heart the proud, sad consciousness of being a "patriot of the world." The burden of this oppressed him, and he could not then return to the old scenes he had loved so well.

It pleased me more
To abide in the great city, where I found
The general air still busy with the stir
Of that first memorable onset made,
By a strong levy of humanity,
Upon the traffickers in negro blood.

This early struggle for slave emancipation moved him only as a part of that greater fight for human liberty which was to free all men from every form of tyranny. Slowly he has to learn that this is but a dream, or at best a dim and faintly possible hope. The years of 1793 and 1794 are the dark, distressful years of Wordsworth's life. The mental sufferings of this young "Republican," as he now calls himself, are recorded in the 10th and 11th books of the "Prelude." It is only through acquaintance with these, and some measure of sympathy with the slow and laboured process of recovery from despair, in presence of the stern realities of his time, that we may come to appreciate the strength and dignity of that happiness which became the inspiration of his life, the undertone of his noblest song in the succeeding years. It was no easy-going, favoured child of fortune, no idle dreamer among flowers and fields, that was to become the prophet of "Joy in widest commonalty spread"—of "Faith sublimed to ecstasy." It was the man who had known the most passionate enthusiasm for human liberty and universal fellowship, who had thrown himself into that cause with ardour and self-forgetfulness, who had seen that cause desecrated with human blood and tears, assailed by the armies of his own country, and finally betrayed and trampled under foot by the very people whom he had believed to be its champions and friends. We must remember this, and then read that opening chapter of the Recluse, entitled "Home at Grasmere," written when the glow of his new life of peace and gladness was upon him in all its strength. Though not published in full till 1889, this piece was composed in 1800, the first year of his life at Town End, Grasmere. It is the authentic voice of one who has found no selfish happiness, and is under no illusion as to what life for man, on this homely earth, really is. It is the utterance of a spirit that has proved, by an absolutely sincere and strenuous experience, that a relation is possible between man and his universe which can give him real and profound satisfaction; that without closing his eyes to any, the sternest facts of life, or his ears to the "still sad music of humanity," he may, by simplicity and renunciation and receptiveness of mind, enter into the great peace, and move through the years of earthly pilgrimage, entranced with the beauty and mystery of the world in which his lot is cast.

Apart from, or rather in close connection with, the support which came to him now through the fellowship of one or two kindred souls, there are three characteristics of Wordsworth's own nature which made him the poet of hope and happiness and peace to men. One is his profound and imperishable faith that life is meant for joy, and that joy is a power by which "we see into the life of things." We owe it to M. Legouis, the great French critic of the "Early Life of Wordsworth," to have made this aspect of the poet's character so clear and beautiful to us. "Wordsworth," he says, "maintained, even to the end, in spite of all the sorrow which came to his knowledge or fell to his own lot, a faith in the sovereignty of happiness. He looked upon happiness as the sign of man's fitness for the world in which he lives, and of a harmony between his actions and the law of the universe. It is to the soul what health is to the body. Sorrow, like sickness, exists only through some temporary or lasting defect in human nature. Like sickness it may be undeserved, but like sickness again it may be a mark of inferiority. The man who is a slave to dejection is entitled to pity no less than one who is physically infirm; but if he fails to shake off his yoke, it must be admitted that his 'vital soul' is wanting in some essential organ, that he lacks an adequate principle of life. And to take a pride in one's wretchedness is either ridiculous or profane, since it is absurd to pride oneself on a deficiency, and irreverent to believe that the universe is so odiously contrived that those who suffer are more worthy on that account than those who dwell in comfort."

Next, there is the profound sense of the essential unity of man's life with the life of Nature that came upon Wordsworth at this time and remained with him to the end. This had been the real, though vaguely-conscious source of his joy in the time of boyhood and youth. For a while, in the years of his despair, he had lost this, and came to look on all things, "in disconnection, dull and spiritless." Then he learned that thus to look on life is the cause of our confused and troubled thoughts—that we become slaves to the "perpetual whirl of trivial objects." He is freed from this

In steadiness, who hath among least things
An under-sense of greatest; sees the parts
As parts, but with a feeling of the whole.

Then it is that Beauty becomes to him once more "a living Presence of the earth," and he breaks into song concerning those dreams of Paradise and Islands of the Blest, which have haunted the human mind so long; and he asks why these should be

A history only of departed things,
Or a mere fiction of what never was?
For the discerning intellect of Man,
When wedded to this goodly universe
In love and holy passion, shall find these
A simple produce of the common day.

This faith in the ultimate unity of man and Nature, which George Meredith utters in his simple line, "Mind that with deep earth unites," Wordsworth states in a passage, sadly prosaic in its form and phrasing, yet too significant to be omitted here. It shall be his purpose, he declares, to proclaim in song,

How exquisitely the individual Mind (And the progressive powers perhaps no less Of the whole species) to the external World
Is fitted;—and how exquisitely too—
Theme this but little heard of among men—
The external World is fitted to the Mind;
And the creation (by no lower name Can it be called) which they with blended might Accomplish: this is our high argument.

Finally, we must say that Wordsworth's strength of joy springs from his faith in the spiritual reality of life and the world. This lover of the beauty of external forms, to whom the sight of a lowly celandine can be a cause of rapture, who clings affectionately to special places, and looks on the hills around his dwelling as guardian, friendly powers, is yet a profound mystic at heart, and knows the inwardness of things, as only the seer can know them. He tells us that when a boy he was "often unable to think of external things as having external existence. Many times while going to school have I grasped at a wall or tree to recall myself from this abyss of idealism to the reality." It is well, perhaps, that not many English boys are fashioned thus. Yet this innate and intense consciousness of the Unseen became in later life a source of much of Wordsworth's extraordinary power as a poet and prophet of spiritual faith. The passage in the fourth book of the "Excursion," in which he tells of the child, a stranger to the sea, listening with ear applied to "the convolutions of a smooth-lipped shell," and hearing thus murmurs like the sound of waves upon the shore, is doubtless a true account of his own experience. "Even such a shell," the Wanderer says to the Solitary,

The Universe itself
Is to the ear of faith; and there are times,
I doubt not, when to you it doth impart
Authentic tidings of invisible things;
Of ebb and flow, and ever-during power,
And central peace, subsisting at the heart
Of endless agitation. Here you stand,
Adore and worship, when you know it not;
Pious beyond the intention of your thought;
Devout above the meaning of your will.

But the one ideal statement of Wordsworth's creed is the classic passage in Tintern Abbey.

I have felt
A presence that disturbs me with the joy
Of elevated thoughts; a sense sublime
Of something far more deeply interfused,
Whose dwelling is the light of setting suns,
And the round ocean and the living air,
And the blue sky, and in the mind of man:
A motion and a spirit, that impels
All thinking things, all objects of all thought,
And rolls through all things. Therefore am I still
A lover of the meadows and the woods
And mountains; and of all that we behold
From this green earth; of all the mighty world,
Of eye, and ear,—both what they half-create,
And what perceive; well pleased to recognise
In nature and the language of the sense
The anchor of my purest thoughts, the nurse,
The guide, the guardian of my heart, and soul
Of all my moral being.

There is the revelation of Wordsworth's strength. The impassioned insight of such language, the profound sense of blended power and beauty and goodness in the actual world which it conveys, may, perhaps, hint to us of the inmost secret of that joy he desired so much to tell. Yet, lest we think him wholly mystic, and too far removed from homely human affairs, it were well to read alongside this the last book of the "Excursion." Its great appeal for the education of every human child, for the equality of opportunity which is the right of all; its praise of life's common things; its strenuous demand for the recognition of the natural brotherhood of human kind—these show us that, however much he soared and dreamed, his feet were on the solid earth with ours.

The primal duties shine aloft—like stars;
The charities that soothe and heal and bless,
Are scattered at the feet of Man—like flowers.
The generous inclination, the just rule,
Kind wishes and good actions and pure thoughts—

No mystery is here! Here is no boon
For high—yet not for low; for proudly graced—

Yet not for meek of heart. The smoke ascends

To heaven as lightly from the cottage hearth
As from the haughtiest palace. He whose soul

Ponders this true equality, may walk
The fields of earth with gratitude and hope.

SHORT NOTICES.

The Way of Life, by H. Arnold Thomas, M.A., is the thirteenth of the "Small Books on Great Subjects," and the greatest of great subjects is Mr. Arnold Thomas's theme. In a very simple way, indeed in such a sermon as that entitled "The Glorious Majesty of His Kingdom," in a grandly simple way, he rises to the height of his great argument. He unfolds the ever old yet ever new theme without the stereotyped phrases of orthodoxy, and with the clear-sightedness of a man who apprehends in no sensational way that "The Way" of Christ is as humanly arduous, as it is divinely facile. Scarcely a single rhetorical adornment of any kind beguiles the eye from the simple greatness of the theme. We are not only "getting back to Christ" in much of modern writing and thought, but we are getting nearer to Jesus and his surroundings. A few saw the Christ, the Lord's anointed, in Jesus; but how did he and his kingdom appear to nearly all at first? "They could see nothing glorious or majestic in the kingdom which was beginning to shape itself under his teaching and guidance. To their eyes it was a dull and sorry affair, having small attraction for any ambitious or patriotic soul; and its inaugurator was altogether a disappointing person. When they saw him there was no beauty that they should desire him. What was it that they saw? They saw the son of a mechanic, a man of the people, simply clad, who moved among the cottages of the poor, and was even found in the houses of the publicans; who talked in the homeliest language, and seemed content to take upon himself the humble duties of a country doctor or itinerant preacher; who had a following of fishermen, and others in like position—men of no social importance and slender education; who made no sort of public show, who was without wealth, without arms, any of those instruments and appliances by which great movements can be carried to a successful issue. This was what they saw; and they were very contemptuous." In the sermon entitled "The Consecration of the Wise-hearted," the preacher appeals to the cultured to consider the meaning of that kingdom. The Small Book is great in its simplicity, its vigour, its courage, its rightness, and withal its sound sweetness. (James Clarke and Co. 1s. 6d.)

The Story of William Penn, told by Miss Frances E. Cooke, will need no recommendation to our readers, but they will be glad to know that it has been written, thus bringing within easy reach of our young people the record of a noble life of simple heroism and suffering for conscience sake, with an account of one of the most interesting experiments in history, which it will be well for them to ponder. Elders as well as young people will read the book with pleasure. Brought up in the Commonwealth time, Penn was at Christ Church, Oxford, from the Restoration until the Act of Uniformity deprived Dr. John Owen of his headship of the College. From him the young man received some of his earliest impressions of what is worthiest in life, and afterwards through friendship with the Penningtons of Chalfont Grange, and Thomas Ellwood, Milton's reader in his blindness, and also with the noble Algernon Sidney was confirmed in his fidelity to an ideal of manhood very different from that of the Court circles in which he was no stranger. How he became a Quaker and what he suffered, how he worked with George Fox and then organised the State of Pennsylvania, how he bore himself in prison and at Court and among the Indians of his new territory, all this is told with Miss Cooke's accustomed skill, and the interest of the story never flags. The book is sure of a cordial welcome. (Headley Bros. 1s. 6d.)

The Ascent of the Soul, by the Rev. W. Robertson Nicoll, M.A., is a collection of four addresses, of which the longest gives its name to the title of the booklet. This address is a healthy rejoinder to some of the aberrations of mysticism, for even mysticism may have its aberrations. It refers more particularly to Upham, the American writer, and his disciples, followers all of their mistress, Madame Guyon. Here is a glint from Dr. Nicoll's foil: "In the writings of his teacher, Madame Guyon, she seems sometimes to be troubled with the thought of something amiss, and and she complains in her book, entitled 'The Torrents,' that she has lost her conscience. Upham thinks that this is a right and normal Christian experience.

... She was at rest from the reproof of conscience. Upham says that 'Conscience itself becomes the companion and playmate of love, and hides itself in its bosom.' "No," says Dr. Nicoll, "it is not so. Conscience is at peace when it knows why it is at peace, when it is sprinkled by the blood of Christ. I do not know what is to be said of the claim to perfection? Can I be perfect in this life? The question, as Mr. Spurgeon has said, is as if a beggar should ask how he could become a millionaire." We admire Dr. Nicoll's categorical contradiction, though we scarcely appreciate its form. But we cannot dwell on this subject. There is something Horatian about such an epigram as this of Dr. Nicoll's: "Even those whose prosperity seems most sure are lightning-rods for the storm to strike upon." Here is a sample of another order: "It is, as has been said, pre-eminently the will of the Father to reclaim through Christ for Himself the passions that consume themselves, that rich volcanic region, wasted as it were by fire, which is the scene of the apostacies of the heart." Or, again, from the address entitled "The Burning and the Shining": "Many that are rich cast in much. Many that are poor cast in all their living, and it is well with them at the last. They may die without knowing how they have shone, though knowing so well how they have burned." There is something about Dr. Nicoll's use of italics which reminds one of the trimming of a wick—the oil and the sense flash up brilliantly, as thus: "I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it, for thou hast but little strength." Strange reason. Is it really so—that we are invulnerable, that we are unsubduable, just because we are so weak? It is so. For it is our weakness known and confessed that sets the everlasting omnipotence upon our side. Of the four addresses the fourth and last likes us most—namely, "A Breeze from the Eternal Summer." There is humanity (glowing with poetry) in it, as well as divinity, and the former in orthodox books is always more divine than their divinity. Is it a fancy or a fact (and if a fact one wonders why) that in orthodox books the best fruit is generally at the bottom of the basket, and not at the top? Is it that the Inspector of Heresies in his rounds must see at the top the "sound" things, and that the writers have learnt that the Inspectors look through magnifying glasses till the smaller things, though "sound," bulk larger than the things at the bottom of the basket? Caveat emptor. (Isbister and Co. 1s. net.)

Dante, the Divina Commedia, translated by the late E. H. Plumptre, D.D., Vol. I. "Hell," Vol. II. "Purgatory." These are the first two of five promised volumes of the late Dean of Wells' masterly translation of Dante, together with a fifth volume of his "Studies" of the great poet, fitly completing the whole work. The Notes to the poems are printed at the foot of the page. To the first volume is prefixed a reproduction of G. F. Watts's "Paolo and Francesca," to the second volume "The Mystical Tree" by Gustav Doré. The little volumes are bound in limp leather, and when completed will form a very charming edition of Dante for those who cannot go to the original, and also for those who in their study of the original desire the help of a distinguished scholar. (Isbister and Co. 2s. 6d. net, each volume.)

MORAL FREEDOM AND FORE-KNOWLEDGE.

SIR,—The four letters on this subject have been enough to show that the difference between Mr. Upton and myself in our conception of the Divine Being is fundamental. We approach the Idea of God from different sides. The very nature of the problem which compels me to postulate God forbids me to impute to Him any limiting human attribute. It is difficult, for instance, to express in sober terms how far aloof from my thought of God is the suggestion that the chief interest of His life may be found, like that of ours, in guessing the sphinx-riddle of the future. Comprehension of God by the finite mind is plainly, in my theism, impossible: but communion is possible. I am not precluded from believing that kindness, righteousness, and beauty are modes in which our thought can truly, if incompletely, apprehend the Divine. If the yearning for some less awful Fatherhood comes over me, I can reflect that God is not less, but more, than what I long for. The Infinite includes the finite: God's fatherhood, so far as I can conceive it, and also beyond what I can conceive, is there. Such a way of thought may justly be called agnostic, but surely not sceptical. It does not question the validity of our powers within their scope, but only denies that their scope is commensurate with God's nature.

Mr. Upton, on the other hand, if I rightly understand him, posits first of all that affinity between God and man which is the basis of religion; and in his desire to preserve that affinity undisturbed refuses, except under intellectual coercion, to admit any element in the nature of God which shall be unintelligible to man. So it happens that we reach the great gulf of the unprovable from opposite sides. Happily we can both leave the pedestrian part of us behind on the brink, and use our wings.

I should like to add, if Mr. Upton will allow me, that it was perhaps not quite a matter of course that one so incalculably better equipped and experienced in this field should have treated my modest strictures with so much patience and, possibly, forbearance. I gladly acknowledge the courtesy with which Mr. Upton has replied.

E. W. LUMMIS.

SIR,—I sincerely thank Mr. Lummis for his thoughtful and kind letter, though I am only too conscious how little the facts justify his modest estimate, in the last paragraph, of our respective "equipment" for this friendly encounter in the lists of philosophical discussion.

The difference between our views is, I think, hardly so great as it seems to him to be. In common with Mr. Lummis I find the only reliable source of insight into the nature of God to be the self-revelation of the immanent Eternal One in our laws of thought, in our progressive ethical and æsthetic ideals, and in our spiritual consciousness of communion with Him; and I am most fully aware that there must be depths in God's being which are altogether beyond the furthest reaches of human thought. I entirely agree with Mr. Lummis in holding that "Kindness, righteousness, and beauty are modes in which our thought can truly, if incompletely, apprehend the Divine." And when he adds: "If the yearning for some less awful Fatherhood comes over me, I can reflect that God is not less, but more, than what I long for," I can heartily endorse these words also. The divergence between our views reveals itself, however, when I venture to suggest that if we accustom ourselves to regard the Supreme Reality as out of relation to Time, and therefore as a Being to whom our necessary laws of thought do not apply, we run a serious risk of forming a conception of God which is vastly less accordant than the ordinary theistic conception is, with the clearest affirmations of the human Conscience and with the deepest longings of the human Heart—a conception, in short, which is essentially different from that of a personal or super-personal Deity whose Spirit we may grieve by our persistent sinfulness, and who is vitally interested in the moral and spiritual health and progress of each rational soul.

I feel warm interest in Mr. Lummis's earnest and able endeavour to combine the timeless God of Spinoza and Hegel and of the Indian pantheists with the Hebraic and Christian conception of God's essential Fatherhood, of human Free-will, and of the absolute evil of Sin; but neither my own philosophical reflection, nor the history of religious thought, encourages in my mind the belief that such a combination can ever be effectually realised.

CHARLES B. UPTON.

[We are glad to be able to publish these two letters at the same time, as a conclusion to this interesting correspondence.—
ED. INQ.]

THE ATONEMENT.

SIR,—In his interesting article on the "Gospel of the Atonement," Mr. W. H. Drummond says: "It is a simple historical fact that the speculations about the Atonement which afterwards crystallised into definite forms of doctrine, belong not to the East, but to the West." And again: "Augustine's doctrine of ransom is the product of a society based on slavery. Anselm's doctrine of debt reflects the study of law and the hold which legal ideas had upon the mediæval mind." Now I should be the last to deny that, taken as a whole, our current theology is deeply coloured by the Western channels through which it flowed to us; or that Roman law exerted an intimate power on theological speculation in the Middle Ages. But, surely, in the particular instance of the Atonement, it was the Greek doctor Gregory, of Nyssa, who formulated in its sharpest and most revolting form the doctrine of a legally binding formula that had to be dealt with before man could justly be rescued from the power of the devil. It is in his Great Catechism that we find the statement that the divinity of Christ was the hook, and the humanity the bait, by which the devil was caught, and so cheated into accepting, as the redemption of his bond, a victim which he afterwards found himself unable to retain. And it is this Gregorian doctrine of the Atonement, in various modifications, which we encounter everywhere, both in art and literature, till Anselm banished it from scientific theology, though not from popular tradition.

And as to Anselm himself, I cannot but think that Mr. Drummond does him some injustice. The service he rendered to the Christian world in raising the doctrine of the Atonement precisely to that plane of appeal to the moral consciousness and experience of man on which Mr. Drummond rightly lays such stress, appears to me to be inestimable. As to his phraseology, Mr. Drummond does not need me to tell him that debeo and debitum may mean not only I owe and debt, but I ought and the thing I ought to do; and it appears to me that from first to last Anselm lays unswerving stress on the inward necessity, not the outward obligation, of man filling in the void, and restoring the shattered order which sin has made in his own world, and so recovering his true relation to God. With Anselm it is not an angered God that has to be appeased, or an injured God that demands compensation, but a disturbed moral order that needs re-harmonising.

There is always both suggestion and instruction in what Mr. Drummond writes, and he can always give a reason for the faith that is in him. It is not likely that the points to which I have called attention have been overlooked by him; and if he will restate his position in such a form as to include them, or to explain why he ignores or denies them, I have no doubt that others, as well as myself, will be grateful to him for doing so.

THE LONDON APPEAL.

SIR,—I have read the appeal in your columns of the 13th inst., together with your editorial remarks in support of it, whereby you urge friends "throughout the country" to contribute. Now, I am only a simple countryman, but I have been to London, and when there have visited the chapels. From what I have thus had the opportunity of observing, I should have thought that there is much more need of building congregations to fill the chapels that already exist, than to build new chapels. It must be a fact generally recognised, that, except in one or two instances, the congregations in London are meagre, in some cases miserably so. Consequently, a doubt possesses me that even where we can afford the money, it would be far better to reserve it for our own needs (which, Heaven knows, are sore enough), than to devote it towards an effort to provide more chapels for the community in London, whom we have been in the habit of regarding as considerably better off than ourselves. Indeed, it has struck me that the Appeal would have come much more home to the heart of the Unitarian body as a whole, and have been altogether more impressive, if it had been for a National rather than a Metropolitan object. Such a course would have afforded invaluable opportunities of promoting the cause in many a centre where the field is really promising, but the community too deeply engaged in the struggle with financial difficulties to turn it to the best account. There must be many cases of that character throughout the country. I could mention one such.

THEOPHILUS LINDSEY'S TOMB.

SIR,—In the north-western corner of the Bunhill Fields' Cemetery stands the tomb of Theophilus Lindsey, weather-worn and decaying; it silently tells the story of his founding the Chapel in Essex-street, Strand. It is a sad sight to see the tomb of this grand "Unitarian Worthy" crumbling to dust, neglected and forsaken in the City of London amidst Unitarians and not far from the scenes of his ministry. In this cemetery we see how the Wesleyans revere, cherish and perpetuate the memory of their noble founder Wesley; also how fresh the memories are kept of John Bunyan, Hart, the hymn writer, and De Foe, author of "Robinson Crusoe," by various admirers. How have we remembered our saintly Lindsey and his courageous wife? Occasionally a few admirers from America and our country visit the tomb, but more often a workman may be seen taking his mid-day meal by the side of the tomb and enjoying his rest from the busy noise of toil; also boys and girls refreshing themselves with games among the graves and tombs. At the request of some friends I have undertaken the renovation of Lindsey's tomb, and proceeded with the necessary repairs at a cost not exceeding £15. In the tomb repose the remains of Mr. and Mrs. Lindsey, Thomas Belsham and Mrs. Raynor, who, nearly allied in blood to the illustrious "House of Percy," esteemed it a still greater honour to be the friend and fellow-worshipper of Mr. and Mrs. Lindsey.

MIRAGLIA'S RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT SPREADING IN SICILY.

SIR,—After several years' absence from Sicily, my friend Don Miraglia, the Bishop-Elect of Piacenza, having gone to Ucria, his native town, in the province of Messina, to see his mother, met with an enthusiastic reception from the people. He preached on the religious reform in Italy, first from the balcony of his own house in Ucria, then from the pulpit of the church there; subsequently in Patti, and is now preparing to spread the movement in Naples and Rome.

The people of Ucria have proclaimed their adhesion to, and solidarity with, the Oratorio di San Paolo (the Church of Miraglia) in Piacenza.

May God protect my brave, beloved friend from his enemies.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY MOVEMENT.

SIR,—We are needing two or three ladies to act as country visitors who could secure cottage homes for our London Sunday-school children.

Will you kindly help to make our want known to our friends who are interested in the Country Holiday Movement for weak and ailing children.

MINISTERS' CONFERENCE.

SIR,—On behalf of the London Unitarian Ministers' Meeting, I have great pleasure in inviting our brother ministers from the provinces to the Ministers' Conference at Essex Hall, on the Thursday afternoon in Whit-week, at four o'clock. An address, on "Twenty Years in the Unitarian Ministry," will be given by Rev. Charles Hargrove, M.A., and it is hoped there will be a good gathering of the brethren on the occasion.

OBITUARY.

MR. ARTHUR GREG.

THE death of Mr. Arthur Greg, of Eagley, Bolton, which we recorded last week, removes from our midst another member of a family closely associated with what is best in the life of our religious community. A son of Robert Hyde Greg, and brother of the late Henry Russell Greg, who at the time of his death, in 1894, was President of Manchester College, Oxford, Mr. Greg had been for over forty years resident at Eagley, and was head of the firm of Messrs. J. Chadwick and Brother, thread manufacturers. He served on the old Astley Bridge Local Board, and on the District Council which succeeded it, and when the district was included in the extended borough of Bolton, was appointed Alderman of the Ward. He was one of the first volunteers in the district, and only recently retired with the rank of hon. captain. To commemorate his brother's connection with Manchester College, Mr. Greg gave the beautiful oak screen which now separates the body of the college chapel from the entrance; he also gave the oak benches in the chapel as a memorial of the sixtieth anniversary of the Queen's accession. He was at the time of his death a vice-president of the college.

The funeral service at Dean Row, on Monday, was conducted by the Revs. J. Felstead and E. Allen. There was a large attendance, including workpeople from the mills at Eagley. The Committee of Manchester College was represented by the Rev. S. A. Steintal (chairman), Messrs. Harry Rawson, J.P., and R. D. Darbishire, and the Rev. P. M. Higginson, the Principal of the College was represented by his son, the Rev. W. H. Drummond, of Warrington. Mr. Greg, whose death was due to pneumonia and pleurisy, was sixty-three years of age.

IN MEMORIAM.

ARTHUR GREG.

No more we see your genial face,
No more we hear your pleasant voice,
Nor listen to your cheery words.
The helpful hand, the kindly deed
Which shed sweet fragrance where you went

Will sore be missed upon life's way.
In the full ripeness of your powers,
When earth in beauty fresh was clothed,
God's Reaper came to call you home
So swiftly. We can scarce believe
That we shall ne'er see you again.
The true, the kindly, gentle soul,
So rich in courtesy and grace,

Is now beyond our mortal sight.
Farewell. "Auf Wiedersehen" we cry
With stricken hearts. When night be gone
We'll meet again some brighter morn.
Earth's loss to-day is Heaven's gain.

Bolton, FRANK TAYLOR.

MR. JOSEPH ROBBERDS HOLLAND.

By the death of Mr. J. R. Holland, of Hampstead, we lose a member of a family long connected with the ministry of our churches, and one who himself took a personal interest and share in their work. Mr. Holland was the eldest son of the late Rev. Thomas Crompton Holland, for many years minister at Loughborough, and brother of the late Rev. Thomas Holland, of Southport. His mother was a sister of the Rev. John Gooch Robberds, of Manchester, and his father's family again was closely related to that of the Turners.

Born at Loughborough in 1828, he went out, as a young man, to the Cape of Good Hope, and settled at Port Elizabeth, where he resided till 1880. In 1857 he married the eldest daughter of the late Rev. Noah Jones, of Gateacre. His life at the Cape was uneventful, and he took little part in public affairs; but his voice was always on the side of justice and a truly liberal policy, and he recognised from first to last the excellence of Sir George Grey's ideas of Colonial government and administration, and felt keenly the serious loss that the Colony sustained in his removal from it.

Returning to England in 1880, Mr. Holland settled in Hampstead, retaining for some time his connection with his business at Port Elizabeth. He had now time to take part in some of the social and religious work that lay near him; and he was at the time of his death Chairman of Committee of the Hampstead Branch of the Charity Organisation Society, and Treasurer of the Mansford-street Mission.

For some time past Mr. Holland's state of health had given cause for anxiety, and weakness of the heart had warned him that the end might come suddenly at any time. It could not have come more peacefully or painlessly than it did on Friday of last week, scarcely more than an hour after he had been sitting out in the garden in the quiet enjoyment of the spring afternoon. He leaves a widow, two sons, and one daughter, and with them a niece, daughter of his youngest brother Frank who died at the Cape of Good Hope some time before the family returned to England.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the Journal of John Woolman.

I HAD occasion to consider that it is a weighty thing to speak much in large meetings for business, for except our minds are rightly prepared, and we clearly understand the case we speak of, instead of forwarding, we hinder business, and make more labour for those on whom the burden of the work is laid. If selfish views or a partial spirit have any room in our minds, we are unfit for the Lord's work; if we have a clear prospect of the business, and proper weight on our minds to speak, we should avoid useless apologies and repetitions. Where people are gathered from far, and adjourning a meeting of business is attended with great difficulty, it behoves all to be cautious how they detain a meeting, especially when they have sat six or seven hours, and have a great distance to ride home.

I often saw the necessity of keeping down to that root from whence our concern proceeded, and have cause, in reverent thankfulness, humbly to bow down before the Lord, who was near to me, and preserved my mind in calmness under some sharp conflicts, and begat a spirit of sympathy and tenderness in me towards some who were grievously entangled by the spirit of this world.

The natural man loveth eloquence, and many love to hear eloquent orations, and if there be not a careful attention to the gift, men who have once laboured in the pure gospel ministry, growing weary of suffering, and ashamed of appearing weak, may kindle a fire, compass themselves about with sparks, and walk in the light, not of Christ, who is under suffering, but of that fire which they in departing from the gift have kindled, in order that those hearers who have left the meek, suffering state for worldly wisdom may be warmed with this fire and speak highly of their labours. That which is of God gathers to God, and that which is of the world is owned by the world.

In this journey (through England in 1772) a labour hath attended my mind, that the ministers among us may be preserved in the meek, feeling life of truth, where we may have no desire but to follow Christ, and to be with him, that when he is under suffering, we may suffer with him, and never desire to rise up in dominion, but as he, by the virtue of his own spirit, may raise us.

We were taught by renewed experience to labour for an inward stillness; at no time to seek for words, but to live in the spirit of truth, and utter that to the people which truth opened to us.

I saw at this time that if I was honest in declaring that which truth opened in me, I could not please all men; and I laboured to be content in the way of my duty, however disagreeable to my own inclination.

The place of prayer is a precious habitation. . . . I saw this habitation to be safe—to be inwardly quiet when there were great stirrings and commotions in the world.

The only way to make other people good is to be good.—G. MacDonald.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

Good Things also Grow.

IF we are offered the gift of a puppy dog, we know that the puppy will grow; yet that may not be a reason why we should refuse it. Let us ask what sort of a dog it is going to be, because some dogs are a treasure. If this is going to be a bulldog, you do not want it, for it is not pretty, and its habit of biting and holding on, and never letting go, is not nice. But perhaps it is a Newfoundland dog; and then it will grow very large, and if you fall into the water it will plunge in and bring you out. Another large dog which saves people's lives is the St. Bernard dog. It is named after the monastery of St. Bernard in the Alps, because the monks there keep dogs of this sort. Sometimes a traveller crossing the mountains in the snow becomes very tired and sits down, or even falls down exhausted. The cold makes him feel sleepy, and there is no one to rouse him and remind him that if he sleeps he will not wake again. The snow covers him, and he would be frozen to death if succour did not soon arrive. But one of these dogs comes along, he smells him, and scratches away the snow, and warms the traveller with his breath and with his body, and wakes him up. The traveller sees a basket hanging round the dog's neck, with food and wine in it. He drinks the wine and is refreshed; he takes the food and begins to eat; and then the dog hurries back to the monastery to bring help. The traveller's life is saved. A dog of that sort is worth his weight in gold. If a little puppy is offered you as a gift, and you are told that it will grow big, you will say—All the better!

Some years ago there was an American water-weed brought to this country, and it soon filled the ponds and streams, so fast did it grow. They say that "ill weeds grow apace." The farmers and others wished it had never been brought over at all; for, although a little of it might have looked pretty, it was a great nuisance when it left room for nothing else. When people use the proverb, however, and say that ill weeds grow apace, they are not thinking of weeds that fill the pond and choke the stream, but of bad ways and habits which occupy our thoughts and take up our time. Suppose we read tales by day and go to the theatre at night, and do this once a month, and then once a week, and then twice a week or oftener, these things will so fill our heads that there will be no room for useful knowledge, and so fill up our time that our proper work will be neglected. The stream of life will not flow healthily and prosperously.

It is a great blessing that some other things grow fast besides weeds. How do we get our bread? It grows, and grows fast—grows in the fields. Our thoughts must go beyond the baker's shop. Bread is made from flour, and flour is obtained by grinding corn. A grain of corn is a little thing. If I hold up a grain, it seems ridiculous to talk of feeding millions of people with it. But a grain of corn will grow. Put it in the ground and it will send up a stalk which will bear thirty grains, or even sixty. Suppose it be but thirty, and we sow them all, and they each bear thirty in the second season—how many is that? 900—right! Then if we sow all the 900, how many shall we get in the third year?—"27,000." Now, by-and-by get your slates and calculate and see how very soon you get into millions! More than twenty-one millions in the 5th year! What a blessing that good things increase and multiply, and not weeds alone! Suppose your pennies were to multiply like that: you would soon be rich. It is of no use putting pennies in the ground, they will not grow. You can put them in the bank though, and then they will bear interest. And when you have saved enough you can go into business and make many profits. Many men have begun with only half-a-crown, and have become prosperous. The way to lay the foundation of a fortune is to spend less than you earn, and never let your pocket be empty; save something every day, and lay it out in a way that makes more of it.

I fancy, however, I hear a little girl saying—"I have no money to save, and I do not want to be rich; but I should like to do some good. What can a little girl do?"

I will tell you. She can speak a kind word, and lend a helping hand, and so help to make life happy for others. "Yes, but I can do so little," you say, "and what I do does not increase like the corn. I am only one, and I have only one pair of hands, and what I can do to-day is hardly more than I did yesterday." Now that may be a mistake; a good action is often like seed that grows and multiplies, because it sets an example.

We ought not to sit idle and fancy that one person can do so little. Jesus Christ was only one when he began his work, and now his followers are numbered by millions and millions. He first gathered about him twelve disciples, and taught them, and then he sent them out to teach others. In that way his good teaching soon filled "all the world." He knew that it would be so, for he likened it to a grain of mustard seed, which is very small at first, but swells when it is put into the ground, and grows to be a great tree. G. ST. CLAIR.

PEACE.

WERE half the power that fills the world with terror,

Were half the wealth bestowed on camps and courts,

Given to redeem the human soul from error,

There were no need for arsenals and forts.

The warrior's name would be a name abhorred!

And every nation that should lift again Its hand against a brother, on its forehead Would wear for evermore the curse of Cain!

Down the dark Future, through long generations,

The echoing sounds grow fainter, and then cease;

And, like a bell, with solemn, sweet vibrations,

I hear once more the voice of Christ say "Peace!"

Peace! and no longer from its brazen portals

The blast of war's great organ shakes the skies!

But beautiful as songs of the immortals, The holy melodies of love arise!

AT WHITSUNTIDE.

DURING the coming week the annual meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Sunday School Association, and other societies interested in the welfare of our religious community and the work to which it is called, will bring together friends from all parts of the country for counsel and good-fellowship. At Whitsuntide the questions always recur with fresh vividness, when we are preparing for discussions and anxious to strengthen the bonds of union and the various agencies for good work—Have we the true spirit of religious life? What is the over-mastering purpose that brings us together? In what temper shall we engage in the discussions which demand our attention? In what, or, rather, in whom, is our surest trust, and where do we look for the strength that must prevail? Such questions we must ask most directly of ourselves, searching our secret motives, testing the quality of our own inward life, both as individuals and as a people gathered into worshipping societies. And a further useful test is found in considering our attitude towards other religious bodies, and the wider movements of religious life in the world.

We shall be asked during the coming week to consider questions bearing on spiritual freedom and personal religion, especially as affected by the claims of sacerdotalism. Such questions are forced on our attention by the acute discussions within the Church of England and in other European countries; and, apart from the interest every citizen of this country must have in the National Church, there are in "the crisis" object-lessons from which we may learn wisdom for ourselves. At the recent meeting of the Congregational Union a paper on sacerdotalism was read by Mr. J. COMPTON RICKETT, M.P., which drew such a lesson. Sacerdotalism he described as imposing upon the people by external authority a faith set above reason. What was wanted was "to meet it with a re-statement of religion in accordance with faith and reason, and yet in touch with religious fervour." Others have urged disestablishment as the only remedy, and the Congregational Union has appointed Mr. J. CARVELL WILLIAMS, M.P., the distinguished champion of Disestablishment, as Chairman of next year. But however just and desirable on other grounds the disestablishment of the Church of England may be, there seems to us a curious inconsequence in the argument, since the most purely sacerdotal of all Churches in this country is not established, and there are other bodies also not free from the dangers of a growing sacerdotalism. The true remedy is, in our view, that urged by Mr. COMPTON RICKETT, the re-statement of religion in the form of a worthier and profounder truth, and, we would add, a renewed demonstration of that truth in the power of the Spirit. Such is the call which comes to-day to our Free Churches, as to all who believe in spiritual freedom and in the divine significance of reason and conscience, with which no priest may interfere.

Most interesting light has recently been thrown on this subject from other quarters beyond the borders of this country.

A lecture of Professor HARNACK's, recently published in an English translation, and entitled "Thoughts on the Present Position of Protestantism,"* utters a warning against what the author considers to be the surrender of the Protestant Church in Germany to a growing spirit of sacerdotalism.

"The chief enemy to-day," he says, "is not political Catholicism, or 'Ultramontanism,' although that is a tendency which never ceases to be dangerous. It is Catholicism as a religion and an ecclesiastical spirit that threatens us; it is clericalism and ritualism, the alluring union of exalted piety and solemn secularity, and the substitution for religion of obedience."

The Protestant conception of the Church as "a congregation of faithful men" is forgotten, and while the growth of scientific knowledge and of the historical sense has destroyed the dogmatic system, which was formerly the standard of faith, there is yet a growing emphasis laid on "the Creed" as a symbol of unity, on liturgical uniformity, on the sacraments and those who administer them, as of peculiar sanctity, and on the Church as an institution. Thus, in Professor HARNACK's view, the Protestant Church of Germany tends to become a second Catholic Church, "without the Pope, and the saints and monks." And yet he refuses to despair.

Protestantism has only to remember its original principles, and the duty incumbent upon it to shut its ears to no form of truth, and then it is impregnable. These are the principles which demolished Mediævalism; which produced men of individual character; which helped to found and develop modern culture.

Protestants seem to be weak, because they do not fight in close columns. But they will not surrender. They hold to individual responsibility, and they will not desert their Church, but strive to retain it as a Church of Faith, Freedom, and Patience. Such is Dr. HARNACK's appeal to his fellow-countrymen.

From France we hear of a movement of the greatest significance from out of the bosom of the Catholic Church itself. In this month's Contemporary Review there is an article by the Abbé BOURRIER on "the Evangelical Movement among the French Clergy," showing how wide-spread is the revolt of the priests against the tyranny of the Church of Rome, and how in many places there has been a popular response, priests who publicly come out from the Church being no longer stamped with disgrace, but eagerly listened to by many of their old parishioners, as the preachers of a truer gospel. Since October, 1897, M. BOURRIER has been editing a monthly journal, Le Crétien Français, as the organ of the revolting priests, and a little volume of selections from this paper, compiled and translated by Mr. J. BRIERLEY of the Christian World, under the title "Rome from Inside,"† shows how deeply rooted and genuine the movement is.

May we not say that under various aspects and in different lands these are motions of the One Spirit, calling to truer life? We shall be more faithful in our own place, and better fitted to receive fresh enlightenment, as we learn to recognise and heartily to welcome the new light wherever it appears.

WINIFRED HOUSE. — The Children's Invalid Home celebrated its eighth birthday by an At Home on Saturday last, when nearly a hundred guests assembled to see the arrangements of the Home, and to be introduced to the sixteen little patients who are there. After a few words of welcome from Miss M. Pritchard, the children gave a small entertainment of songs and simple recitations, which they had prepared with intense pleasure for the occasion. Everyone then adjourned into the garden for tea. The friends assembled expressed themselves as thoroughly pleased with the general appearance of the Home and its arrangements, while the happy faces of the children bore witness to the delight they took in having "a party of their own."

SECULAR AND SACRED.

BY THE REV. H. GOW, B.A.

"Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."—1 Cor. x. 31.

MR. SPURGEON used to say that he smoked to the glory of God. It is a daring expression, one which only a very good man whose life was devoted to doing God's will could employ without cant, but after all it is the only religious justification of any of our actions. If we are God's children, if our lives are under His guidance and given us for high purposes, then there can be no part of them which is without reference to Him. Paul's words are sufficiently daring, asserting, as they do, that we can and ought to eat and drink to the glory of God. He does not divide the sacred from the profane, the holy from the secular. To him there is nothing unclean in itself. It is the spirit of the act, the purpose, the plan of life with which it is connected that makes it sacred or profane.

We often hear it said that modern life is being secularised. What do we mean when we say this or assent to it? What we ought to mean is that men and women are more and more concerning themselves with the transitory material things of this life: what we often do mean is that men and women are more and more managing their own affairs independently of the organised churches, which, in a sense, represent religion. The word secular comes from a Latin word meaning a generation or an age. A secular employment then means an employment that works only for temporal, not for eternal advantages: a secular tendency is a tendency to care more for short pleasures than for long ones, for things that change and decay rather than for the things that wax not old. So far as there is any real distinction between secular and sacred, it is this distinction between the seen and the unseen, the transitory and the permanent, the temporal and the eternal, and I shall return to this real meaning of secular in a few minutes. But what many people mean by the growing secularisation of the world, is that amusements, literature, education, almsgiving, and many other forms of human activity are passing out of the control of Christian churches into the hands of those who make them the business of their lives. We have seen indeed a slight set back to this tendency in the last few years in education, so that the leading church of our country has perhaps a somewhat stronger hold to-day upon elementary education than it had two years ago. But the movement upon the whole is quite clear and unmistakable. In early English times almost all important forms of human activity were portions of church work. The priests were the lawyers, the physicians, the architects, the poets, the historians, the dramatists, the teachers, and the almoners of their age. Almost the only things relegated to the laity were fighting and commerce. Those were the two only important employments which were distinctly secular. There were, as we all know, priests who took part in battles, there were no doubt priests who engaged in commerce, but these activities were not generally regarded as quite legitimate occupations for the priest, while law, medicine, architecture, literature, education, and many other kinds of work were in early days almost confined to the priesthood. We have developed very much since those days. Law, medicine, architecture and literature have been established as independent professions, and education and almsgiving are developing in the same direction. So far as secularisation means this separation of various important professions from direct control by the church, we may regard it as a matter for congratulation. It sets the church free for its own definite work of preaching the Gospel. There is no doubt that education will be better done when it is free from ecclesiastical control, when it is made the serious study of a lifetime and is raised to the dignity of an independent profession.

That was the attitude of many of our churches in connection with education. As long as unsectarian education was not given by the State it was felt to be a duty to maintain our day schools, where this ideal of an unsectarian education was realised to the utmost of our power. But when it was recognised as the best method by the people at large, although the recognition was not quite so full and complete as we could have wished, we gladly retired from this field of work and ungrudgingly yielded our task to abler hands, feeling that a work so important and so large ought to stand by itself unconnected with any one sect or church.

Now the most striking example of secularisation at the present time, in this sense of freeing itself from control by the church, is the secularisation of the Sunday. In the sense in which I have been using the term secular—namely, freedom from ecclesiastical control, we ought not to be afraid of the secularisation of the Sunday. The Sabbath was made for man, not for the church or for the clergyman. We do not fulfil the whole idea of the Sunday by attending public worship once or even twice. Ministers have too often taken up one of two positions, saying either this is God's day or this is my day. It is not God's day, any more than any other day. So far as serving God is concerned, there will be much more effort needed, there will be much more difficulty encountered on the six days on which we are engaged in our ordinary work. So far as praise and prayer are concerned, there ought to be some praise and prayer in every day that passes. It is a day indeed set apart for public worship amongst other things, and it would be a most serious loss to the life of any nation when such public worship, uniting them as brothers and sisters with a common Father, ceased from their midst.

But it is not God's day in any peculiar sense, still less is it the minister's day in which the congregation should submit itself to his influence and teaching. It is peculiarly our own day, the day for the soul to be quiet and free and thankful. Putting away from us the work which occupies and must occupy so large a portion of our thoughts, the work which, just because we devote ourselves to it throughout the week, limits and narrows our mind, putting away the worries and problems of our daily occupations, we want to look at life in a free wholesome way, we want to think of others with whom, through our work, we come into conflict or competition, in a sympathetic, large, generous spirit, we want to join with our fellows, rich and poor, old and young, in prayer and praise to God. It is good that Sunday should be secularised, if that means that we recognise, on the one hand, that it is not God's only day, and, on the other hand, that it is not a mere church function. It is essentially a free day, in which our deeper affections can find time to expand, a day sacred to the home, to the life of the spirit, a day to think quietly of our life, a day of rest both from the excitements and the drudgeries of daily work.

It is because the Sunday newspaper interferes with this essential character of the Sunday, not because it interferes with the parson and not because it is wrong in itself, that it seems to me objectionable. It is well that we should know what is going on about us in politics, in commerce, in sport, in literature, and in life generally. A large acquaintance with contemporary thought and action in all departments of life is an education and a safeguard to our own lives, as well as a legitimate amusement and an assistance to us in our work. But we need some time for larger and more important things than these, a time of freedom from this devouring eagerness to know everything that is happening, a time of quiet thought: a time when, if we read, we read books of permanent value, a time when the spirit shakes itself free from the fetters of its daily work and thought, and from the fetters of other people's daily work and thought as well, a time of enlargement of thought, of reverie, and of quiet gladness and peace. That peace, that freedom of spirit, that power to stand apart for a little time from our ordinary duties and pleasures, that power of detachment which Matthew Arnold insisted was so important in every life, is threatened and endangered by the Sunday newspapers. The world's ways are more than ever pressed upon us: they fill up all our thoughts, and leave no opportunity for the soul to feel free and alone, and to look at life with its own eyes in quietness and confidence. It is not, then, because I am jealous for the power of the church, but because we ought all to be jealous for the freedom of the soul, that I think we ought, as far as possible, to resist this new development.

Secularisation, then, in so far as it means freedom from ecclesiastical control, is not to be feared or deprecated. One great profession, or activity, or institution after another emerges into independent responsible individuality, after having been fostered for a time by the church and having grown up under its guidance. It is better that they should be free from the church if only they realise their responsibility to God and man. But if the world is being secularised in the sense of caring more for the temporal than the eternal, more for the transitory than the permanent, more for the seen than the unseen, that is a much more serious thing. This, however, is not a conflict between the church and the world, or between Sunday and Monday; it is a conflict in the soul between the things that are real and the things that are unreal, between what leads to peace and life and what leads to misery and death. Sunday might be observed as strictly as it was by our Puritan ancestors, and yet this secularisation of soul might be going on. To care most for money-making or for pleasure, to throw all the passion and power of sustained work, which God has given us for noble service, into these things, to look at life continuously with these aims and ideals, that is the secularisation which is to be feared. The man who has realised how much love means, how much obedience to principle means, how much the following of high ideals means, the man who feels that these things are of far more importance to his life than money or pleasure, is the man whose life is sacred and not secular. His life, in all its parts, is dominated and controlled by noble purposes. It may be a life of very ordinary acts and thoughts, of the same commonplace pattern outwardly as ten thousand others. But it is not a secular but a sacred life, although it may be engaged constantly with transitory things, because the eternal, not the world, is in his heart. We are not divided by the kinds of work we do, but by the spirit in which we do the work that lies ready to our hands. Things are not divided into secular or sacred according as they belong to the church or the world; they are made secular or sacred by the way in which they are treated. They are secular if regarded as ends in themselves; they are sacred if they are seen to be parts and necessary parts of one great plan, subserving higher uses than their own.

It is no wild impossible idea but a sober statement of real fact, that if we would make life holy and strong and powerful, whether we eat or drink or whatsoever we do, we should do all to the glory of God.

MILITARISM—THE ENEMY OF CIVILISATION.*

BY THE REV. JOSEPH MAY.

THE word I am using—militarism—is new. It has arisen under the exigencies of modern days to formulate the idea of the enormous extent, and the terrible, scientific orderliness of the preparations for warfare now existing among the great nations. It implies the organisation, as seen in Europe, of whole populations into standing armies, always ready for service.

But the thing is only new in its proportions, its elaborateness and the terrible instruments it commands; and the underlying principle is as old as human nature. It goes back beyond the period of our humanity, to that in which men were still only brutes. It is the principle of self-assertion, in its highest form, supported by the enormous material power of great peoples, and directed to utilise all the gains of science and civilisation in the interests of brute-force.

Militarism is the orderly expression, in forms now methodical and costly beyond description, of the principle formulated in the ancient and infidel maxim, "Might makes right." It organises the animal propensity, so soon as there arises any conflict of interest, to resort, not to rational processes of mutual consideration and conciliation, but to physical strife. It invests the heroes of force with a lustre which the men of intellect, of religion, of art, of benevolence, cannot attain. It blinds the eyes of the people to their true interests. Under its influence, men discredit the principles which have been dear and which are most highly essential to their welfare—as we are seeing to-day among our own people. The spirit of conquest aroused among us, flouts to-day the axioms of our immortal Declaration of Independence.

How can this be so, my friends? How can a population of quiet people, pursuing the avocations out of which their comfort and welfare are procured, be excited to the terrible excesses of war's pecuniary extravagance, of cruelty mutually inflicted by combatants utterly unknown to each other, to the rage of battle, to murder, incendiarism and rapine?

It is perfectly plain, how. It is simply because in our race, still imperfectly advanced in a true and high civilisation, there lingers, below our culture, below our morality, below our religion, the element of barbarism, the quality of the brute. Within the limits of orderly communities, in the relations of individuals, this element of our nature has been taught restraint. Society has been possible because, at length, the assertion of the brute in the relations of life has been found incompatible with the orderly, decent and happy life which communities have resolved to maintain, and they will no longer tolerate it that individuals should vindicate even their clearest rights by physical force. The majority simply will not permit citizens who disagree to fall to fighting in our streets. If two of you have a cause of dissension, no longer may you saddle your horses, and with armour and arms, meet each other, backed by your retainers, in such contests as were habitual in feudal times. Civilised societies ordain laws, provide courts of justice, and absolutely insist on peace among their members. The brute exists in us all. Passion exists in the most refined, as a rudiment of feeling. But so far has civilisation advanced, the lower propensities are restrained to the point of practical non-existence. On the borders of civilised lands—in Arizona and New Mexico—private warfare is still practised. Our Southern fellow-citizens defy law and cruelly murder defenceless accused persons—at least those of a different colour. Occasionally, a riot breaks out in more polished communities, in which classes of men, more brutal than the rest, for a moment assert themselves and fling themselves against the forces of order and government. But, effectively, in private relations, the brutality which was rampant in barbarous periods, and which controlled all in the still earlier times of savagery, is conquered and, as an overt fact, extirpated.

But, as between peoples, over whom a common law has not yet extended itself, authoritatively, the same citizens who will not tolerate brutalism among themselves, still uphold brute-force as a justifiable principle of mutual behaviour and means of adjusting their differences. They rejoice in its horrible deeds. They invoke it enthusiastically. The principle underlying international war is exactly the same as that of the duel or the street fight. But it is still possibly to glorify it, and for civilised men to practice it at the end of the nineteenth century of Christianity.

This, I say, is simply due to the survival of barbarism in civilised times and peoples. It marks the limit of all that religion, science, culture have so far been able to do in lifting men above the brute to the nature and condition of children of God.

I am not saying that it is yet possible to abandon all resort to force in maintaining the institutions of men, and the good order of communities. So long as there linger barbarous elements in a community, and criminal individuals and classes ready to break the peace of civilised society, so long some orderly force will be required, as in cities we maintain the police. Perhaps the day, even of warfare, is not wholly past, although I believe it never need be necessary now, if any nation will on its own part fixedly maintain justice, manifest consideration and persevere in a self-controlled policy of internal civilisation. Would all the civilised nations together, abandoning selfish greed, devote themselves, severally, to the real interests of their peoples, it would never occur again. What I am saying implies that, however it should occur, it would still exhibit the deficiency of the world's civilisation. War is the device of the barbarous period of social progress. If practised by civilised peoples, in some crucial exigency, it should still be deemed, like capital punishment, a horrible and tragic thing, not to be gloried in, but penitentially to be lamented before Almighty God. What militarism does, is to entrench this barbarism as a permanent fact in civilisation; to gild it over so that its brutality is not clearly seen by civilised eyes. And this is the comprehensive evil of militarism. It makes it, at this moment, the most effective foe of human progress, the most difficult obstacle in the way of advancing civilisation.

NOTES FROM CALCUTTA.

Calcutta, April 6, 1899.

THERE is a good story told of a member of the Shah's suite, when that monarch was on a visit to England some years ago. At a reception in London, one of the guests said to this gentleman: "I believe your countrymen worship the sun, do they not?" "Yes," smartly replied the Parsee, "and so would you if ever you saw him!" We see the sun in Calcutta; and that we feel "him" also is a proposition which nobody here would dispute. A few days ago the new Viceroy—who, by the way, has impressed all India by the ability, the candour, and the independent tone of his replies to addresses of welcome—said that it had been too hot to make speeches. So he has gone off to the cooler air of Simla, where, instead of orations, there will be a succession of social gaieties. Everybody who is anybody in Calcutta will follow. Those who stand just outside the inner circle will go to Darjeeling. Those whose purse-strings do not reach to Simla or Darjeeling will stay at home—and swelter. Their summer outings are confined to the Maidan and the Eden Gardens, which are to Calcutta what the parks are to London. Eden Gardens is the fashionable promenade and drive during the Calcutta season. When the season is over, and "the upper ten" find life worth living only at Simla and Darjeeling, the "common people," having endured the broiling sun amid the blaze of day, resort to the Eden Gardens to enjoy whatever cooling influence the evening may bring. "The breeze of eve" is not an infrequent visitor there, and it is delightfully refreshing after the grilling sunshine. The baking heat is not without its compensations.

There are some noticeable contrasts on the surface of things between Madras and Calcutta. In Calcutta there is even a larger proportion of natives in European costume. The rest of the native population—of course, the great majority—may be divided, as Hopkinson Smith divides the Mexicans, into two classes, those who have something on and those who have almost nothing. The prevailing colour is white. One misses the infinite variety of tints that gives picturesqueness to the dress of the Madrasses. Then, again, there is an almost total absence of the Brahminical marks on the forehead. In twelve weeks I have seen but five persons with those outward and visible signs of Brahminical cults, and one of those five was a Madras gentleman. The omission is the very rare exception in Madras. Once again, there is not the same rigid abstinence from forbidden fruit as in Madras. A Burmese gentleman, who has become a personal friend, tells me that he recently went into a dining-room, called a "Hindu Restaurant," expecting to see only Hindu dishes, when, to his astonishment, he found a number of Hindus eating beef! I ventured to remind him that this was only a case of reversion, that beef was a common article of food in the Vedic period, that in the Brihadāranyaka Upanishad it is enjoined, that a husband and wife who wish to have born to them a son who should be famous, a public man, a public speaker, and learned in all the Vedas, should nourish themselves upon the meat of a young or an old bull.

It was Gautama the Buddha who first absolutely prohibited meat. But, notwithstanding the spread of Buddhist views, beef was a recognised article of Hindu food about the beginning of the Christian era. By the time of Yājñavalkya, beef-eating had come to be regarded as a sin; and by the beginning of the fifth century A.D., vegetarianism had become firmly established. My friend was surprised at the disregard of restrictions about food; but it is the general testimony that, with the spread of Western ideas, there is now great freedom in the choice of food. Prior to the establishment of British rule even smelling beef while cooking—let alone eating it—was considered an offence sufficiently heinous to be punished with excommunication. But now eating whatever one likes no longer subjects a Hindu to excommunication. I am told by a competent authority that among educated Hindus in Bengal, the number of those who disregard caste-rules about food is, at the present day, greater than those who still observe them. The heterodox Hindus, as my friend saw, openly dine at the table, and partake of forbidden animal food cooked and served by non-Hindus, or very low-caste, or practically no-caste, Hindus. If such is the result within seventy-eight years of the establishment of the first English school, and within thirty-nine years of the foundation of the first English University in India, one can easily predict what the result will be half a century hence with the increasing spread of English education.

The Brahmo movement in Calcutta, strong as it is, is not nearly so strong as it would have been, but for the circumstances which rent the original society asunder, and the effects of which are still manifest. It would be imprudent for an outsider to intrude upon those most unhappy of strifes—family quarrels. But an outsider, coming on the scene with an entirely unbiased mind, is, perhaps, in a better position to estimate the consequences of these disastrous divisions than those who are immediately concerned in them, who are indeed the subjects of them, and who naturally have their varying preconceptions. That by this time Brahmoism would have been, perhaps, the most powerful religious influence in Bengal, but for these divisions, is generally admitted. It is profoundly to be regretted that such a result has been hindered, has been postponed to a far-off future, by differences which do not affect vital principles, but are differences mainly of a personal character, described by Mr. Mozoomdar in his Interpreter, as "so many though frivolous." But regrets are unavailing. One has to face the situation as it is; and a way out of it does not present itself. I see no prospect of reunion, or, indeed, of hearty co-operation on lines on which all might join hands; and I am sure that any attempt to force a reconciliation for which there is no real enthusiasm would result in intensifying the present alienations. One can only hope that out of the healing influences of time, and out of a deeper and richer spiritual life, there will be born that large spirit which will bury the past in oblivion, and which will start a new life, animated and dominated by the charity which will constrain every man to look, not on his own things, but on the things of others, and in honour to prefer one another.

The Sadharan Brahmo Somaj is the strongest body of Brahmos in Calcutta at the present day. The Adi Samaj, which was founded by Raja Ram Mohan Roy, and revived by the now venerable and venerated Devendra Nath Tagore, has now become almost merged into Neo-Hinduism. The Progressive Brahmo sect, started by Keshub Chunder Sen, and subsequently named the New Dispensation, has declined into a small body, or rather into three small bodies, kept asunder by internal dissensions. Among these, however, are a few men of brilliant intellectual ability, and of intense religious spirit. Mr. Mozoomdar is everywhere appreciated for his high character, fervent spirituality, literary culture, and oratorical power. Among the younger men of "light and leading," Professor Benoyendra Nath Sen, M.A., one of the most brilliant graduates of Calcutta University, impresses everyone who comes into contact with him as a man of the deepest religiousness of spirit combined with a winsome simplicity. In an address he recently gave on "The Ministry of Jesus," he dwelt with great fervour on the perfect accord between the teaching and the life of Christ. The Rev. Bhai Gour Govind Roy is a Christ-like soul. To him Mr. Mozoomdar wrote fifteen years ago: "United with you I desire to worship and serve the Lord." The New Dispensation has just received a valuable accession to its ministry in the person of Professor Mohit Chunder Sen, M.A., who has resigned his professorship at Dacca College to devote himself to missionary work among that section of the Brahmos.

The Sadharan Somaj has a membership of about 150, with a congregation of 800 to 1,000. Among its members are a number of European-trained Bengalis, with University degrees from Oxford, Cambridge, London, and Edinburgh, and occupying high positions in local colleges, at the Bar, and in the Government service.

With these are also Calcutta-trained graduates who had distinguished careers at the Presidency College. There are, too, several lady graduates. The minister is Pandit Sivanath Shastri, M.A., who, some years ago, gave up a lucrative Government appointment to devote himself to Brahmo religious work on a mere pittance. As allied institutions there are the Brahmo Girls' School, the Sunday-school, the Theological Society, the Students' Weekly Service. In the Sunday-school several books of our Sunday School Association are used. The Theological Society devotes itself to philosophical-religious subjects—for example, the two most recently read Papers were on "The Critical Philosophy and its Influence on Religion," and "The Vedantic Philosophy." The Students' Weekly Service, a vigorous society, consists of religious services, lectures, and "Question Nights." Question nights afford a rich and well-used opportunity for heckling the chairman. It is his duty to answer, to the best of his ability, questions from the audience. These questions are always of a philosophical and religious character—often puzzling to the unenviable occupant of the chair; but they are most useful as an index to the problems which are agitating the minds of the students. Your correspondent has passed through the ordeal, and found it a helpful experience.

Brahmos of all sections in Calcutta have been pioneers in social and educational reforms, and leaders in philanthropic and charitable movements. It is doubtful whether they now occupy this position in every form of good work. Probably their influence in these directions has diminished. But it will always stand to their credit that they were the advance guard, and if others outside their ranks now carry on such work without their help, it is because they have indoctrinated masses of their countrymen with their reforming and humanitarian spirit and principles without attracting them to their religious movement. They have laboured, and others have entered into their labours—sown, and others reaped. Still, they continue steadfast in their good works, though with less visible influence than formerly. Perhaps the most imperative call upon them at the present moment is to pay supreme attention to the religious side of their movement, and to give to the culture of the spiritual life pre-eminence over even social reforms.

When this letter reaches London I shall be among our friends of the Unitarian Union in the Khasi Hills, Assam.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

DURING the last month we have had two interesting anniversaries in our province.

In Newcastle we were fortunate in securing the Rev. Charles Hargrove as the preacher of the annual sermons at the Church of the Divine Unity. This gentleman's popularity extends far beyond the borders of Unitarianism, and our local newspapers gave interesting details of his career, and extensive reports of his sermons. His evening sermon, especially, on "A Freethinker's Faith," made a deep impression, and it was a matter for congratulation that so many friends from orthodox churches were present to listen to this weighty utterance. The morning sermon, on "Not Buried, but Risen," is included in the series of Mill Hill Discourses, and most of your readers will know from its perusal how much it was appreciated when delivered with all the preacher's characteristic force and eloquence. On the Monday evening Mr. Hargrove gave an interesting address on "The Condition and Prospects of our Unitarian Churches"; and he most kindly extended his visit to the North in order to speak at a soirée at Gateshead on the Tuesday. Altogether, the visit of our friend was very stimulating; his unfaltering faith in the good cause, his defiance of grumblers and croakers, and his breezy, optimistic courage, help to clear the air of clouds of depression and fogs of indifference. Another very interesting function in our district has been a modest bazaar at Choppington. The little church there has become very dilapidated, and the congregation resolutely determined to raise £50 for purposes of restoration. Though trusting that friends outside would encourage and assist them, they worked themselves with the utmost industry, and collected a large assortment of useful articles, whose sale, I am glad to say, has realised £60. Our friends in this colliery village deserve all the assistance that can be extended to them; they are showing signs of new vitality; and if they can only maintain their present zeal they will soon overcome the difficulties which have so long disheartened them. Since Mr. Harvie removed from Byker to Gateshead, the former place has been served by our lay-preachers who have most efficiently maintained the services, while the week-night meetings have also been held regularly through the winter by the help of a band of workers from Unity Church. Arrangements are now being made for one of our lay-workers to take entire charge of the Sunday-school and evening service at Byker, and we are looking forward with earnest hope to happy results from this pew experiment. Mr. Harvie still divides his time between Gateshead and Choppington, and at the latter place is rendering excellent services by reviving interest in the Sunday-school.

This week we have had our "Spring Conference" at Middlesbrough, combining, most admirably, the anniversary of our church in that town, the business meeting of the Tees-side Committee, and the soirée of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Association. I undertook the annual services on Sunday, and was thankful to see the improvement in the congregation since last I preached there. The morning congregation was excellent, and in the evening I could discover only a very few vacant seats. There was an atmosphere of enthusiasm and earnestness amongst the people that was most inspiring, and the numbers of strangers present gave evidence that there is a good deal of interest in Unitarianism amongst orthodox people in Ironopolis. I have seldom conducted anniversary services that have left such satisfactory and hopeful impressions as those which I received last Sunday. Mr. Lambelle must be congratulated on the new life he has infused into this church; and, from what I hear, Stockton is also reaping a harvest from his indefatigable labour. Monday, May 8, was, indeed, a time of ecclesiastical dissipation. From two o'clock in the afternoon till ten at night, the time was entirely occupied by the functions of sale of work, tea-party, committee, conference, and public meeting. Friends were present from all parts of our province, and their social intercourse was not the least of the pleasures in which we indulged. Mr. E. Cox-Walker was chairman at all the three meetings, and discharged his lengthened duties with courtesy, tact, and business-like ability. At the afternoon conference the important question was discussed as to the need of a new minister for the Tees-side churches. Stockton and Middlesbrough are worked by Mr. Lambelle as efficiently as is possible under such a difficult condition of things; but every Sunday a lay-preacher has to undertake one of the services for each congregation; while three Sundays every month Barnard Castle is also dependent upon lay help. The work required is almost more than can be overtaken by our small band of preachers; and, though Mr. Bell, of Redcar, has practically made himself responsible for the Barnard Castle pulpit, the strain of constant Sunday duty becomes almost too great for men who are working at their businesses during the week. These things were earnestly discussed for about two hours on Monday afternoon, and a resolution was adopted affirming the need of additional ministerial help on Tees-side. The question is a financial one. We should all like to see every one of our churches with a minister of its own; but our local resources are already strained to the uttermost, and the B. and F.U.A. have for many years been most generous in their grants.

The public meeting after tea was largely attended; and, as is becoming usual on these occasions, the speakers' subjects were announced beforehand. I can remember the time when the ideal tea-party address used to be described as "a few pleasant remarks, closed by a funny story." But all that is now changed; we are becoming serious, and instead of humorous stories we have something very like solemn sermons. Certainly our addresses last Monday, on "Unitarianism, an Affirmative Faith," "the Distinctive Spirit of Unitarianism," and "Unitarianism, a Motive Power," sounded very like tit-bits from discourses which had already done duty in the pulpit. For my own part, I honestly cry Peccavi, for all that I said consisted of portions of my previous evening's sermon which had been omitted through exigencies of time. But the audience seemed to have not the smallest objection to the sermonic tone. They were in such solemn earnest that the comic and the flippant would have seemed incongruous. With rapt attention they listened to expositions of their faith, of its radical distinction from dogmatic theology, and of its power to inspire devotion to social service. The most intensely spiritual sentiments in these addresses were those which were most warmly received; it was a religious meeting, and its atmosphere was almost electric with devotional fervour and lofty hope. One speaker especially we wanted to hear, and he did not disappoint us. The Rev. Bodell Smith is the newly-appointed minister in Darlington, and this was his first official appearance amongst us. Judging from what we heard from him, I am sure we may congratulate the congregation over which he has to preside. Without any notes, he spoke with the courage of conviction with admirable sequence of thought, and impressive restraint of words. We felt we had secured a valuable recruit to our ranks.

Then, before we could have the pleasure of hearing Mr. Lambelle's speech, we who had come from the "Canny Toon" had to leave for our train. And those two hours' ride to Newcastle passed with wonderful swiftness. In the crowded carriage we still continued the friendly exchange of thought, discussing aspects of our work which had been omitted in our meetings, indulging in the pleasant frivolities which might have enlivened our speeches, then going off at a tangent into fields of literature, wandering from the melodrama of "the Lady of Quality" to the mysticism of "Aylwin," and even making some frantic guesses about the symbolism of Maeterlinck. Amidst these eager conversations, our train suddenly glided into the Central Station—and we separated to our homes, all feeling that we had enjoyed a time of refreshing, long to be remembered.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Accrington.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, M.A., of Padham. In the afternoon the choir and scholars gave a service of song entitled "The Fireman's Daughter." The attendances were exceedingly good, and the whole tone of the services seemed to denote increased vigour in the church. The collections, which were considerably above the average, amounted to over £11.

Ainsworth (Appointment).—The Rev. M. R. Scott, of Kilmarnock, has accepted an invitation to the pulpit of Ainsworth Chapel.

Banbury.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held in Christchurch Chapel on Sunday, May 14, afternoon and evening. The afternoon was devoted to the hearing of a number of recitations and singing by the scholars and an address by the Rev. H. Hill on "The Story of Telemachus." In the evening there was a full service of singing by the choir and scholars, and sermon by the minister on "The Child Samuel; or, Hannah's Noble Self-Sacrifice." On Thursday, May 11, the ashes of the late Mr. Edward Cobb, of Lewes, and formerly of Banbury, who died in Easter Week, and was cremated at Woking, were consigned to their final resting-place in the chancel of the chapel. A brief service was conducted by the Rev. H. Hill, the "Dead March" being played at the conclusion.

Blackley.—The chapel anniversary was held on Sunday last, the preacher being the Rev. C. H. Wellbeloved, of Southport. In the afternoon the cantata "Jerusalem" was rendered by an augmented choir. The services were well attended.

and the collections taken during the day amounted to £17 3s.

Chester.—The annual meeting of the congregation worshipping in Matthew Henry's Chapel was held on the 8th inst. The report showed steady, if slow, progress during the year; an increase of £10 in ordinary receipts; and an enrolment of several new members. This, however, satisfactory as it must be said to be, gave way in pressing interest to the matter of chapel restoration. Both the architect and City surveyor pronounce the roof "dangerous," so it has to be entirely replaced. Thus, at once, the amenities of a Bicentenary disappear in the alternative of a new roof or no chapel, and instead of having to face an expenditure of £300 to £350, the congregation is confronted with the necessity of finding £700 to £750. Towards this the trustees and congregation have already promised £200, and hope to reach £285; the B. and F.U.A. have kindly voted £50; and, for the balance an appeal is being drawn up to friends and sympathisers outside our own little community. Attention is drawn to the advertisement.

Chichester.—The Rev. C. A. Hoddinott, who at the end of 1897, during some repairs at Baffin's-lane Chapel, was knocked down by a falling ladder and suffered slight concussion of the brain, found some months later that his left eye showed symptoms of decay of sight, followed by other slowly developing symptoms. After repeated consultations at the Central London Ophthalmic Hospital, it was decided that the injured eye must be removed, to preserve the sight of the other, and this was successfully effected on May 1. Mr. Hoddinott made a good recovery, and last Sunday was warmly welcomed back by his congregation, when he again conducted the services and preached without difficulty.

Dover.—On Sunday, May 5, the 256th anniversary of the congregation was celebrated. The Rev. H. Woods Perris, of Forest Gate, preached on "A Man in whom is the Spirit" and "The Work of the Nineteenth Century." The sermons were much appreciated, and the attendances at the services were fairly good.

Heywood.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school sermons were preached at the Britain Hill Unitarian Chapel. The choir was augmented by a large addition of the children and elder scholars of the Sunday-school, along with friends from other churches in the town. Special hymns, anthems, &c., were sung under the leadership of the choir-master, Mr. James Chadwick. The preacher for the day was the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham. The chapel was crowded at both services, and the offertory—the largest ever realised at the school anniversaries—was over £60.

Horwich.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached on Sunday last by the Rev. J. J. Wright. Large and appreciative congregations assembled, both in the afternoon and evening. At night every seat in the church was occupied. The collections, including several donations, were over £15.

Idle, near Bradford.—On Sunday last, May 14, the Sunday-school anniversary was held. The Rev. W. Mellor, of Huddersfield, was the preacher, and took for his subject in the afternoon Mrs. Browning's poem "The Cry of the Children." The congregations were very good, at the evening service the chapel being quite filled. The choir and Sunday scholars gave special hymns and anthems in a very creditable manner.

Ilkeston.—A bazaar and sale of work, held in April towards clearing off the debt remaining from the alterations to the chapel, was opened by the Mayor; a good number of friends from the neighbouring congregations were present. With donations, about £70 was realised, and it is hoped that the remaining debt of £35 may be cleared off this summer, so that attention may be given to the need of a Sunday-school; the chapel is at present used for all purposes. The annual meeting was held on Tuesday, 16th inst. A very satisfactory report of the Sunday-school was read by Mr. Smythen, and a balance on the right side shown. The congregation has steadily increased, and the attendance and enthusiasm of the annual meeting showed a distinct advance. After the meeting a coffee supper was held, and a presentation made on behalf of the Sunday-school scholars to the Rev. and Mrs. E. A. Maley. A marble timepiece was also presented by the members of the congregation.

Kidderminster.—On Sunday last the 114th Sunday-school anniversary services were held, the Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans officiating. In the afternoon a children's service was held, at which special hymns and anthems were rendered by the choir and scholars. An address was given to the scholars by Mr. Evans. At the morning and evening services the scholars sang some of the items from the afternoon's service, and anthems were sung by the choir. Good congregations assembled at all the services, in the evening over 500 persons being present. The collections were the largest we have had for several years, amounting, with donations, to over £21.

Liverpool: Hope-street.—The Rev. R. A. Armstrong has been again disappointed in his hope of resuming the services, although during his stay at Blackpool he has made progress towards recovery. A sea voyage having been recommended, as soon as he is able to undertake it, the Church Committee have granted him a further leave of absence, if necessary, for six months.

Manchester: Bradford.—On Sunday, May 7, the annual flower services were held in the Public Hall. The morning address was given by Mr. J. Henshall, his subject being "Consider the Lilies." In the afternoon the service was conducted by Miss Mary Dendy. At the evening service the Rev. W. E. Attack devoted his address to the life and works of Tennyson, special music being also provided. The collections were on behalf of the scholars' Whit-week treats.

Manchester: Longsight.—The annual sermons were preached on Sunday, May 7, by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, B.A. In consequence, perhaps, of a day exceptionally summer-like, tempting people out of doors, the congregations and collections were not quite so large as was desired. In the afternoon a musical service took place, at which, in addition to choruses by the choir, solos were given by two vocalists well known in Manchester—Mme. Barker and Mr. William Wild.

Middlesborough.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 7, the preacher being the Rev. Frank Walters, of Newcastle, who took for his subject (morning), "The Christianity of Christ" and (evening) "The Gospel of to-day." The choir sang two anthems, "Ye shall dwell in the land" and "Send out Thy light." On Monday the anniversary tea and meeting were held, and were in every way a success, the Mayor and Mayoress (Councillor and Mrs. W. T. Keay) being present. Mr. E. Cox-Walker presided over the public meeting in the evening. The Rev. F. Walters having offered a most hearty welcome to Rev. H. Bodell Smith, who had only the day previously entered on his ministerial duties at Durlington, gave an address on "Unitarianism, an Affirmative Faith." The Rev. H. Bodell Smith also gave an interesting address, and tendered his thanks for the kind welcome extended to him. The Rev. A. Harvie spoke on "Unitarianism as a Motive Power." Solos were rendered at intervals by Mr. Thompson and Miss Elliott, Mr. F. Synnes presiding at the organ. After the singing of the hymn, "All before us lies the way," the Rev. W. H. Lambelle pronounced the benediction, and a most enjoyable meeting was brought to a close.

Moira (Resignation).—The Rev. A. E. O'Connor, having accepted an invitation to Torquay, will resign his present charge next month.

Nantwich.—The annual business meeting was held on Monday evening, the 15th inst. After the members had partaken of refreshments, which were provided in the schoolroom, the Rev. J. M. Mills took the chair, and the meeting was opened with singing and prayer. The reports presented showed the church to be in a more satisfactory financial position than previously, and that attendance at Sunday services and the Sunday-school were better than the year before. Figures were given, showing attendances at chapel and school for several years, during which a small but steady increase had been maintained. The retiring officers were cordially thanked for their services, and Mr. T. H. Hill was re-elected treasurer, Mr. J. S. Harding, secretary, and at the conclusion of the business it was moved by Mr. J. S. Harding, seconded by Mr. T. H. Hill, and resolved, that "the hearty thanks of the meeting be accorded the Chairman, both for his services in the chair, and for the good work he was doing amongst them as their minister." Mr. Mills briefly responded, and the meeting terminated.

Nottingham: Christ Church.—The anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 14. The attendance in the morning was encouraging, and a large congregation assembled in the evening. The collections were good, and showed an increase on former years. The Rev. William Lindsay, the lately-appointed minister, occupied the pulpit.

South Cheshire Sunday-school Union.—The ninth annual meeting of this Union, which consists of seven schools, was held on Wednesday afternoon, May 10, in the Brook-street Chapel, Knutsford. There were present representatives from Chester, Crewe, Nantwich, Shrewsbury, and Knutsford, including the Revs. J. K. Montgomery, H. D. Roberts, R. S. Redfern, J. Morley Mills, J. C. Street, and G. A. Payne. The proceedings were opened at noon by a committee meeting, and followed at 3.30 by a conference, at which Mrs. Myers, of Shrewsbury, the president of the Union, occupied the chair. In the course of her presidential address Mrs. Myers commented in favourable terms upon the amount of work performed by the Union during the past year, and noted with pleasure not only the increased usefulness of the Union, but also the fact that a small increase had taken place in the number of scholars, and in the average attendance. The report and balance-sheet having been adopted, a resolution was passed, on the motion of the Rev. J. K. Montgomery, seconded by the Rev. J. C. Street, expressing the Association's satisfaction with the approaching Peace Conference at The Hague, and hoping that much good might result from it. The Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., of Altrincham, next delivered an address, and the Rev. E. Dawson King, Congregationalist minister, of Moberley, was accorded a warm welcome by the hon. secretary, and invited to address the meeting, an invitation to which he at once responded in a most interesting manner. The officers for the ensuing year were then appointed, the Rev. G. A. Payne being selected as president, Mrs. Myers vice-president, Mr. A. Orrett hon. treasurer, the Rev. J. Morley Mills hon. secretary, the Rev. R. S. Redfern visitor, and Mr. James Johnston (Chester) auditor. A resolution was passed inviting the congregations associated with the various schools to send delegates if they so desired to attend the meetings of the Association, and it was decided to alter the title and objects to make this possible. At the close of the conference tea was provided in the school, after which a service was held in the chapel, conducted by the Rev. Dendy Agate.

Torquay (Appointment).—The Rev. A. E. O'Connor, of Moira, has accepted an invitation to the ministry of the Free Christian Church, meeting in Unity Hall.

Yorkshire Unitarian Lay Preachers' Union.—A number of the members of this Union took tea together in the Priestley Hall (in connection with Mill Hill Chapel), Leeds, on Saturday afternoon last. Subsequently, Mr. Charles Stainer, of Leeds, read a paper, entitled "The Voice of the Lsity," the Rev. John Ellis, of Uppertorpe, Sheffield, presiding. The paper touched upon many important points relating chiefly to the work of the lay preacher. It pointed to the necessity for, the difficulties connected with, the earnestness and self-sacrifice required in, carrying out the noble work of the lay preacher, and alluded also to the lack of appreciation and the many discouragements which had frequently to be encountered, all of which were to be regretted. After an animated and interesting discussion, Mr. Stainer was thanked for his able and exhaustive paper.

I FIND I never weary of great churches. It is my favourite kind of mountain scenery. Mankind was never so happily inspired as when it made a cathedral—a thing as single and specious as a statue to the first glance, and yet, on examination, as lively and interesting as a forest in detail. The height of spires cannot be taken by trigonometry; they measure absurdly short, but how tall they are to the admiring eye! And where we have so many elegant proportions, growing one out of the other, and all together into one, it seems as if proportion transcended itself and became something different and more imposing. I could never fathom how a man dares to lift up his voice to preach in a cathedral. What is he to say that will not be an anticlimax? For though I have heard a considerable variety of sermons, I never yet heard one that was so expressive as a cathedral. 'Tis the best preacher itself, and preaches day and night, not only telling you of man's art and aspirations in the past, but convicting your own soul of ardent sympathies; or rather, like all good preachers, it sets you preaching to yourself; and every man is his own doctor of divinity in the last resort.—Robert Louis Stevenson.

LOOK ON THIS PICTURE:

"We are CHRISTIANS, and only Christians. . .

"Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, Calvinists, Arminians, Trinitarians, and others, are names of religious distinctions. But, however we may commonly be ranked under any of these divisions, we reject them all.

"We disown all connection, except that of love and goodwill, with any sect or party whatever. . . This edifice is founded upon no party principles or tenets, but is built on purpose, and with this very design, to keep ourselves clear from them all; to discharge ourselves from all the prejudices and fetters in which any of them may be held, so that we may exercise the public duties of Religion upon the most catholic and charitable foundation." (From a Sermon at the opening of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, 12th May, 1756, by John Taylor, D.D.)

"You rank yourselves under no distinguishing name. The liberty which you claim for yourselves you extend with equal liberality to others. The burden to which you will not submit yourselves you will never impose; you plead for the equal, universal dominion of reason, of conscience, and of truth." (Address on the opening of Manchester Academy, 14th September, 1786, by Thomas Barnes, D.D.)

AND ON THESE:

"The British and Foreign Unitarian Association."

"The National Conference of Unitarian,—Liberal Christian,—Free Christian,—and other Nonsubscribing or Kindred Congregations"!!

When One Church might have been the Refuge of humanity, culture, devotion, and self-sacrifice, and all the organization of Religion and Society which there then was, it then not unfairly, or rather with a noble aspiration, asserted its ideal of Catholicity. But what Church ever remained faithful to an unselfish Ideal?

Great was Diana of the Ephesians! That Image that fell down from Jupiter!

Reformation, personal piety, and self-forgetting Religion have long since been breaking up that too rude conception, steadily destroying that great Image, (and all the silver shrines that bring great gains to the craftsmen) never to be raised again.

The vain Ideal of superincumbent solidarity is now upset, and common Catholicity lies shattered, impossible, absurd. Its rags of apostolic succession and priestcraft, church and sect, mortification and salvation,—all so many woven, embroidered and dyed vestments,—are falling, and rotting round its scattering fragments.

Men are learning to love their neighbours as themselves. It is a long lesson, but it will be learned.

Their Leader is now a Brother; long since, of course, martyred and crucified;—long dead and speaking yet, and glorified.

What is any "Body's" Catholicity but a silver shrine, made to be sold by the men of the craft?

It seems faithful and true, moreover, to suggest that in any "Our Catholicity," men may be vaunting themselves, and puffed up, seeking to gain the whole world, (at what a cost?)—and again, to warn them, not too piously to reckon up the tithes they pay, and be found thanking God that they are not as other men are.

It is not so, that men believe all things, hope all things, and lose themselves for love, and, owning all their ignorance and littleness and imperfection, meekly and humbly offer themselves in Spirit and in Truth.

Truly, as that which is perfect comes, that which is in part shall be done away. Our centre of gravity is finding its own place, and Man his true equilibrium, however slowly; whose forces are Liberty for all, equal Justice, and unaffected Holiness;—Faith, Hope, and Love. And the greatest of these is LOVE—FOR OTHERS.

WHAT MIGHT BE!

AN OPEN CONFERENCE FOR ANY WHO DESIRE TO WORSHIP THE FATHER IN SPIRIT AND IN TRUTH, AND TO SEEK FELLOWSHIP IN THE CHRISTIAN LIFE, WILL BE HELD, &C., &C.

"Other sheep I have which are not of this fold; them also I must bring, and they shall hear my voice; and they shall become one flock—one Shepherd!"

What every Church and every Association now needs, is to be convinced of the Sinfulness of Segregation, and of the sole glory of the One Kingdom of our God; the true Civitas Dei. Deus eam fundavit in Eternum.

Cannot the Association and the Conference alike,—abandon, once for all, the carved and painted fetiches of their names, and the old ecclesiastical device of taking the statue of Jupiter and presenting it as St. Peter; and, once for all, leave "Unitarianism," and its so-called Church and all its theological fences and entrances, to perish in the dust? And simply live and speak Religion and Jesus alone; Spirituality undefiled and self-forgetting, Love of God and Love of Man? This is what most of us mean. Let us say it, and nothing else.

Ah, me! How has my heart failed me! Have I not seen? have I not heard the voice from the cloud, saying: "This is my beloved Son, hear him!"

WHAT A WORD, WHAT A REALITY, IS CATHOLICITY! It was truly the Son of God who sent the Gospel to be published amongst all nations throughout the world.

It is that Gospel of Jesus that has saved Faith and Hope and Love, through all the foolishness, the feebleness, the conceit, the wickedness, of men.

That alone, under all the carnality, the brutishness of degenerate Rome, and under all the vestimentary nonsense of too-weak-minded imitators, all the self-righteousness of exclusive Unions, Conferences, and what not, has yet made "Catholic,"—in itself a call to absolute self-surrender, to continuous crucifixion,—a name for humility, purity, piety, for brotherly love and goodness over the whole earth.

Truly Catholicity in the purpose of the Father is the very encircling Kingdom of Heaven; and, from our world of tides, clouds, and storms, of life, and sin, and death, we are blessed indeed to be able to reflect its every glory in

BI-CENTENARY RESTORATION.

The Congregation, desirous to render the old Chapel (foundation-stone laid September, 1699) seemly for the Public Worship of God, caused an exhaustive examination to be made by Messrs. T. M. Lockwood (F.R.I.B.A.) and Sons, who report—and their opinion is independently borne out by the City Surveyor—that, in addition to the other urgent needs of the Chapel Fabric, the Roof is "positively dangerous." They are consequently in the position either of setting up a New Roof, or of having No Chapel at all. The estimated expenditure for all NECESSARY repairs, &c., amounts to over £700. Even if we could build a new Chapel, £400 must be spent on a new roof for the old one, if the historic building is to remain in existence.

£285 has already been promised, including £50 kindly granted by the B. and F.U.A.; and as some sign of growing life in the congregation, it may be noted that NEW MEMBERS have contributed over ONE-FOURTH of the total sum promised by the resident lay members of the congregation.

ABUNDANT LIFE.

IN the course of the meetings, of which we give a full report this week, many strong and earnest words were spoken, to which it will be well for our people to give heed. "Life" was the subject of Mr. AGATE's Association sermon, and in Mr. WICKSTEED's Essex Hall lecture, of which we give only a meagre summary, because it is to be shortly published in book form, there will be found a searching into the deep things of life, not to be lightly undertaken, but rich in genuine quickening of the spirit. Mr. JOHN DENDY's fearless appeal for more direct dealing with grave social problems touches on another side of the same great question, while in Dr. HERFORD's Presidential Address, in Mr. HARGROVE's paper, and in many of the speeches notes were struck which went to the heart of our needs in the present day, and of our aspirations after truer life. The meetings were full of encouragement.

THE Queen's Birthday was constantly remembered during the week, as will be seen from the reports. Here we will only repeat the prayer expressed in the new verse added by Mr. A. C. Benson to the late Bishop of Wakefield's Diamond Jubilee Hymn, which was sung at Windsor on the morning of the 24th :—

O loving heart, through fourscore years
Of royal self-surrender,
Through gracious toil, through faithful tears,

Most sorrowful, most tender.
In loving hope, in steadfast might,
Unnumbered hearts enfold her.
On to the home of life and light
God guard her, God uphold her!

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

THE sixty-fifth annual meeting of this Association was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday. A reception by the President and Committee of the Association was first held, and was largely attended by ministers, delegates, and other friends. At half-past five the chair was taken by the President, Mr. JOHN DENDY, who, after the singing of an opening hymn, delivered his opening address:—

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER AS SOCIAL REFORMER.

It is one of the saddest and most perplexing of facts that, at the close of nineteen centuries of Christianity, certain gross evils remain rampant among us, showing little, if any, sign of diminishing vitality. Impurity, gambling, and commercial dishonesty—these things are not sporadic, but wide-spread; not occasional, but constant amongst us. They are as much a part of our civilisation as are our churches or our charitable institutions, as intimately woven into the thread of the national life as is its religion or its intellectual culture. It is as if they had come to terms with religion, and established for themselves a place in the recognised order of things. If I do not add to this trio of evils the sin of intemperance, it is because in that case something like a combined and resolute stand is being made by a considerable body of people. Even in that case the stand has so far been valuable rather as a protest, as the mark of a healthier public opinion, than for the effect which it has had in reducing the extent of the evil. We have made great progress, not only in things material and intellectual, but in many ways morally and spiritually. Ours is a more comfortable, better educated, more tolerant, and probably more truly charitable, generation than most of those which have preceded it; yet still the public-houses claim their thousands of victims, still the awful army of prostitutes roams our midnight streets, still the law courts bear daily witness to the corruption of our commercial life, and still the Protean vice of gambling maintains its hold upon every class of the community, and undermines alike the fortunes and the characters of its victims. While these things are so it is a farce, almost a blasphemy, to call ourselves a Christian people.

It is not merely that we have on the one hand a mass of men infected with these terrible vices, and on the other a large body of Christian, church-going people, who are, in the main, free from them. On the contrary, it would be difficult to say, with regard to some of these vices, whether they are most rampant amongst those who have abandoned, or those who still maintain, not always insincerely, a connection with some religious community. Some of our worst commercial offenders have been very ready to share their plunder with their church, and it is no bar to prominence in his church that a man draws his revenues from the ownership of low public-houses. Most of these vices can come comfortably to church with their victims, with but little fear of finding themselves, except upon rare occasions, explicitly exposed and denounced from the pulpit.

It is not my intention to criticise the reasons which have led the clergy of all denominations to decline to so large an extent the duties of the prophet in regard to these matters. It is enough to note that they have done so, doubtless upon grounds which appear to them sufficient, without imputing to them any want either of courage or good faith. They are working hard and faithfully in their own way, but, when one considers their numbers and their opportunities, he can but come to the conclusion that as regards these gross evils that way is not altogether effective.

Let us, then, ask whether there is any other body of men and women to whom we may look for plain speaking and clear teaching upon these matters. I suggest to you that in this direction a great opportunity lies before the Sunday-school teacher. To his care are delivered the still plastic and unsophisticated minds of the young, and he has the opportunity of so moulding those minds as largely to determine their future attitude in regard to these great questions. In the old-fashioned phraseology it is his business, as much as it is that of the clergyman, "to save souls." Can he discharge that duty better than by so strengthening those souls, by placing before them such ideals of life and character, that in the years to come they may be preserved clean from these sins and become in their turn witnesses for the right and true?

Much interest has of late been excited by a notable attempt to answer the question, "What would Jesus do?" Whatever else he would do, does any of us doubt that, if living and moving about in one of our great cities to-day, he would fearlessly take up his tale against these great evils; that in a series of vivid pictures he would show us in their true lights, the licentious man and the poor woman on the streets, the dishonest trader and the gambler, the wealthy owner of disreputable beer-shops and gin palaces; unmasking every pretence, putting aside every time-honoured plea of custom or necessity, and telling us that these matters are of more consequence in the sight of God than all the theological problems which have so occupied the attention of His children? If we believe that he would do this, then is it not for those of us who have taken upon ourselves the office of teachers to endeavour in this matter to follow in his steps?

But you will say, "What about our qualification for such a work as this? Who are we that we should undertake such a task?" Well, I am assuming this much about ourselves; not that we are pure and strong as He was, not that we have never sinned in these matters ourselves, but that in spite of our weakness, in spite of our own failures, we do heartily condemn and detest these great sins, and long for the purer and better society, which is to be, and in which they shall not so terribly prevail. If we cannot say that much, then perhaps we had better ask ourselves whether it is well that we should undertake the duty of teaching at all, whether, even though we never touch upon such subjects, it is not possible that our influence may make itself felt upon the wrong side, whether any degree of expertness in teaching, any amount of familiarity with the Bible or the particular theology of our Church will really qualify us for our task. But if we can say that much for ourselves, then we may pass on to ask how we shall best discharge this great duty.

First, I think, we must have the courage to speak out and break the conspiracy of silence, which does so much to perpetuate gross evil. If we believe a thing to be wrong, it seems to me to be one of the most futile and foolish of courses to maintain silence about it as something too bad, too unpleasant, to be spoken of. Especially is that the case when we stand in the relation of teacher to pupils, when we know that our scholars will have sooner or later to deal with the problem in practical life. Light, more light, is what is wanted upon these great moral questions. Drag the evil out into the pure daylight, where it can be seen in all the true proportions of its ugliness. Do not leave your scholars to encounter it for the first time in the artificial light which custom or passion, ignorance or prejudice, throw around it, lending to it a false glamour and disguising its essential nature.

I am persuaded that in these matters ignorance has a great deal to do with the first false steps of many, and for that ignorance, blame must rest with those who might have removed it. In the next place, the teachers must strive to attain to some degree of clearness, of vividness, and presentation. The majority of young people will not deliberately choose the evil, the base, and the ugly, when they have once clearly seen the good, the noble, and the beautiful. In these matters it is for the Sunday-school teacher to make his scholars see. He must put before them in the clearest and strongest way he can the noble and beautiful ideals of temperance, chastity, honour in business, dependence on law and effort rather than on chance. He must also, it is true, picture to them the evil of the opposites of these, denouncing it fearlessly, but not relying on that alone, for it is from the clear positive teaching and the implanting of high ideals that a lasting result is to be hoped. It is but of little use to bind men by oaths against the wrong, unless they be, at the same time, bound by love and loyalty to, and by a clear vision of, the right. That is one reason why, so it seems to me, the splendid energy and devotion of the total abstinence movement has had so comparatively small a result, why, as I believe, the true remedy for the curse of intemperance is to be found in the growth of a noble ideal of self-government—true temperance—and the substitution of nobler interests and wants.

But it will hardly be sufficient for the teacher to expound the worth and beauty of the right course, the evil and ugliness of the wrong. He should also strive to understand the questions in the varied and complicated forms in which they arise for solution, so that he may be able to disentangle the essential questions of right and wrong from the specious pleas and fallacious arguments with which they are often surrounded. He must show himself able to appreciate the peculiar difficulties and temptations which beset the individual. In this matter experienced Sunday-school teachers have a peculiar advantage over most professional teachers, lay or clerical, inasmuch as along with their experience of teaching they have been acquiring also a practical experience of life, more varied and extensive than often falls to the lot of those others—an experience which enables them to speak, if not with a greater authority, yet with a greater chance of being listened to. Especially is this the case with all questions which arise in connection with business or social life. The young man whose week days are spent in the business world, the young woman who is in Society or engaged in some trade or profession, know better where the shoe pinches than the student fresh from college; and those to whom they speak know that it is so. Here is one very special and valuable qualification of the Sunday-school teacher for this work.

So then I want to see the Sunday-school teacher definitely taking up his or her position as a social reformer in the highest and best sense of that word. A reformer, that is, of the ideals and practices of the world. I believe they have very special opportunities for the work, and that, given an earnest love of the better way, most teachers may fairly qualify themselves for it. I know not where we are to look with so much hope for anything like a steady, organised attack upon these great evils. I believe that if in every Sunday-school in the land it were recognised that these evils had to be definitely and wisely combated, and that no scholar should ever leave without having been clearly instructed and warned about them, much might soon be done towards clearing away these hideous blots upon our national life. I believe, too, that the explicit recognition of the high function would lend new dignity and importance to the teachers' office, and might possibly call into the service some earnest and thoughtful people who now hold aloof. The settled attack upon gross established evils, working mainly by and through the formation of characters trained to understand and resist them, that is an object worthy of the highest powers and the noblest ambitions. That surely, also, is a very literal following "in His steps."

And that, it may be said, is what our Sunday-schools are already doing. To some extent no doubt they are, but is it in a sufficiently definite and recognised way? Might it not be more effectually done? Is it not worth while to try so to do it? These are the questions which I would suggest to you.

Here I must pause to consider a position which many good people take up in regard to these questions and the moral education of the young. It is said that our duty is to instil certain general principles of truthfulness, honesty, and purity, training them to love these virtues and hate their opposites, and trusting them to make wise applications of these principles to particular occasions as they arise in after life. And it is said that by anticipating experience, or by making a too particular application of these principles in your teaching, you are introducing an unnecessary knowledge of evil into innocent minds and possibly yourself sowing the seeds of corruption. Therefore it is better to confine ourselves to general principles, and trust our scholars to make the necessary applications.

Vice is a monster of so frightful mien
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen.

But while you are doing this, what is Society, what is public opinion, doing? Are they not steadily teaching that all these general principles have their qualifications and exceptions, and, in practical application to daily life, their recognised and necessary limitations; that the weakness of human nature, the exigencies of business and social life, are such that a strict interpretation and application of moral principles is often impossible, and, being impossible, is, therefore, neither to be expected nor aimed at? "Given these recognised limitations and exceptions," says Society, "your great principles shall be gladly recognised. We do not dispute them; on the contrary, we enforce them with all the penalties at our command. Are you zealous for purity? See how we punish the faithless wife. The husband—that is another matter. The young man about town—do you expect us to alter human nature? Are you zealous for integrity? See how we deal with the fraudulent trustee and the embezzling clerk. The company promoter, the man who accepts secret commissions, the speculator, the trader who would pass off his goods for something better than they are—here you are getting into a different class of questions. Matters of business are involved here. Business has its own rules and customs, its special applications of moral principle, and these must, of course, be observed. One must not go too far; but, on the other hand, you must not ask impossibilities." Such, with many and honourable individual exceptions, is the public opinion of the business world, which indignant judges and well-meaning Acts of Parliament can avail but little to alter, until a generation grows up which has been more fearlessly and wisely instructed in the ethics of business.

"Yes," says public opinion in effect, "we accept your great principles gladly. It was very wise of your teachers to teach them to you. We will show you how to apply them with the necessary admixture of common-sense and regard to circumstances which alone makes them possible. Most certainly Vice is a frightful monster. Pope was entirely right there. But this is not vice. Observe how we hate and punish vice whenever we see it. So we should hate and punish these things if they really were vicious."

Something like this is the doctrine of the world, a doctrine often adopted and sanctioned by men and women, who in many departments of life are excellent. If the teacher does nothing to forestall this teaching of the world, will not his very silence make in its favour and be construed into an admission of its validity? Surely in these matters it is not safe to leave your scholars to make for themselves the particular applications of these great principles, under the influence of the corrupt public opinion which prevails with regard to them. They need your help in disentangling the sophistries and exposing the fallacies by which these great issues are confused and distorted. Sooner or later the knowledge of the evil will certainly come to them. It depends largely upon you whether with the knowledge of the thing comes also the knowledge that it is evil.

Finally, it may be that someone will object "What about religious education? It is being crowded out of the Day-school. Will you crowd it out of the Sunday-school also in favour of a 'dry morality'?" Far from it, there is room for both. But I think we need to clear our minds of a certain amount of cant upon this question of religious education. I think that a people which, as a whole, sits so passive in the presence of so much gigantic moral evil, has very little right to talk about its religion; has manifestly, to a large extent, failed to make its religion a real and effective thing. I think that in some way or other it has failed to get on the right lines with its religious education. I think, too, that in our own little group of churches we are far too much afraid of the opinions of our neighbours on this question of religious education, still ourselves too much hampered with the relics of a belief that religion is necessarily bound up with a system of belief and a group of books.

It is said that cleanliness comes next to godliness. Might it not be justly said that a certain degree of moral cleanliness is a necessary preliminary to any religion that is worthy of the name?

If we can teach our scholars to feel deeply, to see clearly and to care greatly about these great moral questions, do we not believe that we are teaching them in some degree to feel as God feels, to see as He sees, to care as He cares, and so fitting them to enter into spiritual communion with Him? I am, of course, assuming that, in addition to such teaching as I have pleaded for, throughout our schools love to man, in all its many branches and applications, truthfulness, courage and patience will be steadily taught and exemplified in all their beauty and worth. If the work ceased at this point I would still claim that it was a distinctly religious one, a necessary step on the way to any real and vital religious life. But if over and above all these things, so unspeakably good for their own sake, the teacher has power out of his own experience, and not merely because he has read it in books, or heard it from the lips of others, to speak of God, of the Divine Will in these matters, of the Divine love to man, to show how to be right on these matters is to be on God's side, a fellow-worker with Him even as Jesus was, then, indeed, his teaching will gain an added power, and the work he will do for his scholars an added worth. But let him not say these last things unless he really feels and believes them. It may be that his belief about God is, as is the case with so many of us in these days, troubled and perplexed, so that with David Grieve he is fain to confess.

"But the last glow, the certainties, the vision of faith! Ah, me! I believe that He is there, yet my heart gropes in darkness. All that is personality, holiness, compassion in us must be in Him intensified beyond all thought. Yet I have no familiarity of prayer. I cannot use the religious language which should be mine without a sense of unreality. My heart is athirst. . . . Speak to me, to me also, O my Father!"

If that be his position, let him be honest and say not the thing which is not true to him, but let him not on that account withhold himself from the work or imagine that he has no place in the Sunday-school; but, taking up his task—on the lower level, it may be—of an earnest, social reformer in that best sense of the word, let him rest assured that he is doing a truly religious work, and helping to prepare for the time when, because men's lives have become purer and their ideals nobler, it will be possible for their Faith also to become stronger and more real.

The PRESIDENT then called upon the Secretary, Mr. ION PRITCHARD, to present the Committee's report, and also the Treasurer's report, in the regretted absence of Dr. Blake Odgers. Mr. Pritchard emphasised several points in the report, and referred to the satisfactory nature of the statistics, the number of schools making returns being 283, the number of teachers 3,722, and scholars 34,315, an increase on last year. Of these 8,317 were over 16, not quite so many as last year. They had done much in the past year to distribute their books, and now they must see that the books were read. The correspondents appointed by the various schools could help, and for this office should be chosen those who could give time to the work, and really keep their school in touch with the central Association.

THE REPORT.

The report stated that the special fund for providing books for Sunday-schools had amounted to £345 19s. 6d. and that 143 schools had benefited. There was still a small amount available. Young Days and the Helper had been published, and "A Year of Sunday Readings" had just been reprinted from the latter. The new books promised last year were not yet ready, but a little book, "Our Faith," by the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, would be published before midsummer, and the Rev. J. C. Hirst was preparing a second series of "Half Hours with the Parables." It was hoped that much good would come from the summer school for teachers to be held at Oxford from June 30 to July 8. The accounts showed the balance due to the Treasurer slightly diminished, and standing at £17 1s. 9d. Subscriptions were £292 11s. 6d., rather more than last year; and from sale of publications £946 15s. 1d. had been received.

The PRESIDENT moved the adoption of the reports.

The Rev. W. T. JONES, of Swansea, in seconding, said he brought a word of greeting from the Welsh Sunday-schools, and he bore testimony from his experience of ten years with the Calvinistic Methodists to the fact that their literature was used in Wales, even as text-books in orthodox schools. He urged that they did not sufficiently realise that the school must be made a feeder of the church. The church or school that confined its work to the Sunday hour did not fulfil their ideal. The holding of week-night classes could be of great service to their work. He himself had found such a class on elementary psychology and ethics, publicly advertised, very successful; as many as seventy people of different denominations and of all ages had attended, and had been greatly interested. He was glad that a book on the relation of ethics to religion was soon to be published. If they worked on those lines they could be certain they were placing their intelligent young men and women on a foundation which would not give way under the pressure of the developments of the future. By such week-night classes they reached members of other denominations, who would carry the light on the Sunday to their own churches; and if the day ever came when they should be lost, as a river is lost in the ocean, it would be not because they had failed in their mission, but because they had succeeded, and, as William James in his "Will to Believe" pointed out, that would happen because the ship of orthodoxy was nearing its port and the pilot was picked up on board.

The motion having been carried, the

Rev. W. HARRISON moved, and the Rev. T. LLOYD JONES seconded,—

That the thanks of this Meeting be given to the Officers and Committee of the Association for their services during the past year, and that the respective appointments for the coming year be as follows:—President, Stephen S. Tayler, Esq. Vice-Presidents: Frederick Nettlefold, Esq., I. M. Wade, Esq. Rev. James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., C. Fellows Pearson, Esq., Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., John Dendy, Esq. Treasurer: Mr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., LL.D. Hon. Sec.: Mr. Ion Pritchard. Committee: Miss Ethel C. Lake, Miss Marian Pritchard, Rev. Frederic Allen, Mr. Ronald Bartram, Rev. W. Copeland Bowie, Mr. Leslie C. Clarke, Rev. B. Kirkman Gray, Rev. F. H. Jones, B.A., Mr. C. F. Pearson, Mr. W. S. Tayler. Together with a Delegate from each of the following Local Sunday School Societies, who are entitled to appoint Representatives under Rules 4 and 8:—The Bolton District Sunday School Union, the London Sunday School Society, the Manchester District Sunday School Association, the North Midland Sunday School Association, the Yorkshire Sunday School Union. Auditors: Howard Young, Esq., LL.B., A. H. Biggs, Esq., M.A., LL.M.

Mr. LLOYD JONES called attention to a remarkable pamphlet by Miss Johnson, of Liverpool, on "Children and Public Houses." It was not simply a temperance pamphlet, but a pamphlet on child life, and he urged that it should be on sale in the book-room.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, in supporting the resolution, said how much the Committee had prized the admirable services Mr. Dendy had rendered during his year of office; on several occasions he had come up specially for their meetings, and the success of the special fund had been due to his initiative and the work he had put into it.

The PRESIDENT then offered a hearty welcome, on behalf of the meeting, to the following representatives of affiliated and kindred societies:—

Irish Non-Subscribing S. S. Association, Rev. J. A. Kelly; Scottish Sunday Schools, Rev. H. Williamson; Welsh Sunday Schools, Rev. W. T. Jones; Bolton District S. S. Union, Rev. J. J. Wright; Liverpool Sunday School Society, Rev. T. Lloyd Jones; London Sunday School Society, Miss Tayler; Manchester District S. S. Association, Rev. George Knight; Midland S. S. Association, Miss Youngerman; North Cheshire S. S. Union, Rev. W. Harrison; North Midland S. S. Association, Rev. H. E. Haycock; Southern S. S. Union, Rev. E. S. Anthony, M.A.; South Cheshire S. S. Union, Rev. J. C. Street; South Eastern S. S. Union, Miss E. Kensett; Western Sunday School Union, Rev. H. Shaen Solly, M.A.; Yorkshire Sunday School Union, Mrs. Rawlings.

The Rev. H. S. SOLLY responded, and described the conditions of work in the Western Union, where the report of work for the past year was more encouraging than it had been for a long time. Especially was this the case in some of the smaller congregations, where the work was carried on under the greatest difficulties and discouragements. They might hope that as now the schools were receiving a fresh impulse from faithful workers in the congregations, so the congregations would surely reap the benefit in the coming days.

Mr. I. M. WADE then proposed a resolution of thanks to Mr. Dendy for presiding and for his address, and to all who had contributed to the usefulness and success of the meeting. He trusted that the books now distributed would be really read, and urged that they should do more to keep their children as members of their churches.

The Rev. J. C. STREET, in seconding the resolution, referred to the President's paper, and said that as ministers they could not be content to leave those grave moral questions alone. He entirely agreed with what had been said as to the work teachers should do, but it must not be taken out of the ministers' hands. They felt their solemn responsibility to speak on gambling, impurity, dishonesty, and intemperance, terrible evils which were sapping the foundations of morality and religion. The paper had pointed out an obvious duty; he hoped it would be sent to every teacher, and to every minister as well.

The PRESIDENT responded, and acknowledged the great kindness he had experienced throughout his year of office. The work had been a great delight to him.

The meeting then terminated.

THE LONDON APPEAL.

SIR,—It will, in my opinion, be a very great mistake if anything be now done to interfere with the success of the appeal for funds to promote chapel building in London. To alter the scope of the scheme which has been adopted, after twelve months' anxious consideration, would be to stop what promises to be a very successful effort, without any certainty that a more ambitious proposal could be carried out.

It is right that friends in the country should be invited to join, for London is no provincial town, and anything that concerns its welfare is surely of national interest. Friends in London are never slow to help their co-religionists in the country in this respect, showing a very different spirit to that which animates your correspondent, Mr. G. J. Notcutt, of Ipswich, who writes that it will be far better for country friends to reserve their money for their own needs than help to provide more chapels for London. The reason he gives for this opinion is, that he has been to London, and finds the congregations in most of our chapels meagre. But has it not occurred to him that to a locality in which a chapel existed with a meagre congregation, no part of the proposed fund would be applied, except to assist in extinguishing a debt which might possibly be the cause of the meagre membership, the intention being to provide chapels in places where none at present exist, and where it is hoped the congregations will not be meagre.

Two years ago Manchester raised £10,000 for similar purposes, London gladly helping. Manchester has now promised to help London. Why should Ipswich stand aloof? I cannot think it will, for some at least of the friends there know of many districts in London with large populations, in which there is no Unitarian place of worship, a want which it is hoped the proposed fund will supply.

THE ESSEX HALL LECTURE.

ON Tuesday evening Essex Hall was well filled when the Rev. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A., delivered the Essex Hall Lecture, the President, Dr. BROOKE HERFORD, in the chair.

The subject of the lecture was:—

"MEDIÆVALISM AND MODERN THOUGHT."

The lecture referred at the outset to recent developments of the High Church movement, as only one of many evidences that the ideals of the Middle Ages were re-asserting their attractive force. The re-discovered sense of the greatness of mediæval architecture, the revived interest in Dante, in Francis of Assisi, in the philosophy of Thomas Aquinas, proved that the ideals in the poetry, thought and life of those ages were no longer relegated to the rubbish-bins of history, or even to the museums of curiosities, but were recognised not only as august, but as inspiring.

Both the Renaissance and the Reformation had revolted from the dominant teaching of the Middle Ages, and had gone back, the former to the Græco-Roman civilisation of the declining Empire, the latter to Primitive Christianity for its ideals, but no such breach in history could permanently endure, and the present age was learning again the lessons that had been discarded. The ideals ignored in the fifteenth reasserted themselves in the nineteenth century, and the docile disciples of the Renaissance and the Reformation were amazed to discover exaltation, beauty and earnestness of the very type for which their souls were hungering, where they had been told there was nothing but sordidness, grotesqueness, chicanery and frivolity. While, therefore, they had to guard against reactionary movements, the best way to combat the errors of a system was by profound and sympathetic appreciation of its truth. Thus what was permanent in mediæval ideals would be combined with the best elements of modern life, and both being transfigured, reaction would be disarmed by the true spirit of reform. To make some contribution towards a better appreciation of the permanent religious significance of certain great mediæval conceptions was the purpose of the lecture.

The first conception dealt with was that of Eternity, as elaborated in the Greek schools of philosophy, as adopted into the Christian thought by such as Augustine, as formulated by Boethius, and as inspiring the deepest thought and the most glowing piety of the Christian centuries down to Dante and Aquinas. This eternity was to the mediæval thinker not a conception of endless time, but perfection found in the everlasting "now," and "here" of God. And with this went the kindred conception of Fruition, in the bliss of communion with God. The mediæval saint believed that to see God was to see as God sees, and that in true communion with Him we see things not in their fragmentary imperfection, but in their combined perfectness.

This thought of God seemed to be lost at the close of the Middle Ages, and the religion of Time rather than of Eternity had characterised modern civilisation: the world had widened, and new faith in progress had been kindled; there seemed no limit to what was possible of accomplishment. But with this eager pressing forward, something had been lost in the clearness of the religious ideal of life; we were in danger of losing the very conception of a truth worth winning as well as seeking, a life worth living as well as gaining. The great need of the present was of a conception of the absolute life, the life in itself worthy, such as we might find foreshadowed, as an echo of mediæval theology, in the opening declaration of the "Shorter Catechism," "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy Him for ever." Learning to know the abiding things of wisdom and love which time could not take away, they found the things that were supremely worthy, and came to see in some measure as God sees. Progress had a meaning, if there was a goal. Their goal was not merely to strive after, but to have the life eternal, the life of God.

ANNUAL SERVICE.

ON Wednesday morning the annual service was held in Essex Church, conducted by the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., of Altrincham, who also preached the annual sermon, which we give below. A large congregation took part in the service, and in the singing of the National Anthem at the close of the service, in commemoration of the Queen's birthday. The anthem was sung as arranged by Dr. Bridge for special use in churches. Mr. John Harrison presided at the organ. The collection amounted to £40 ls. 4d.

SERMON.

"I came that they may have life and may have it abundantly."—John x. 10.

These are the words of a leader of men—one who is conscious that to his hands has been entrusted a task likely to have far-reaching effects upon his fellows. My predecessor in the honourable office of preacher at this anniversary spoke of Light; I ask you to think with me of Life, of such life as Jesus Christ came to quicken among men, such life as those who desire to be of his fellowship must seek both to share and to spread.

The imparting of life is the aim of the world's greatest sons; in its measure it is the aim of all faithful workers. A great contrast strikes us between two classes of the world's leaders, especially if the extreme examples on either side be taken. Compare the spirit and the deeds of some of those whom the world has called great with the spirit and the deeds of Jesus. Think of an ambitious monarch leading his soldiers to destruction in a war of unjust aggression, and taking little or no account of the misery and ruin he causes, of the thousands of lives he sacrifices, if only his own ambition may be satisfied. "I am come that they may have life," are the words of Jesus—"that they may rise (that is) to the highest possibilities of existence here below." "I am come that through me many men may be brought to an untimely death, and the homes and hearts of thousands be made desolate," have in effect been the words of those whose power was great, and whose lust of conquest was insatiable. I do not forget that Jesus himself went bravely to his death, and that he taught his followers both by word and example, that for them too the path of duty might be full of danger, and might lead to earthly disaster; but the spirit of the martyr, whose love of God and truth kindles a fire like his own in the breasts of others who, rising to the higher life himself, thither draws his followers too, is poles asunder from the spirit of worldly self-seeking which reckes nothing of the bitter sacrifices it calls others to make. The contrast of which I speak can be traced in many grades of human experience. I suppose that, if we could see into the hearts of men, we should find absolute purity of motive exemplified in very few; but the difference is plain everywhere between those whose predominating purpose has been to help, uplift, and vivify their fellows, and those who have suffered lower aims to gain the chief control of their lives, and so have worked evil instead of good. Those only are the world's worthy leaders, of whom it can be said that they, like the Master, have come that their brethren may have life, and may have it abundantly.

Consider how the spirit which Jesus came to exemplify and infuse, should be manifested in life of various kinds. It has often been said that, though a moral and religious, he was not specifically an intellectual, leader. If by that is meant that he announced no great discoveries in the scientific realm, such as have stimulated and re-invigorated the world in later days, the statement is no doubt true. But if it means—and it is sometimes urged in that way—that there was anything in his spirit or his teaching unfriendly to intellectual development and the freedom of the mind, I believe the charge to be wholly mistaken and unjust. The intellectual is not in itself the highest part of man; but the highest part needs intellectual apprehension for its fullest unfolding; and Jesus saw clearly how the rising grades of the powers which are above the material plane should be ranked. Who can read the story of his life and work, without seeing that his gospel stood for the true life of the intellect, not, indeed, first and foremost, but in its proper place and measure? To the life of the intellect, freedom is essential; and the mind of Jesus refused to be bound by ancient rules which would have cramped and hindered it. He thought for himself; and the freedom of mind which he thus achieved is one part of his heritage to his disciples. I do not know anything in which the oldest and largest of the historic Churches of Christendom has been less true to his spirit, than in its attitude towards mental freedom. For the Church of Rome, though claiming a corporate right to advance along the lines of growing knowledge, has denied a kindred right to the individual seeker after truth, as the dungeon and the martyr-fire have shown in many an age and many a land. They are—whether guiltily or not, I do not say—but they are in fact robbers of that life which should flow abundantly from the influence and personality of Jesus, who would cramp and tie down the minds of men, instead of encouraging them to use their mental powers freely, and soar aloft whithersoever the inquiring spirit may bid them rise.

Jesus came, again, that men might have true life in their affections, and might have it abundantly. For there can be no enduring force in a gospel which does not strengthen and sanctify the ties which, in the various relations of life, bind human beings to each other. What is the life of the home, without the love of husband and wife, parent and child, brother and sister? What would the life of the world be worth without mutual respect and kindly sympathy, and the gifts and graces which—even if they do not always keep the atmosphere quite calm and pure—light up many a darkened way, and smooth off many an asperity which, left to grow, might work incalculable mischief? I know that there are some, cold and sluggish of heart, to whom appeals to be truer to the spirit of Christian love seem like idle words; but are there any so bad as to be wholly beyond the quickening power of sympathy and kindness? Of the bearing of this side of the Christ-like mind on many a problem of our modern life I leave you to make your own application.

Jesus came, also, that we might have the life of the spirit, and have it abundantly. What is this life of the spirit, of which we talk and ponder, but from which we are often so far away? It is the highest life of all, because it not only transcends all else, but because in it alone can all other life of the higher sort be truly lived. It is the life which we aspire to live, of conscious and deliberate choice, in harmony with the divine life. Jesus lived in the constant knowledge and the constant joy of the divine presence. The path by which his spirit found its repose in God, has been ever since an open way between earth and heaven—not always, for most men, without overhanging clouds, when for a season the light has been hidden from the wayfarer, but a true and everlasting way no less. And, as he journeys on this road, the heaven-bound traveller feels the pulses of the divine life within him: how can it be otherwise, when his heart, like the heart of Christ, is resting in God, and there is true communion between the Father and the child? This is not mere mysticism, friends; it is the sober truth for those, a great multitude, who have received Christ's baptism of the spirit; it may be the truth for us all, if we will but listen to those intimations of diviner things which come in some form to every child of man; it is an ever-widening truth, for more and more the hearts of men are drawing near to God. And it is in the life of the spirit, that the free mind and the loving heart are alike consecrated to the Most High.

Consider now the relation of what I have said, and tried to suggest, to the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which enters to-morrow on the seventy-fifth year of its existence. The Association has had its part, humble enough in the eyes of the outside world, but important to us, in the life of the nation. It is generally conceded that our people are good citizens. Though our forefathers had to take their part in resistance to injustice, they were loyal subjects, and—as the old restrictions were swept away—they showed how steadily they could help in promoting the national well-being. So we to-day join with the whole nation in the expression of respectful affection and goodwill to the gracious lady who has ruled the land so long, who has filled her high station with such constant solicitude for her people's welfare, and whose life of eighty years fills us with admiration and thankfulness, while we utter the prayer that the day may still be far distant when she will be our Queen no more. Our Association is only a little younger than the Queen. Through all its history it has stood for the rights of the individual conscience, for sincerity in the profession of an unpopular faith, for the enlightening of the mind, and the promotion of spiritual and practical religion.

Is our work of enlightenment completed? Do we not still stand for freedom and growth in the life of the mind? And can we feel that that life has yet come in its abundance to those of our day? I do not enter now into that re-assertion of the sacerdotal spirit which causes so much commotion within the Establishment, and so much astonishment beyond its borders. Nor do I discuss the many varieties of outward form and statement which the religious life of our time assumes. I ask you for a few minutes to go below all these questions to something deeper. I can best lead up to what I have to say by a slight personal reminiscence. Some years since, I was present at a meeting of ministers of various churches. A brother of our own had spoken—it is a thrice-told tale to many of you—of the impossibility of making the science of the nineteenth century square with the theology of earlier days. The speaker discussed the change of outlook which has come in some measure, and which ought, he considered, to have come in far larger measure, had men at all adequately understood what modern knowledge involves. When the earth was looked upon as the centre of created things, it was easy to believe that a God had come down from heaven to die for men. But how, in the presence of the millions of suns which stud the midnight sky—how, when you come to consider even a little of what the evolution of a universe means, can you base the old theology on its old foundations, and believe and speak as if no re-adjustment of thought were necessary? This is what some of us have felt and said for years. But, as we left the meeting, a good brother of another communion said to me: "Your men always amuse me with their astronomical arguments." Why, I thought, why, "amuse"? Is amusement the only or the best possible frame of mind, when such considerations are suggested? Amusement certainly was not the dominant feeling in the mind of Dr. Chalmers, when, early in the century, he delivered his lectures on Astronomy and the Christian Revelation, which—all the more, perhaps, because of their unhesitating scripturalism, and the strange conclusions in which that scripturalism landed the preacher—made men see that the widening of the universe had brought them face to face with problems which could no longer be ignored. You would not thank me for retailing the commonplaces of scientific knowledge, and anything original in either knowledge or speculation is beyond my powers. Whewell thought he had demolished Chalmers on the question of the plurality of worlds; but to-day, I take it, we feel that Whewell's was not the last word upon the subject. I think I may put the matter thus. There are millions of suns, some white-hot with the fires of their youth, some glowing with the redder brilliancy of their prime. If, Whewell notwithstanding, these be the centres of systems, perhaps in countless cases vaster and far grander than our own, then—however much you may concede to what is called the paucity rather than the plurality of worlds—you are met by tremendous possibilities which I see not how you can evade. Suppose that only one in every ten thousand of the stellar suns has at this moment a single world in its train on which intelligent life is for the time possible, you have yet a mighty array of such worlds. And what of the untellable ages that lie behind, what of the boundless future to which all things are moving? Where in the past are you going to place the limit of time at which in all these systems, and those which preceded them, intelligent life began to be—how can you parcel out the ages yet to come? "The heart of man acheth with this infinitude"; for, for all we know, universe may have succeeded universe again and again, just as universe may lie beyond universe to-day. And if, at this point and that in the long and, to us, inconceivable record, intelligent life blossomed out first in one planet and then in another, and this process has been repeated—as well it may—times without number, what happens to your mediæval or sixteenth-century theology? Who shall say on how many of those worlds that from the far-off billions of years have, for their allotted periods, been nurtured by their central suns, the drama of our humanity has not had its parallel, or a parallel as near as vastly differing conditions would permit? On those worlds have "dragons of the prime" disported themselves, ere yet "the noble savage" ran wild? Or, perchance, on some of them, have our human counterparts first crucified, then deified, then practically ignored, some saintly son of God?

Dr. Hastings's new "Dictionary of the Bible" contains an article on "Cosmogony," by my old friend and fellow-student, the Principal of Cheshunt College. It bears ready testimony to the newer thought. Among its features of interest is a little diagram, some two or three inches square, representing the Hebrew idea of earth and heaven. There is no room for beauty in the diagram, but it is very clear and suggestive. Who, in a diagram three inches square, could give a reader any idea of what the universe is really like? You cannot on such a scale represent the depths of space in any intelligible fashion; still less can you even suggest what is of still more importance, the ages upon ages needful for the developments of which we know, the vaster ages required for the developments in past and future at which we dimly guess. Friends, when sometimes in quiet hours I ponder on these things, think how small a thing man is on his tiny world, and yet how his mind can look before and after, and catch glimpses of the mighty universe, it seems to me that, if our faith be not vain, the eternity to which we go must reveal to us some now unknown measure and interpretation of the scale of created things, so that the ages of creation and the unfathomable depths of space will not baffle us as they do to-day, but our thought will be able to grasp and co-ordinate them, as at present it cannot do, in this failing tabernacle of the flesh. But if, hereafter, this is to be our privilege, the open and devout mind must be ours to-day, and the little things in human controversy must cease to trouble us.

It is with effort that we come down from cosmic speculation to the details of life here and now. Yet it may be without shock of incongruity, if we remember that the divine life pulses in its measure through things small as well as great, and that the perfection of the whole can be secured only by the perfection of the parts. All the more, indeed, that we have our place in a mighty scheme, must we be faithful to that which is given us as our work. Thus, the services and meetings of this anniversary time fall into their helpful order in our life, and so in the life of the universe. And inasmuch as the open mind is little without the consecrated heart, I go on to claim for this Association that it recognises the supreme importance of the religious life of the individual, that it aims at the promotion of generous feeling in the religious world, that it nurtures affectionate sympathy with all earnest souls. Its publication list is rich not only in sane and suggestive thinking in matters theological, but also in the spirit of practical and personal religion. Its lines of work have been broad; its help has been given in kindly and inclusive ways. It has recognised the need of maintaining at home centres of free and reverent worship, especially where initial difficulties have to be encountered, or where some outpost of the faith needs succour and renewal. And it has stretched out friendly and helping hands far beyond these islands. Capacity for work it has in abundance; there is abundance of work waiting to be done; the Association needs, and can usefully employ, all the resources, that can be placed at its command. We rejoice in the life of the mind, the affections, the spirit, which is ours already. It may be ours still more abundantly, if we are true to our heritage and loyal to the divine leading, if we understand our mission aright, and rise to the possibilities it opens before us. I have made one reference to the new "Dictionary of the Bible." Let me make another. I notice that Dr. Agar Beet, after sketching the orthodox conception of Christ as he understands it to be set forth in the New Testament, writes thus: "Not a few intelligent and educated men, who pay homage to Christ as the greatest of men, refuse to accept as correct the portrait of Him given in the New Testament. If this portrait be incorrect, these men have detected an ancient and serious error, and have restored to the civilised world the true conception of God. We expect to see in them, as a fruit of their important discovery, some moral and spiritual superiority to those who are still held fast by the great delusion. We look in vain. They who deny the divinity of Christ have done very little to carry the Gospel to the heathen, to rescue the perishing at home, or to help forward the spiritual life of men." What answer, as members of this Association, as ministers and members of the churches in sympathy with it, have we to make to such a charge? It were immodest in us to claim that "moral and spiritual superiority" for which our critic informs us that he looks in vain. But, in humbler fashion, we may say that some, at least, of our brethren have striven to be true to the charge entrusted to them; that we cannot all do all things; that the circumstances of our own religious life have been such that the main part of our energy has been absorbed in the maintenance of our work at home in the presence of many difficulties; that inevitably our conception of the Fatherhood of God has made the conversion of "the heathen" a less important matter to us than it is in the eyes of our fellow-Christians of other Churches. We may urge further that, through our Domestic Missions, and by the efforts of many individual toilers, we have done something—a good deal, considering our numbers—to "rescue the perishing"; we may claim with equal confidence that our leaders have done much to "help forward the spiritual life of men." To say nothing of those bearing honoured names—some of world-wide reputation—still living among us, we, at least, shall not forget Channing in America and John Hamilton Thom in England. Surely, Channing has helped forward "the spiritual life of men." You remember what Robertson of Brighton said of him when "a religious lady," finding Channing's Life on his table, was "horror-struck." "I told her," says Robertson, "that if she and I ever got to heaven, we should find Dr. Channing revolving round the central Light in an orbit immeasurably nearer than ours, almost invisible to us, and lost in a blaze of light. . . . I would just as soon disbelieve in God as contemplate a character like Dr. Channing's, and hesitate to say whether that was a divine image or not; whether God had accepted him or not; whether those deeds and that life were the product of evil or the fruit of the heavenly Spirit." And Mr. Thom's "perfect sermons," as the Spectator called them, have nourished many souls, and might have nourished thousands more, had those thousands come within their influence. It cannot be wholly our fault that more of our fellows do not avail themselves of the aids to a spiritual life which by voice and pen some among us are able to give them. But such criticism as that which I have just quoted from Dr. Beet is a challenge to us to rise to a fuller conception of our great task, and to strive so to speak and so to live, that increasing numbers may hear our message, and may rejoice in it and thank God for it.

So, friends, I would speak words of cheer to you to-day. Even in our little fellowship, we are compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses. Let me bear my testimony of regard to that faithful servant of the truth, who, toiling manfully through his long life, passed so short a time ago within the veil. To know Mr. Spears personally was to feel the earnestness of his spirit, the kindness of his heart, the cheeriness of his outlook on the world. It would be sad indeed, if, in a free community like ours, there were not room for all faithful workers, whatever the special form of their theology. With individual loyalty to the truth as we understand it, we must have the spirit which works gladly with the largest number who are willing to work with us. Are we over-bold in thinking that we still have a mission in this and other lands? The late Sir James Fitzjames Stephen once wrote:—"The standing difficulty of every form of religion is that men don't like it and don't want it." So far as liking and wanting go, we may be told how few in number we still are, but as to the need for a religious interpretation of life, we can be in no doubt whatever. And we have two abiding sources of consolation. However vast the universe, we cannot be wrong in thinking that the highest type of life in our world is that which we must follow, and we who rejoice to be of the fellowship of Christ know where to look for strength and inspiration. As we sang just now, "The fight is set with wrong," and the very fullness of the better life within us must make us earnest in the warfare against every form of evil. And, finally, loyalty to the truth as it has been made known to us, the special feeling of kinship with those close at hand who keep step with us on the onward march, by no means lessens our recognition of loftiness of spirit and beauty of character in the world-wide Church of God. If our heart be right, we feel, with Angélique Arnauld, that we are of the order of all the saints and all the saints are of our order. The "mountain-towering men," the humble and devout souls, in every land and age, are our exemplars.

God's saints are shining lights.

They are, indeed, our pillar fires,

Seen as we go;

They are that Citie's shining spires

We travel to.

On us, then, at this Pentecostal season, may the Spirit of God descend once more, and His strength sustain us on the heavenward way!—Amen.

Before the annual meeting, the President, Dr. Herford, and Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke, Chairman of the Anniversary Committee, entertained the delegates and representatives of District Associations and Societies at luncheon at the Holborn Restaurant.

THE ANNUAL MEETING.

The annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was held on Wednesday afternoon at Essex Hall, the Rev. BROOKE HERFORD, D.D., President, in the chair.

After the opening hymn, "O Lord! lift up thy countenance," had been sung, the Treasurer, Mr. Oswald Nettlefold, submitted the statement of accounts for the year. Though there was nothing in the constitution of the Association, he said, to prevent them living on their capital, they had, nevertheless, contrived to avoid trenching on invested funds. At the risk of being described as a "treasurer of one idea" he would repeat what he had said before in THE INQUIRER, and at the autumnal meeting at Bolton: their subscription list must be strengthened, and the younger members of their families throughout the country must be urged to become subscribers and take the places inevitably left vacant as the elders passed away. Before going to Bolton he had been inclined to believe what was so often and loudly proclaimed—that Unitarianism was dying; but since being at Bolton, he thought so no longer. He could not think of any adequate reason why Bolton alone should be an enthusiastic centre. He could not understand why there should not be similar enthusiastic support elsewhere. He appealed for further aid to be given to local treasurers and for increased subscriptions. While reading through the accounts of the American Unitarian Association, he had been struck by the fact that no less a sum than £2,000 was subscribed for one chapel alone. He was not one of those who said to people "Subscribe, because someone else has subscribed so much." Subscriptions so obtained were not worth having, but he considered that something should be done to prevent year after year the Treasurer having to announce the dismal fact that there had been a falling-off of £50 in the twelve months.

The PRESIDENT, referring to the fact set forth in Mr. Nettlefold's statement, that Mr. J. H. Morton, of Scarborough, had given a sum of £200 to the funds of the Association by way of signalling his (the speaker's) year of office, said that there yet remained a few hours during which that admirable example might be followed.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE then formally submitted the seventy-fourth annual report:—

COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

The report opened with a reference to the broad and generous spirit in which the Association had striven to work since its foundation in 1825. It had served as a bond of common Unitarian work in England, and had linked itself to the churches and societies in America and Transylvania, where similar work is carried on, besides helping movements of liberal religion in the Colonies, in India, and on the Continent of Europe. The whole income from subscriptions and collections was expended in grants for missionary work.

FINANCE.

The financial position was satisfactory. A small decrease in annual subscriptions had been more than made up by the congregational collections, and investments had yielded more than in the previous year. The total income for 1898 was £4,816 11s., of which £1,792 14s. 6d. was received in subscriptions, and £522 9s. 2d. in collections from 170 congregations, the largest amount and the largest number of congregations since the establishment of Association Sunday sixteen years ago. The expenditure included £2,632 3s. 2d. in grants to congregations and missionaries, and in grants of books and tracts, and a balance of £76 4s. 10d. was carried over to 1899. The investment account included the late Mr. James Heywood's legacy of £1,000, and also the gift of £200 from Mr. H. J. Morton, of Scarborough, given to mark Dr. Herford's year as President. It was also reported that the bequest of the late Mr. Charles Cochrane, amounting to £2,720, had been received.

MISSION WORK.

Particulars were given of grants to congregations and missionaries in all parts of the country, amounting to £2,139 4s. The plan of appointing superintendent missionaries in connection with district associations was fully carried out only in London and the home counties, where Mr. Edwards had general oversight, without any specific charge. In South Wales, Dr. Griffiths, while undertaking missionary work, was specially devoted to Pontypridd, and Mr. Broadrick in the Western Union was similarly attached to Bridgwater. The Manchester District and the Northumberland and Durham associations had for a time abandoned the scheme. Grants to the Rev. J. Hocart, of Brussels, to the Unitarian Church at Budapest, and to the Hungarian Student at Manchester College were also reported. The Rev. R. H. Lambley, of Melbourne, at the request of the Committee, had visited groups of Unitarians at Hobart, Tasmania, and Auckland, New Zealand, reporting a good prospect at both places, and at the latter the urgent need of a suitable minister to be sent out.

PUBLICATIONS.

During the year 1,695 books and 103,452 tracts were granted to congregations, postal missions, ministers, students, and correspondents in all parts of the world. Among the new publications were three numbers of a new series of "Sermons for the Times," and the Rev. J. Harwood's "Selections from the Rationalist à Kempis," with memoir of the author, J. Blanco White. Several useful tracts and pamphlets had been reprinted. Copies of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong's "Faith and Doubt in the Century's Poets" had been bought, and the cheap edition of his "God and the Soul" had been brought to the notice of ministers and congregations. A Hungarian translation of the latter work by the Rev. D. Peterfi had also appeared. A letter on the "Religious Education of the Young," with a list of publications, had been widely circulated.

POSTAL MISSION, &c.

Interesting particulars of the Postal Mission work, and of the value of the Rev. Stopford A. Brooke's services in the various parts of the country were also given. As to the McQuaker Fund, it was reported that a number of lectures had been given by the Revs. A. C. Henderson, A. E. Parry, E. T. Russell, and A. Webster, 500 books by Unitarian writers had been sent to ministers and students in Scotland, and grants had been made to several congregations. The new church at Kirkcaldy had been successfully opened on March 25, 1899.

WORK IN INDIA.

The Rev. S. F. Williams had sailed for Bombay, Sept. 29; 1898, and both at Madras and Calcutta had met with a very cordial response to his lectures and services. Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal and Mr. Hem Chandra Sarkar, M.A., were studying at Manchester College, Oxford, and Mr. Promotho loll Sen had returned to India. Two hundred and fifty copies of Mr. Armstrong's "God and the Soul" had been given to University graduates, and a large number of other books and tracts had been sent to libraries and private individuals. Grants had been given to Mr. Akbar Masih, of Banda, the Rev. W. Roberts, of Madras, and to the workers in the Khasi Hills District.

OBITUARY.

In recording the death of a large number of supporters of the Association, including Mr. Michael Hunter, of Sheffield, the Rev. Thomas Hincks, Miss Agnes Bartram, and Mr. William Tate, special mention was made of the Rev. Robert Spears, for several years secretary of the Association, who was "a conspicuous presence and power in connection with the spread of Unitarian Christianity in this country, while his sympathies with the leaders of the Theistic movement in India were ever warm and sincere."

The PRESIDENT having invited questions or comments upon the reports,

The Rev. A. L. SMITH urged the desirability of increasing the number of smaller subscribers.

The PRESIDENT replied that he had found that small subscriptions were no easier to obtain than larger ones. Nevertheless, they were always very glad to get them.

The Rev. T. L. MARSHALL drew attention to the question of the presence of registrars at Nonconformist marriages. He expressed himself as being antagonistic to the adoption of the new Act which came into force in April, 1899.

The PRESIDENT, remarking that he did not agree with Mr. Marshall, pointed out that the same requirements were demanded from the clergy of the Church of England as from the ministers of their body.

Dr. HERFORD then moved the adoption of the annual report and the statement of accounts.

The Rev. H. S. TAYLER, in seconding the adoption of the report, congratulated the Committee on a year's good work well done. He was not prepared to ridicule those discussions which from time to time were held among them relating to matters affecting their religious views. He did not like the attempt that was sometimes made to represent the Unitarian as one who subscribed to and took an interest in every other church but his own. In these days of change, when the shadow of the priest was looming large, it was necessary that they as Unitarians should make an earnest effort to combat the forces of Sacerdotalism and plant churches that should be self-supporting at all possible places. His experience taught him that churches in close proximity to one another did not necessarily take away anything one from the other, and he therefore urged the extension of Unitarian churches wherever it was possible.

The Rev. W. C. HALL supported the motion, and gave an encouraging account of the work at Ashton.

The report and the statement of accounts were adopted unanimously.

Mr. WILLIAM LONG then moved the following resolution:—

That the best thanks of this meeting be given to the President, the Officers, the Council and the Executive Committee for their valuable services during the past year, and that the following be the respective appointments for the coming year:—President: Charles W. Jones, Esq. Treasurer: Oswald Nettlefold, Esq. Secretary, Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. Solicitor: Howard Young, Esq., LL.B. Trustees: S. S. Tayler, Esq., David Martineau, Esq., J.P., W. Blake Odgers, Esq., Q.C., Sir E. Durning-Lawrence, Bart., M.P. Auditors: H. B. Lawford, Esq., J. Sudbery, Esq., E. F. Grundy, Esq. Council: (See list of Names in the Annual Report, pp. 8 and 9). Committee: In addition to the President, Treasurer, and Dr. Brooke Herford, the Ex-President, Mr. G. L. Bristow, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, Mr. Edwin Clephan, J.P., Rev. V. D. Davis, B.A., Mr. Charles Fenton, Rev. James Harwood, B.A., Miss E. M. Lawrence, Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, Mr. G. H. Leigh, Mr. David Martineau, J.P., Mr. J. S. Mathers, J.P., Mr. Frederick Nettlefold, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, Q.C., Mr. Percy Preston, Mr. Stanton W. Preston, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. J. F. Schwann, J.P., Miss Tagart, Rev. W. G. Tarrant, B.A., Mr. S. S. Tayler.

He said that Dr. Herford, as President, had done work such as few men had done and could do. He also spoke in high terms of what they owed to Mr. Nettlefold as Treasurer, and to Mr. Bowie. The Executive Committee was as hard-working a body of men as he had ever come in contact with, and would not let the President shirk even if he wished. He welcomed the new President, who came from his own North Country, where he was esteemed and beloved, and the Association was favoured indeed in securing the services as President of so busy a man as Mr. Charles Jones.

Mr. W. COLFOX seconded the resolution in felicitous terms and then, with the President's permission, made a few remarks bearing upon the Nonconformist Marriages Act, which he characterised as entirely retrogressive.

The resolution was carried by acclamation.

The PRESIDENT then moved, and the Rev. W. G. TARRANT seconded,

That the hearty welcome of this Meeting be given to the Representatives of affiliated and kindred Associations and Societies, with an expression of its sympathy with the good work which they are severally doing for the maintenance and the extension of the principles of Unitarian Christianity:—East Cheshire Union, Rev. Hugon S. Tayler, M.A.; Eastern Union, Rev. William Jellie, B.A.; Irish Non-Subscribing Association, Rev. J. A. Kelly; Liverpool District Association, Mr. Richard Robinson; London District Society,

Mr. David Martineau, J.P.; London and S.E.C. Provincial Assembly, Mr. G. W. Chitty; Manchester District Association, Rev. George Knight; Midland Christian Union, Rev. James C. Street; North and East Lancashire Mission, Rev. J. J. Wright; North-Midland Association, Mr. J. C. Warren, M.A.; Northumberland and Durham Association, Mr. E. H. Coysh; Scottish Unitarian Churches, Rev. H. Williamson; South Wales Association, Rev. T. Arthur Thomas; South East Wales Society, Mr. Lewis N. Williams; Southern Association, Mr. J. Cogan Conway; Western Union, Rev. A. N. Blatchford, B.A.; Yorkshire Union, Rev. John Ellis.

This was heartily adopted.

Dr. HERFORD then moved the following resolution:—

That this Meeting of members and friends of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association extends its warmest welcome to the Representatives of Liberal thought from abroad; and hereby conveys expression of its gratitude, esteem, and good-will to those who, in all parts of the world, are earnestly labouring for the spread of religious truth and freedom. That a copy of this Resolution be forwarded to the Foreign Correspondents of the Association in America, Australia, Belgium, Cape Town, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Iceland, India, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Switzerland, and Tasmania.

He said that he followed the spread of Unitarianism abroad with the greatest interest. They had actually had an application for help from Bulgaria, but unfortunately it had not been sufficiently supported to satisfy the Committee. From Auckland an application, supported by about 100 names, had been received, and if the new President and Committee were as wise as the old, something would be done for the Unitarians of Auckland. There was a group of Unitarians meeting regularly in Tasmania, and they were very much in earnest indeed. He moved the resolution with the greatest possible pleasure.

Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, in seconding the resolution, said that, in the list of countries enumerated, there were many in which liberal thought was not identical with their Unitarianism, and yet they had the same great aims, and they were well advised in extending a helping hand to the representatives from abroad.

The resolution was carried by acclamation.

The Rev. J. HOCART (Brussels) in returning thanks on behalf of the foreign delegates, said that he looked with confidence to the ultimate triumph of the Unitarian cause in Belgium, where it was making progress in spite of all the efforts of the Catholic priesthood. With the exception of one period at the outset of his career, he had never felt greater confidence in the eventual triumph of the good work. He referred at some length to the pernicious growth of anti-semitism, and said that Unitarian lectures directed against this evil had attracted attention throughout Belgium.

Mr. BIPIN CHANDRA PAL, of the Brahmo Somaj (Calcutta), also heartily thanked the meeting for the terms of the welcoming resolution.

On the motion of the PRESIDENT, it was agreed,—

That the cordial thanks of this Meeting be given to the Rev. Dendy Agate, B.A., the Preacher of the Anniversary Sermon, to the Congregation at Essex Church, and other friends in London for their hospitality.

Mr. EDWIN CLEPHAN then moved the following resolution:—

That this Meeting enters its earnest protest against the publication and circulation of Sunday Editions of Daily Newspapers, not on the ground of any narrow Sabbatarianism, but on broad principles of utility and reverence for what is highest and best in man, in the interests of national welfare and a true day of rest.

At the outset he read the announcement that the Sunday Daily Telegraph would be discontinued—an announcement received by the meeting with loud applause. Mr. Clephan said that no subject had excited so much attention and aroused such universal disgust since the days when the slave circular was issued by Government. The agitation and its results had shown that no Act of Parliament—and he considered the House of Commons had acted wisely in refraining from interference—could have the strength of united public opinion. There was no present fear of the issue of seven-day newspapers, which, as in New York, must tend to degrade the Press and the public too.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS said that all present must have heard with the utmost satisfaction the announcement read by Mr. Clephan. If there were any other issue of a seven-day newspaper he would make his speech, but as it was, he would content himself merely by seconding the resolution.

The Rev. J. C. STREET moved the previous question, on the ground that there was no unanimity on the subject, and that since the Sunday issues had now been dropped, it would be more gracious to withdraw the resolution. There was more Sunday labour involved in the Monday papers, which they read without any qualms of conscience.

Mr. CHARLES JONES, while not agreeing with all that Mr. Street had said, said that there was not on record any instance in which public opinion had been listened to more readily than it had been by the editors of the Daily Mail and Daily Telegraph, to whom the meeting might pass a vote of thanks.

The previous question was seconded and supported by the Rev. T. L. MARSHALL, but being put by Mr. J. F. Schwann, who was in the chair during the temporary withdrawal of the President, was lost, and an amendment by the Rev. H. WILLIAMSON, seconded by the Rev. G. St. CLAIRE, to omit the word "daily" having been also negatived, the resolution was passed by a large majority.

Sir ROLAND K. WILSON, Bart., then moved the following resolution:—

That in common with all friends of the comity of nations we cordially welcome the assembling of an International Conference for considering the limitation of military and naval armaments, and we trust that our Unitarian brethren everywhere will, through their churches or otherwise, do all in their power to aid a movement so auspiciously commenced and so fraught with possibilities of good.

In the course of his speech he said the Conference met under most auspicious circumstances. The invitation had been accepted by twenty-five States out of twenty-six, and the place of meeting had been well chosen—the country of Grotius, the interpreter of International law. The mutual relations between the Great Powers, and notably those between Britain, France and Russia, had improved, and by a coincidence there was at this moment a cessation even of those hostilities with barbarous chiefs which seemed to be going on almost always in one part of the world or another. Even granting that the present amazing approach to universal peace was probably ephemeral, still the permanent features of our international relations were such as would have surprised any of the men of ancient Rome. What, for instance, would the Emperor Augustus have thought of the fact that nearly 3,000 miles of frontier in North America, separating two high spirited nations, was almost entirely unfortified and unguarded? What would he have thought of the Queen spending her annual holiday in a foreign country? Everything showed that the present age was exceptionally favourable to an international message of peace. It would be foolish, however, to talk as though success were assured. They had it on the Tsar's own word that the movement would never have advanced as far as it had advanced if it had not been for the support it had received in this country. He trusted that the work would be taken up by their Church, and he wished to persuade those who still remained doubtful that the movement was real and true. There were doubters who would have them believe that the movement was due to Russia's desire to lull English suspicions to sleep while she artfully prepared herself for the fight that would eventually ensue for supremacy in Asia. They insinuated that the Conference was held in order that Russia might be able to postpone the inevitable struggle to such a time as would be more convenient to herself, when she would be stronger than now. He was not surprised so much at the iniquity that was attributed to Russia as at the greater iniquity that was attributed to their own Government, for the clear implication was that Great Britain should seize this moment, when we were temporarily superior in strength, to make herself master of that decaying empire to which, if it did fall to pieces, Russia had certainly a better claim than we. He could only commend the advice of the Church of England clergyman who, at the time of the Crimean War, read aloud the prayer, and interpolated asides, whispering, for instance, after the phrase "assuage their malice," the words "and our own." So he (the speaker) would say we should do likewise and endeavour by all possible means to promote the success of the great Conference.

The Rev. J. J. WRIGHT seconded the resolution, which was carried.

The Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN then moved the following resolution, of which notice had been given by the Rev. Dr. Klein, of Liverpool:—

That this Meeting deplores and condemns the recent action of the majority of the Liverpool School Board in resolving to introduce the Evangelical Free Church Catechism into rate-supported schools from which all denominational creeds and formularies should be rigidly excluded; and urges the friends and supporters of civil and religious liberty in the city of Liverpool to petition the School Board to rescind the resolution.

The Liverpool Free Church Council, he said, had repudiated all responsibility and sympathy with the action of the School Board.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, and unanimously adopted, after which the meeting adjourned for an hour for tea.

THE EVENING SESSION.

The meeting in the evening was very largely attended, Dr. Brooke Herford being in the chair.

After the opening hymn, "The God that to the fathers," had been sung, the President proposed that a telegram should be sent to the Queen, congratulating her upon the celebration of the eightieth anniversary of her birth.

The proposition was agreed to unanimously.

The Secretary read the telegram, which was as follows:—

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN,
Windsor Castle.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association, in annual meeting assembled this day, respectfully send their loyal and affectionate congratulations to your Majesty.

BROOKE HERFORD, President.
Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

The President then delivered his address:—

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

Before introducing the special subject of this evening, of "our Word and our Work," I want to recall to our hearts the real proportion of that whole movement to which we belong.

I suppose that to the casual observer, this work, for which we are gathered in the meetings of this week, seems a small thing. Unitarianism, as an organised part of English religious life, is a small thing. I accept the fact as the starting point of my subject, only I want to bring out in its true relation to this "Lesser Unitarianism," that "Larger Unitarianism" of which it forms a part, and by which I want to set to a stronger scale our own work, our aims, our hopes, our confidence,

For while to the common world, which looks at things simply as they appear in reports and statistics, Unitarianism is but a thing of some three or four generations and of a few small groups of churches, the Larger Unitarianism is a great, broad stream of the world's simplest religion. It had its source in the old Hebrew life; was not supplanted, but lifted up into new tenderness and power by Christ; and has come down the Christian ages, sometimes lost and almost dead, but rising again. It strove first in all the forms of Arianism to keep men something nearer to the simplicity of Christ, and then, after long defeat and almost death, it has been striving to bring the world back to that simplicity. A stream so wide that still in the fourth century it counted half of Christendom, and struggled on for other centuries till finally crushed by Rome. And when the Reformation set the mind of Europe free, among the first movements of that new freedom were some to that older, simpler faith—in one supreme almighty God. That great thought gathered distinctness and cohesion as it voiced itself in the great work of Servetus, "The Restoration of Christianity," the very name of which was the keynote of all the after movement. Ah! it was so plain to him, that he believed he could have converted Calvin himself to it. Alas! he only attempted it to perish, but so perished that that word of his was written in letters of flame upon the whole horizon of men's thought. It seized upon the little groups of scholars who were seeking the truth in the free Italian cities,

It took hold of the Socini; carried one of them to Poland; made there a settlement which lighted up Europe for a century with a great light of piety and freedom, though only to be ruthlessly crushed out at last by the combined forces of Rome and Calvinism. Then it burned up with a strong and steady light in Transylvania, was again trampled down, but not out; struggled on alone through over two hundred years, until in the present century it found out that it was not alone, and reached out its hands, and not in vain, to the Churches of fellow-believers which had grown up in England and America.

For it was from the seeds of that great Reformation movement that Unitarianism found its way to England and, after a century of intermittent personal controversy, at last established itself as the avowed faith of a whole group of churches, forming a new centre of activity and diffusion. And in much the same way it penetrated the scholarly New England Congregationalism, and in the kindred but independent form of Universalism grew up among the common people. Meanwhile, with its silent force it had been making way among the old Calvinistic Protestantisms of the Continent, till Calvin's own Geneva had become a Unitarian city, and a large proportion of the Dutch and German Reformed Churches, and of the Huguenots of France, had broadened into essentially the same great liberal faith. All this I call the Larger Unitarianism, which cannot be identified with any single age or Church, but which in various quiet growths, or outbursts, of reforming thought has aimed to free the world from the theological corruptions of mediævalism, and restore the religious thought of Christendom to the simplicity of Christ. Yes, the Larger Unitarianism I like to call it—that great stream of thought which, in the sense of a great wrong done to the simple religion of Jesus Christ by what the creeds had made of it, has gathered its protesting elements and forces from many lands and many Churches; sweeping away first the corruption of the Trinity, and gradually, also, the whole cycle of beliefs that grew up with that, and have been entangled with it. The Larger Unitarianism, which, as it has drawn new bodies of men or groups of churches to it, has established these as Lesser Unitarianisms—new centres of its influence, worshipping in the uplift of it, and holding up the light of it before the world.

Of all these Lesser Unitarian movements in our modern world, none is more interesting than that which is represented here to-day. That world-movement I have been tracing came to its strongest embodiment in England through the fact that almost one whole branch of Puritan non-conformity was gradually caught up into its eager interest. Of course it was not rigidly so; its strength really came from various sources; but the historic group of Presbyterian churches gave it a welcome, found it a home, so markedly, as almost to be renamed for it, and sometimes even to regard themselves as "the English Unitarians."

I am proud of the whole story of English Puritanism and Nonconformity, its gradual emancipation from the glamour both of Popery and prelacy; its sturdy struggle against sacerdotalism—the moral grit which has been the strength of 300 years of struggle for constitutional liberty, and which still survives in that "Nonconformist conscience" which men may sneer at but cannot disregard.

Of course it never was perfect! Puritanism in power was hard and narrow in its very earnestness. But in Cromwell, independency gave us our noblest Englishman since Alfred, and if the Presbyterians, to whom we trace our lineage, began by being the narrower branch, we rejoice that they learned something more of tolerance in suffering, and ended by becoming the readier soil for what I cannot help regarding as one of the world's noblest growths of religious liberty and progress. I am proud of that Presbyterian history. I am almost a "Presbyterian forefather" myself: have whole generations of them in my blood. I grew up from childhood soaked in the spirit and the traditions of them; loving to trace out the story of their sufferings, their joy in the era of toleration, the zeal of their chapel-building. I am proud of all that; but of nothing in their history am I prouder than that, as their freedom broadened down, it widened also towards religious liberalism; and became the most natural home for that Larger Unitarianism which was gradually coming in through books and tracts from the Continent, or through the personal heresies of isolated students.

One hardly knows how it was that they became so. Partly it was their "open trusts," though we are apt to ascribe too much to these, which were not so peculiar to them as we have often claimed; I think it had even more to do with their early giving up of any special privileges or authority in church-membership, leaving their churches open to the thought of common men; but so it was, that when the Presbyterians and Independents drew apart, after a brief attempt at union, and the sporadic Liberalism began to crystalise into a definite rejection of the Trinity, these Presbyterian churches were the openest of all to receive what seemed the new light (though really it was the oldest!), and so received it that it grew and grew among them, until they came to be specially identified with it.

I wish I could put adequately to you what that little movement, thus coming in upon them from the Larger Unitarianism of the world, was to those little congregations of the Presbyterian Dissent. Not to all. Some disliked it. They did not like the disturbance which it caused, and the division which it threatened. As in the Church of England there were plenty of Latitudinarians who disliked Lindsey's open Unitarianism, even while in a feeble way agreeing with it; so, many of the quiet Presbyterians disliked Dr. Priestley's agitation, and, while sharing his views, would have nothing to do with spreading them. But to Lindsey and Priestley and those who did heartily receive them, it was a great religious reformation. It was a stripping away of the corruptions of centuries. One of Priestley's first religious works was that on the History of those Corruptions with a view to showing how they were no real part of Christianity. Back to the New Testament, back to Christ himself, was the note of the new movement.

I am the more anxious to bring this out with all the force and clearness which fifty years' study of their work and sharing in it have given to me, because now, as then, there are some who do not at all appreciate what their movement was, either to them or to the congregations of that time. There are those who see in that whole reforming movement of Lindsey and Priestley simply an outburst of sectarian zeal, and a switching off of their churches from a previous path of broad, spiritual Christianity into the troubled and separate ways of sectarian strife.

Really nothing could be further from the facts. The soul of piety, and the activity of Christian helpfulness were in the movement. Theophilus Lindsey was one of the earliest pioneers of the Sunday-school movement. I have lately been reading five letters which passed between Priestley and his people just after the burning of their meeting house, and nothing could be more touching than their tone of piety, and their hopes for the resumption of his classes for the young, which had so trained them "in the great truths of Christianity." And as to the idea that the new teaching was the beginning of declension in the old Presbyterianism, the fact was the very opposite. It had been declining before. The earliest Liberalism of the first half of last century was little more than a vague drifting; it had no clear point; it shrank from any; it fell back upon a dry moralism—its life became more and more lethargic. Joseph Hunter, the antiquarian, whose life of Oliver Heywood gave me my first vivid knowledge of Presbyterianism, and who made the story of the Old Dissent specially his own, traces this decline in something of detail all through the middle of last century. But he admits that towards the close of last century the decline had been arrested. What had stopped it? Joseph Hunter was no lover of Unitarianism, but he admits that what arrested decline was, the clearer, more definite belief which Lindsey and Priestley had thought out, and which had given a new interest to the preaching and whole congregational life of the Presbyterians.

And so that Unitarianism, which for two centuries had been in England as an isolated and mainly a private heresy, gradually become a united, cohesive public movement, and the Presbyterian churches were the heart and soul of it. Not in any exact sense. Unitarianism, even in its English beginnings, kept growing into a larger thing than the Presbyterianism in which it first found a home. The first avowedly Unitarian church was set up by a liberal Churchman—Lindsey. And about the same time there was a movement among the General Baptists, which brought the bulk of them upon the same side. And at intervals since, new groups of thinkers—the "Unitarian Methodists" of Rossendale about 1810, the "Christian Brethren" of Lancashire and Cheshire, about 1840—came out at first quite independently, but gradually joined in the one existing federation of free churches, all keeping their old freedom, all congregationally independent, making to-day a curiously varied whole, difficult to sum up in any single name, yet heartily united in one general movement. And though the part of it we see is still but a struggling thing, it joins itself to the larger movement which comes along the story of modern Christianity grouping itself around the names of Servetus and Socinus, and Francis David; and John Bidle, and Lindsey and Priestley, and Channing and Martineau.

And now, what is the outcome of all this? Why have I so emphasised that Larger Unitarianism which has been sweeping through history, and yet dwelt in such detail over this Lesser Unitarianism, which is apt to seem so poor in comparison? Why? Because it is in this Lesser Unitarianism that we have to do our part for the larger. And I want us to have the spirit and the confidence of the larger thing in us, as we do the part which in the doing often seems so small.

I know its smallness! Have I been working at it now these fifty years and do not I know its weaknesses and inadequacy? But the trouble is that we too often think of these alone, and because the little work seems to drag, and seldom comes to any great thing, we feel as if the whole cause perhaps is failing?

This is why it is so helpful to recall that Larger Unitarianism. For that also has been a small thing in its details, and yet in the great sweep of its entirety its success fills me almost with awe! Yes, its success! For what was it they started out to do—those Unitarian fathers of the Reformation time? To build up some growing sect that should look well in year books? No! but to recall the world from its Trinities and Christologies, and poor abasements and sacrificialisms, to the simple and yet grand faith of Jesus Christ. And all along, except in some brief episodes of success, they seemed to be failing; and yet, as we compare the world of common human thought to-day with that to which they appealed, we see that already their work has in a large measure succeeded. The world of religious thought has changed! It is altogether more reasonable, more tender, more human than it was. The things which Calvin believed are now impossible to men. Of course there come back-eddies in the stream. There is such a reaction just now, strong upon us, which in some aspects looks as if this England were drifting back to Rome. But it is not! And, meanwhile, the strong, moderate thought of our time is moving onwards to many of the very things for which our fathers had to stand so long alone. I do not say it is an avowed change, but it is none the less real. Not a Church has formally given up the Trinity, but the upward look of the common heart to-day is simply towards God—and especially toward the Fatherhood of God—which, from Robertson on, the broadest thinkers of to-day frankly admit they specially owe to Channing. Ah! Channing is now part of the "Larger Unitarianism," but how has he come to be so? There was a time when the sermons which gave the keynote of his influence were simply the word of a young Boston minister, and when the American Unitarian Association had to be furnishing funds to print them, and discussing whether they should print 1,000 of them, or might venture on 5,000! And so our part is clear. It is not a large part, but it is for a large and conquering thing! It is in all this little work around us, about which this British and Foreign Unitarian Association is busy year by year; these meetings about which we are often disappointed because so few come to hear; these distributings of the best words of light and truth in mean tract-forms and through all sorts of petty agencies; and the building up by painful gathering of shillings and guineas small homes and centres of a simple living worship—their windows and doors open to God's light and man's fellowship—fulfilling in every way they can the helpful service of Christian churches—all such things are the field of our service. And we sow our little seed of Word and Work, and know not if it shall bring forth some "thirty-fold," and, here and there, one the "hundredfold" of history; but we do know that by such sowing the purposes of God are fulfilled, and the fields whitened with the harvests that shall feed men with the bread of life!

"OUR ATTITUDE TOWARDS SOCIAL AND PUBLIC QUESTIONS."

The Rev. CHRISTOPHER J. STREET, M.A., LL.B., next addressed the meeting on the subject of "Our Attitude towards Social and Public Questions." He said the original subject which had been allotted to him was "Our Share in the Public Work of the Free Churches." Although he was willing to speak on that subject, he had asked that it might be changed, for the simple and very good reason that the Unitarians had been systematically denied co-operation with their Free Church brethren in the unions which yet engaged in work of social and moral reform. He thought that the protest of the Unitarians against their exclusion from the Free Church Councils should be systematically continued, for they had no right to be silent, considering that the principles for which they stood were being insulted and ignored. He could work quite as well with the members of the Church of England and of the Catholic Church as he could with the members of the Free Churches of this country with regard to social amelioration. The Free Church Council should confine itself to questions which concerned the Free Churches as such. He would not be content with any union which was not as broad as the religion in human hearts. The Churches had made a great mistake in putting too much stress upon the theological and too little stress upon moral and social questions. The fact was that the Churches had looked too far away for the Kingdom of Heaven, which was really just at their doors. Religion needed humanising. We had no right to let the world go on in its own way without offering the slightest resistance. The higher life of humanity of the present day was our immediate concern. Could the Unitarian Association discuss moral questions such as seven days' papers, for example? Personally he would not say "thank you" for a Unitarianism that could not. If the British and Foreign Unitarian Association were to bar such questions from its consideration, he should have to re-consider his membership. So with regard to their Churches, was the preaching to be all about the Jews, their times, their difficulties, and their moral struggles, or about the work of the present day? The preacher's function, he felt, was not to advocate particular methods of reform. Outside the pulpit the preacher should be at perfect liberty to speak of methods which were to his mode of thought right, but in the pulpit it was his duty to unflinchingly lay down the great moral principles which were at the heart of our Christian religion. He admitted that there was a great danger of ministers frittering away their work in public life, but at the same time he held that it was part of the duty of the minister to take his place in the great work of human life. Our Churches, which were the freest of the free, should be the first and foremost in all good works. He took some honest pride in the record of the work of their ministers and laymen in various parts of the country with regard to social and public questions. Whenever there was a Unitarian congregation there would be found some who were taking their share in the public work of their town for the advantage of the community. It was part of their work as Unitarians to strive for good in the world. Then, again, was a member to take an active interest in party politics? He certainly thought so, but was of opinion that party politics should not be introduced into the pulpit. But there were national politics upon which it was often the duty of the minister to speak, especially when matters arose which vitally affected the nation's welfare. Party politics as such ought always to be avoided in the pulpit, but, at the same time, the minister should always claim the rights of citizenship, and exercise those rights to the best advantage of the community. On all questions of morals the Churches must speak out in the matter of purity, to insist on an equal law for man and woman; in the matter of cruelty, to protect the helpless, whether women, children, or dumb animals. The Conference at The Hague, which was causing such rejoicing, was one of the most glorious signs of the age, and, as had been stated the previous evening at the meeting of the Peace Society at the House of the Society of Friends, this was likely to be only the first of a series of such congresses to endeavour to diminish war and its horrors, and endeavouring to establish a permanent court of International arbitration. He trusted that God would speed the labours of the Conference. All these things hinged on the principle that religion should be the guide, and Churches would be of little value if they did not teach us our share in the work and life of the world. He trusted that Unitarians would see that they were not left behind in this work, but would occupy the leading place.

"OUR UNITARIAN GOSPEL AND ITS DEMANDS UPON US."

Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, Q.C., then spoke on "Our Unitarian Gospel and its Demands upon Us." In his opening remarks, he alluded to the fact that it was the Queen's Birthday and also the anniversary of the passing of the Toleration Act in 1689. Coming to his subject, he said the Unitarian Gospel was not ours; we were at the best but the temporary custodians of it. It was the property of all men and women; it was not ours exclusively, and it was our duty as far as possible to help others to come and take their share of the Gospel of Christ. It was, no doubt, the Gospel of the Unitarians in so far as it was their duty to preach it. The old spirit of Presbyterianism was not dead yet. The English people, he thought, must be on their guard against the Extreme Ritualists, who spoke to their followers and told them that they must put their trust in the priests as though they were the viceregents of God. It should be remembered that those priests of to-day knew, as did the priests of old, that the thing to do was to get hold of the children; to tell the parents that they did not know what to teach the children but that the priests did. We must protect our children in our schools, and in every one of the schools that had been instituted and were supported out of the rates, from the action of the priests. When he found the Church of England trying to start a new court—or something which was not a court according to law—and that the Ecclesiastical law was being despaired of by those who did not care to enforce it, he felt that we might congratulate ourselves upon our freedom. He did not care whether a clergyman preached a good or bad sermon in a plain or coloured stole; but when he found some of the clergymen in the Church of England trying to introduce into their churches the practice of the confessional, he felt it was time to speak. The clergymen should recognise that as members of a State Church they should conform to its regulations. Turning to the Evangelical body, he said that the Gospel was not always carried by ministers of that sect as a message of joy. There was sometimes more talk of hell fire. If the Evangelical body did not wish to have the help of the Unitarians in their particular union, then we should still go on with our work. He thought that Unitarians could help them; but if the Union would not have them, Unitarians wished them God speed in the work that they had undertaken. What about the Gospel which Unitarians were preaching? They believed in the Truth, and in going out to seek the Truth, with an unfettered mind. They believed in God, a loving God and Father of all. Unitarians believed that the Kingdom of God was here on earth and within mankind. What, then, was their duty? To whom ought they to carry the doctrine and the Gospel preached in their churches? If they had got a faith, they had also to justify it in the eyes of the world by works. More should be done for the children, and he sometimes thought that Unitarian fathers and mothers were forgetting to look after their children in the sense of instilling religion into them. More use must be made in their homes of the books issued by the Sunday School Association, in order to instruct the children. He liked to think that the young men who were entering various professions and businesses were able to give answers and reasons for the faith that was in them. Where the parent could not give the necessary instruction, then it was the minister's duty; and he was glad to know that in some of their churches there were classes of children who were being taught the reasons for their faith, and why they were not members of other denominations. But beyond that the great demand which was being made upon them at present was to go out to the working-man and working-woman who were members of no congregation. There were men and women in London, Manchester, Liverpool, and other large towns in the United Kingdom who were worried with the cares of life, not only during the week, but also on the Sunday. Many of these had had a certain amount of religious training, but now took no part in any religious or moral work. Generally, what these people read on religious matters was agnostic and a sneering kind of literature, deriding sacred things and making them practically atheists. It was to those people that Unitarians should turn. The moral of Dr. Herford's address that evening was that such was the duty of Unitarians, seeing that they had such a heritage. It seemed to him that now matters had come to this pass, that Unitarians ought to pull themselves together and go out especially to the toilers, the working-men and working-women, in this country. It was not the time for hiding the talents or placing the light under the bushel, but to face the problems of the day and to go to work in the words of the hymn:

With trust in God's free spirit,—
The ever-broadening ray
Of truth that shines to guide us
Along our forward way.

In concluding, he trusted that a special effort would be made in the direction he had indicated.

The SECRETARY here read the following letter from the American Unitarian Association:—

25, Beacon-street, Boston, Mass.,

May 12, 1899.

To the Officers, Committee, and Members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association—GREETING.

The American Unitarian Association was organised on May 25, 1825, and on the following day the B. and F.U.A. was founded. In order that the seventy-fifth anniversary of these events may be fitly celebrated, we affectionately invite you to join in an International Conference of Unitarians and other Liberal Christians, to be held in Boston, Massachusetts, on May 24 to May 30, 1900. This Conference was summoned to the end that Christians of common faith and purpose but different national allegiance may strengthen the bonds of affectionate comradeship, deepen religious life, and devise ways and means of more efficient usefulness. Shall we not unite our thanksgivings to God for our precious heritage of high purpose, pure example, and honourable achievement? Shall we not take counsel together of how we may best preserve and transmit this inheritance, train the coming generation in the usages, affections, and hopes that we rejoice in and give to our heirs the beneficent institutions that have been bequeathed to us? Shall we not by communion together deepen our spirit of loyalty and consecration, and gain courage to go forward in steadfast confidence that the God of the fathers will still be with the sons.

Brethren, grace and truth be with you through God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

THE AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
By Samuel A. Eliot, Secretary.

A resolution proposed by the President, cordially reciprocating the sentiments of this letter of greeting, and its proposal for a Conference, and charging the new Committee to consider the steps necessary for carrying it into effect, was unanimously passed.

The following also had been received from Hungary:—

FROM BISHOP FERENCZ.

I hope, that as usual, so in this year also your meetings, with the help of God, will do much for the interest of Unitarianism, and in this we shall enjoy your proceedings too. For your success and happiness are also our success and happiness. With every step you make forward, we also feel that we proceed with you. May God grant that thus mutually helping each other, we may work in our religion for the welfare of humankind and to spread the kingdom of God.

We shall hold in this year two general meetings, one will take place in the beginning of July at Kolozsvár, and the other in the country at Szerily-Keresztur, where twenty years ago we celebrated the tercentenary commemoration of Francis David, our first Bishop, and on which occasion the Rev. Alex. Gordon and the Rev. Andrew Chalmers were also present as the representatives of our English Unitarian brethren. May God's blessing rest upon your meetings, with most kind regards and fraternal greetings.—I am, yours most truly, JOSEPH FERENCZ (Bishop of the Unitarian Churches in Hungary).

Letters of greeting were also received from Baron F. Schickler, of Paris, on behalf of the Délégation Libérale, and from Dr. Lunge, of Zurich, on behalf of liberal thinkers in Switzerland.

"OUR MESSAGE TO YOUNG MEN AND WOMEN."

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD next addressed the meeting on the subject of "Our Message to Young Men and Women." At the outset he said he wanted the young people of the Unitarian churches up and down the land to be assured of his loyal and reverent appreciation of their work and of their spirit in the midst of scattered congregations. It was, he said, the hard toilers who worked from day to day, from early morning until late in the evening, who were the first and foremost to give generously their time and the remnant of their strength. He knew that there were many young men and women of means and of education whose work was simply inestimable in the manner in which it was given, but when we had to deal with the mass of the young helpers we knew very well the heavy claims that were made upon them in many ways. It was to such that he wished to speak that evening on behalf of those religious principles and religious homes which, he trusted, were dear to everyone. The religious principles of the Unitarians were worth having and should be cherished and manifested to the world. Those religious principles had not been maintained without sore struggles in days gone by, and never more, by God's help, should they be repeated in the dominions that smile beneath the rule of the liberal-minded Victoria. He commended their churches to the young people as being the homes of freedom. Where, for example, throughout Christendom would the Rev. Stopford Brooke have found standing for a free foot but in their Churches? Their churches were worth having and worthy of the regard and the love of the people in these days. He urged his young hearers not to be carried away by the idea that it did not matter what they believed. There never was a more condemnable heresy in the world. As one of his most honoured predecessors, George Armstrong, had said: "Right opinion is the ground of right action." It was of vital importance to the young people what they believed. He appealed to them for a reverent piety and for a rational use of the Sabbath. He had yet to learn that abstention from public worship was the only way in which a man could make a rational use of the Sunday. He appealed to them not to starve the soul, but to cultivate it. Whatever use Sunday was put to he trusted that that use would not be allowed to diminish the interest of the young people in their parents' religion and in the old house of prayer, where in bygone times some of the best influences that ever touched the soul came to the worshippers. A great deal of responsibility rested upon the parents in commending the religion which we all hold dear to the young people, who, by God's help, were going to make a better fight than they had done. In that age the treasures of knowledge were poured down upon them by the lavish hand of science, but as religious teachers science could give them nothing of which they had need to be afraid. Light came from the God of Light and from the God of Truth, and never could be misleading. The young people would have to set their hearts and minds and keep them open to the advent of truth, and so would the great teaching of science come within them. The message to the young people was that of the great dead Laureate:—

Let knowledge grow from more to more,
But more of reverence in us dwell,
That mind and soul according well
May make one music as before,
But vaster.

In conclusion he pleaded for an understanding of the faith on which the convictions of the young men and women should rest, and also urged them to increase and strengthen their congregations.

The proceedings were then brought to a close with the doxology.

THE CONFERENCE.

On Thursday morning the Conference was held at Essex Hall, Dr. Brooke Herford in the chair, and subsequently Mr. Charles W. Jones.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A., read the following paper:—

THE CLAIMS OF THE SACERDOTALISTS.

I am sorely afraid lest the Council, in asking me to open a discussion on the subject which has drawn to itself so much angry notice in the last few months, may find itself in the position of Balak, the king of Moab, who invited a dissenting prophet to come and curse his enemies, and had to listen instead to a three-fold blessing on them. If any are tempted after the example of the son of Zippor to smite their hands together and bid me flee to my place, I can only take it meekly, and answer with Balaam that "I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord" to speak what may win me your applause. I make no pretence to inspiration, but what appears to me true, that is for me "what the Lord saith, and that will I speak."

RITUAL.

The Archbishops of the ancient and venerable Sees of Canterbury and York have been lately sitting in solemn conclave, with Bishops and learned council of the law in attendance, to hear all the arguments that can be discovered or invented for and against the use of incense and lights in public worship. With utmost respect for men, whom I willingly admit to be as much my superiors intellectually as they are my superiors in social position, I cannot refrain from characterising the whole controversy as puerile; and the angry passions and brave resolves to which it gives rise illustrate for me only the ineradicable folly of mankind—folly from which, of course, I make no claim to be myself exempt. For what are the questions so gravely and so passionately debated?—whether it is lawful at public worship to burn sweet smelling spices? whether this should be done in standing vessels or in portable ones? and whether candles may also be lighted for ornament? In a word, what the limits are of legal Ritualism? Is there any other decision which will commend itself to a reasonable view, except this—that Ritualism being acknowledged by all to be only a means to an end, and that end the quickening of devotional feeling, it is good so far as it effects this purpose, becomes evil as soon as it is made an end in itself. We are all Ritualists—more or less. What is the sprinkling of the babe with water, the passing from hand to hand of flagon and paten and tasting each of bread and wine, the preacher's black gown, the wonted order of service, the table set apart by itself in place where it may be seen of all, the decorations of flowers and greenery on special occasions or at every Sunday's meeting, the figures of saints and angels resplendent in our windows—what are all these but Ritual? And among ourselves we have more and less; do we pretend that our "more" should be the limit for all worshippers, or that there is any limit save that which suits the temperament of each individual or congregation? Shall I forbid my neighbour to raise his soul heavenward with the fragrant clouds of incense, while I delight myself with the sight and perfume of flowers which adorn my church? To condemn Ritualism in general as "mummery," "antics," "child's play," and so forth, is to condemn the Bible with its prescription of a minute and elaborate ritual—ritual at which Jesus and his disciples assisted; it is to condemn the religion of antiquity as not only inadequate but foolish; it is to condemn all the courts of the world, ancient and modern, for etiquette, without which no court is constituted, is only a kind of Ritualism; it is to condemn our human nature, which everywhere seeks to express its emotions by signs and ceremonies.

Moreover, I cannot forget, on behalf of many of our Ritualistic churches, how their services may be the one bright spot in lives whose colour were otherwise one dull uniform grey. We can afford to look down upon vestments and processions and song and lights and incense, we who in our homes have so much that is glad and gay. I am not disposed to forbid to my less fortunate brethren a share in such pleasant things, nor to reprobate these because for them they are associated with the place of prayer and with their only day of rest.

RITUALISTS DISLOYAL?

But it is loudly asserted that Ritualists are disloyal to the Church as by law established, to their ordination vows, and to the Articles of Religion to which they have solemnly given their assent. These are assertions easily made, but not so easily proved. For my part—whether as the son of an Evangelical clergyman, who gave up his living and means of livelihood while yet a young man, because he felt that the formularies of the Church were inconsistent with Evangelical principles, or as a minister of a religious body whose intellectual sympathies have all gone with Dean Stanley and Bishop Colenso and their friends—I am not disposed to urge this question of the legal interpretation of formularies, whose letter would exclude from the Church a multitude of the noblest and most zealous workers of each of the three great parties which find a home within its large and ill-defined boundaries.

THEIR METHODS.

Again, it is one of the gravest charges against Ritualists that their methods have not been open, that they have contrived by subterfuges and pretences to introduce doctrines and practices which would not have been tolerated if avowed at the first. Perhaps it has been so; I confess I am not inclined to spend time in investigating the charge, nor am I content to take the case set forth on the Protestant side as conclusive without hearing the reply. There is a wisdom of the serpent commended on the highest authority, and the bounds which divide wisdom and guile are not easily fixed. My own experience has been that when people are thoroughly convinced that their religious opinions are God's truth, they are not over-scrupulous as to the means they employ for propagating them. Romanist, Ritualist, Protestant, Trinitarian, all may be accused of the use of unfair and dishonest means of attack and defence. It is for us, who have not the excuse of identifying our cause with God's glory, to take heed that our allegiance be to Truth, and not to Unitarianism.

But if Ritualism be so harmless, and the Ritualists blameless, what controversy is there between us? Is it all merely a case of individual taste and temperament, as opposed to the unwarrantable interference which aims at constraining everybody to think and do according to the day's fashion? Has not the law to terminate all such disputes been laid down long ago, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind"? To me all these vexed questions of vestments, and postures, and lights, and incense are uninteresting and indifferent. I care not what means a man adopts if he does thereby bring home glad tidings to the poor: whether it be Salvation Army lasses with their timbrels and dance, or High Church clergy with banners and crucifix, or any other agency with other means, I care not a whit if the work of God be done.

THE REAL QUESTION AT ISSUE.

Yet there remains a question between us, and one of almost infinite gravity, for it is concerned not with things which appeal to the senses, sight, smell, hearing, but with the relations of the Divine Spirit to the human soul. And our difference on this matter is not with Ritualists only, but with the majority of the clergy of the National Church, and with its formularies sanctioned by Parliament.

SACERDOTAL MAGIC.

And this is the question—Has it pleased God to make certain spiritual gifts dependent on the performance of certain prescribed acts, and for the due performance of these acts to confer office and power upon men set apart thereto by divinely ordained means? It is the essence of magic that it pretends to produce effects beyond the power of natural causes, and by means apparently wholly disproportioned to the assigned end. With all respect, then, I put the question: Is there a veritable Christian magic, and magi whose function it is to deal in it? It is told of Simon Magus that he boasted, "I can make myself invisible to those who would seize me, and visible again when I would be seen. If I will flee, I can pierce mountains and pass through rocks. If I were to cast myself down from a height, I should be borne uninjured to the ground. If I were bound, I could release myself and bind my jailers. If imprisoned, I could make the doors open of themselves. I could make statues live, and trees grow at once out of the earth. I can pass through the fire and not be burned," and so on. Not one whit less wonderful are the claims made by the priest, though they are all in the spiritual order, and not to be proved or disproved by the senses.

Nor is it any use to meet such claims with laughter or scorn. We are dwellers in a world which is not ordered according to our notions of what is becoming or even possible; and our business is to investigate all things with unbiassed mind. To assert that God couldn't or wouldn't do this or that, is to make ourselves judges of the Divine works, when we should be humble students. We are concerned solely with what is, and have nothing to do with what ought to be or what can be.

Moreover, it is well to remember that men whom we all esteem for intelligence and veracity—men like the late Mr. Gladstone to mention only one out of a thousand—have been convinced and earnest upholders of these claims of the clergy to supernatural and exclusive powers.

It is asserted, then, in the Prayer Book, and commonly believed in all Episcopal Churches, that by the pouring on of water and simultaneous pronouncing of the words, "I baptise thee in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost," the babe is cleansed from the stain which he inherits of his parents, and is made a child of God. From among those so baptised certain are set apart by Ordination, and on them is bestowed a special gift of the Holy Ghost conferring grace to do what is beyond all human power: they can by their word effect some secret change in the elements of Holy Communion, so that what was just now bread and wine, and nothing else, becomes in some way the Body and Blood of Christ, and a means of the communication of God to the soul of the receiver: they can forgive the sins of those who are penitent and confessed, so as to supply to some extent what is wanting of perfect contrition for sin, and send the guilt-burdened sinner on his way pardoned: they can make a marriage more than a civil contract or even a solemn promise made in God's sight, and can confer by their action grace upon the parties allied and make the bond which unites them indissoluble: their intervention in the hour of death may, under certain conditions, determine the destiny of the human soul for heaven or hell.

WHAT OF THESE CLAIMS?

Now these claims, are they a delusion or a reality? a mere human pretension or a Divine endowment of some men for the greater benefit of all? I believe that it is the great question of our day, and if I believed in the devil I should say that it was of his contrivance that the attention of men was turned away from it to the eager discussion of trivialities like lights and incense. Even the more serious question of confession is nugatory, until after this greater one is decided; for it is idle to denounce the immoralities of the Confessional and to detail the evil effects of it, while it remains undecided whether or not God has given power to His ministers in His name to forgive sins. If not, then nobody will insist upon confession; and nobody can deny another's right to make a friend and confidant and counsellor of his pastor. But if so, then whatever the moral risks to priest or penitent—and I speak as one who has had many years' experience when I say they have been grossly exaggerated, and that while there are abuses, in the Church of Rome recognised and provided against, the abuse is not a necessary, nor even a general, consequence of the use of confession—but however great the risks may be they must be encountered, trusting that He who gave the power of absolution will give the grace to overcome the temptations which beset its use. We welcome the visits of surgeon or physician, though he asks questions which coming from any other would be indecent, because we believe that he has skill to heal, and we know that he could not exercise his art without investigation. If we believe that the minister of the National Church is gifted of God with divine skill to treat souls—and we must remember that in the act of ordination the Bishop professes to confer this power, laying his hands upon the head of the candidate and saying, "Receive the Holy Ghost for the office and work of a Priest . . . now committed unto thee by the imposition of our hands. Whose sins thou dost forgive, they are forgiven; and whose sins thou dost retain, they are retained," conferring at once authority and discretion—if we believe this, then shall we devoutly kneel at his feet, as kings and sages have done, and seek God's forgiveness through him, and bring up our sons and daughters to do likewise. If we do not believe it, then God forbid that we should so demean ourselves to a fellow man. But this is the whole question, and controversy about the moral influences of the Confessional, and exposure of scandals, is beside the mark. If God has ordained confession, we must needs avail ourselves of it; if He has not done so, nobody will desire to enforce or practise it.

Is it genuine or spurious this alleged Divine commission upon which the whole Ecclesiastical system rests? Is it a gift of Heaven for the help of heavy-laden humanity, or is it a delusion due to the weakness and vanity of our race? How can the question be settled? By appeal to the New Testament? Myself a priest, I had the greatest difficulty to persuade myself that the sacerdotal theory could be reconciled with the teaching of the Christian Scriptures. I am fully convinced now that it cannot be, but—that is my private conviction, and does not make the fact. There are texts which certainly seem to favour the theory, and thousands of learned and honest men discover in the New Testament what I cannot find. There is then no issue this way. Nor if we inquire of Tradition shall we find ourselves on surer ground: I do not think any unprejudiced reader of St. Augustine can doubt that the priesthood was devoutly accepted by the Church of the fourth century. How far back are we to go for the origin of the doctrine? At what epoch did "the presbyters," the elders of the congregation, turn to sacrificing priests? It is a question which may occupy the keenest wits of the ecclesiastical historian. Plain men and women will not find a solution of their doubts by elaborate investigation of the writings of the Greek and Latin Fathers.

We decline, therefore, to be led into discussions, whose only effect can be to prove which of the opposing parties is the better equipped for the wordy fray, and the more skilful in the use of his armoury. But the question remains; here in our very midst are thousands who claim to possess heaven's commission, hundreds of thousands who enthusiastically support that claim. How to test it?

THE YOUNG PRIEST'S DILEMMA.

I knew once a young priest to whom was assigned the honour of preaching in the Cathedral church of his diocese on the "Feast of Corpus Christi"—feast which all lovers of music may remember as associated with the hymn, Lauda Zion, which Thomas Aquinas wrote for the occasion, and Mendelssohn set to music. He set to work to prepare an outline of his sermon. In the first part he would set forth the divine excellencies of the Blessed Sacrament, how in it the very God gave Himself to us, His glory hidden under the veils of bread and wine. This is my body, this is my blood, the Christ had said, and it was reasonable that reason should bow before the Word of God, and accept even what seemed impossible for true because He had said it. Then he would follow on with the difficulty—how comes it that so infinite a gift produces so small an effect? and he would answer that it was through our own fault, because we corresponded so feebly to the Divine influence within, because we gave so poor a welcome to so mighty a guest.

But just then he read somewhere an article by Charles Kingsley, exhorting young clergymen to truthfulness, to say nothing of which they were not fully convinced. He took the exhortation to himself; he was certain that he had nothing to fear from fresh inquiry, for the doctrine of his Church was the Truth of God. So he applied the maxim straightway to the sermon in hand: was his solution of the difficulty truthful? did it explain the facts? By hypothesis the Infinite bestows Himself on His creature; He fails of any marked effect because the creature corresponds so imperfectly. But is Infinite Power insufficient to compensate for the infirmity of the human will? I would love God with all my heart, and make my life His service, only my desire to do so is not strong and fervent: should not His visitation supply for my defect, and make me what I would be, wholly His? The more he thought it over, the more dissatisfied he became; the plan was laid aside, but the lesson was not forgotten. The question haunted him—these sacraments of Might Divine, how comes it that they are so impotent? Catholics are really no better than Protestants; without any genuine sacraments men are as good as fortified by them all; statistics of crime and of immorality, experience of men and women of different faiths, all go to show how little human nature is influenced by the priesthood and its functions. You tell me of the hydraulic press that by its means a pressure is exerted of 50,000 lbs. to the square inch, the effect of turning a tap and letting the water flow; but what if I were to accept your statement, and, watching the effect not once but a thousand times, were to observe that bales were no more compressed by it than by an ordinary hand-screw. Should I not be justified in doubting your word? Ought I not, as a reasonable man, to examine for myself—are these things so? So was this young priest beset by what he called at first "temptations of the devil"—temptations, in truth, of reason too strong to be overborne.

THE TEST OF EXPERIENCE.

Now I venture to say that this method, incidentally suggested to him, is the only safe and the only ready one to test the claims of the priesthood. "By their fruits ye shall know them." By the visible effect we judge the nature and capacity of the invisible cause. There is fierce controversy between the Churches of Rome and England as to the validity of Anglican Orders, and it passes the wit of man to give unhesitating decision on a question involving so many problems historical and theological. But no unprejudiced observer can doubt that the ministers of the English Church are as good and as devout as those of the Church of Rome. I refuse to believe, therefore, that Romanists have the infinite advantage of Divine sacraments which the others lack.

And the same practical and easy test is universally applicable. The poor Quakers have no sacraments at all, they grow up unbaptised, they never come to Communion, they have not even a ministry set apart to the service of religion: on the sacramental theory, they ought to appear the most miserable of Christians, devoid of any but heathen virtues—honour, courage, patriotism, and the like. Deprived of the restraining influences of the ordained channels of grace, and left in their natural sinful state, they might be almost excused if found more than all other men inclined to sin and weak against temptation. But, oh marvel! they are admitted to be—I had almost said, the most Christian of all of us, who claim the Christian name—distinguished above us all for patient endurance of wrong, for love of their fellow-men, for quiet and godly living.

The comparison may be pursued throughout the whole field of observation and always with the same result. Church children are all taught to say—and in schools supported by the nation—that “being by nature born in sin, by baptism they are made children of grace.” So the difference between the baptised girl or boy and the unbaptised is infinite in its kind. One is a child of God, the other left in the sin in which he is born. But do facts lend the slightest support to the theory? Are our unbaptised children (or children not validly baptised, which is the same thing), are they one whit inferior in virtue or piety?

We turn to married people. Some are married with the blessing of the priest, their union “the holy sacrament of matrimony,” are these one whit more loving, faithful, observant of the duties of man and wife than we poor dissenters, who made our vows before a minister—of some of us the marriage not even recognised as valid by the Church, but quite as firm the bond thereof after years of trial as any the Church has knit?

There are ministers of religion, Presbyterian, Independent, Methodist, Unitarian, and the like, who claim no superiority to their fellow-men, except that of a high office, which humbles them the more the more highly they esteem it. And there are priests on whom has been pronounced the solemn benediction, “Receive the Holy Ghost,” and who are credited thereby with grace and power no others of men possess. Are the ministers inferior to the priests in labours, in devotion, in successful work for the redemption of mankind from sin and misery?

A certain proportion of our fellow-countrymen partake from time to time of what they call a “bread of heaven,” a divine nourishment provided by God through the instrumentality of the priesthood for the support and healing of their souls. Others piously disposed and with love and loyalty to the Master whom all own, take occasionally in solemn assembly common bread and wine in memory of him. Are the former incomparably superior in spiritual life to the latter? Is the Dissenting communicant less Christlike than the Roman or Anglican who is partaker of consecrated elements?

BY THEIR FRUITS.

If sacraments are mere signs, the grace of which depends upon the disposition of the receiver—if the priesthood is only a ministry of religion, its authority and sacredness merely a prerogative of a sacred office—then we understand how it comes about that there is so much likeness among good people of all denominations. Quaker, Theist, Nonconformist, Churchman, Catholic, we are all agreed about nine tenths of the things which concern our life on earth—we differ little, if at all, in our conceptions of good and evil, noble and base—we praise and try to practise the same virtues, honesty, kindness, mercy, magnanimity, self-control—we assert the law of God supreme over all other considerations—we confess the two great commandments which the Christ taught us—we admit the high claims of Truth—we all join in the universal confession, “we have done that which we ought not to have done, and we have left undone that which we ought to have done.” Yes, in spite of ourselves, in spite of the bigotry and bitterness and unfairness and ignorance in which we clothe our souls, and by which we would distinguish ourselves from heretical neighbours, we remain very like each other, for better and for worse. Papist and Presbyterian, priest and minister, nun and sick-nurse, they have each their good qualities and their defects, and it is impossible to distinguish a marked superiority on one side or other, when they are placed in similar circumstances and exposed to the same temptations. But how is it possible then to believe that these are in enjoyment of inestimable spiritual privileges which the others are deprived of?

If we were told of a certain town that the drainage was defective, the water supply scanty and impure, the situation unhealthy, the wage low and the people ill-housed and ill-nourished;—if of a neighbouring town the report was that its sanitary conditions were all that could be desired, and that thriving industries provided abundant means, so that even the poorest were in a position of comparative comfort—we should expect to find a corresponding difference in the health of their respective inhabitants. If, on the contrary, it appeared that the death-rate was about the same in both places, fever and consumption was no more prevalent in one than in the other, that the children looked as well and attended school as regularly, and that the adults were as vigorous and long-lived, we should be compelled either to dismiss the reports we had heard as untrue, or to assert that food and air and cleanliness had no effect upon health.

Precisely similar are the cases of a Protestant and Catholic community as respects spiritual pretensions. The one has, we are told, every advantage which the other lacks; heavenly sacraments cleanse it, feed it, support it, heal it, accompany all its folk from the cradle to the grave. Yet they are very much the same as respects life, and no test of spiritual welfare which we can apply will show a superiority corresponding to alleged superior conditions. We have no alternative but to reject this sacramental theory and the priesthood with it. We cannot believe in a prodigious cause of which we can discern no effect at all!

AGAINST SACERDOTALISM STAND FAST.

Therefore we should take our stand and maintain it—not against Ritualism, for what does it matter to us or to any reasonable man about clothes and candles and postures and smoke? Let those who appreciate such things enjoy them—but against Sacerdotalism, the Sacerdotalism of the Established Church and of the Prayer Book. And that not because it is untrue, but because it always has been and must be intolerant. The Church which is constituted of God can admit no rivalry of human societies; the minister who believes himself to hold the commission of heaven cannot brook by his side a rival appointed by a congregation. To admit the moral rights and the spiritual worth of other communities were, according to the sacerdotal hypothesis, to make light of God's ordinances, and to allow human contrivances to be as effective as Divine channels of grace.

We must stand fast for Liberty, Fraternity, Equality: for Liberty from the yoke of men who pretend to wield God's authority over us; for Fraternity between all who are doing good work irrespective of the opinions they hold; for Equality of all laity and clergy as before heaven, to which all have the same access, access interrupted only by their own fault.

FORCES AGAINST US.

But the battle is an unequal one, and it cannot be denied that latterly it has been going against us. We have to contend against an ancient tradition, which we must ourselves respect were it only that it was universally accepted by our own forefathers: it is no less than impiety to treat with hate and scorn dogmas and distinctions which to them were the staff of life. We have a more formidable difficulty to meet in the self-love which is common to all men; for this allies itself on the side of every kind of privilege and pretension which exalt men above their fellows. We all like to be superior and to be revered and honoured by others; and where there is within a man's easy reach an honour which may be his for the mere claiming, he must be strong-minded and truthful beyond the average who will disown it. Curate and Bishop alike are only men, and as such inevitably lean to that view of their office which augments immeasurably its dignity. To argue with the clergy against the theory of apostolical succession, which represents their body as heirs of divine authority, is like arguing with the House of Lords against hereditary right to govern. There may be reasons good and bad on their side, but the prejudice of self-love is stronger than all reason, and prevails where reason is neither listened to nor understood.

And lastly, there is the natural instinct of reverence, self-prostration, submission, deference, dependence; I know not precisely by what term to designate that feeling which makes men love to recognise and do homage to rank of every kind, base and noble alike. Men enjoy receiving marks of respect; men, and women still more perhaps, enjoy paying those same marks; and so it comes to pass that this strange pretension which men, undistinguished from their fellows by virtue or learning, make to superior station and supernatural endowments is eagerly admitted and enthusiastically defended.

STRENGTH OF REASON.

“Will they swallow us up altogether?” asked a brother minister of me once, as we talked of the progress of Ritualism and how many of our own young folk had been carried away by it. No, not altogether, for we are too tough for digestion. After all, reason is on our side, and in the long run reason gets the best of it, for men are to some extent reasonable animals. In any case our business is to insist continually upon the appeal to the bar of Reason and Experience. What has the Priesthood done for mankind? What evidence does it give in proof of its high pretensions? In what respect is a man the better that he is participator of its good offices? What superiority do the frequenters of sacraments exhibit over persons of like piety who recognise none?

THE PRICE OF LIBERTY.

It is by such tests the Priesthood must be confuted, not by frothy declamation and calumnious accusations. In whatsoever good work priests are engaged we wish them God-speed, we applaud their zeal, we regret that they refuse our co-operation; but to give place to them in the way of subjection? “No, not for an hour!” “The price of liberty is eternal vigilance,” and to us are assigned the outposts of the Protestant camp, where, as ever vigilant sentinels, we should follow each movement of the opposing force, and give loud warning to our fellows when danger is threatened to liberty, within the National Church or without it. To outsiders, indeed, the danger is small, nor do I believe England can ever again be subject to the Roman see, or to any see; but to the great and ancient Church which, as the Church of England, should be dear to us all, the danger is great; and we should stand ready to defend the liberties of the clergy and laity of its communion as we are ready to defend our own. To all our watchword: “Brethren, stand fast in liberty, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage.”

Mr. T. GROSVENOR LEE, on rising to deliver his address, said he hoped, when his presidency ended that he would be able to attend in the capacity of a willing listener on occasions such as that which brought them together. He had hoped to be free from the responsibility of preparing a paper or an address; and he had not come forward on his own impulse. He had simply complied with a very pressing invitation from the Committee which controlled the proceedings and the Conference. Addressing himself, then, to the subject of his argument, he said that the experience of a man who, like himself, had practised as a lawyer for thirty years, was not likely to be identical with that of such a man as Mr. Hargrove, but he believed it would be taken for granted that there had been, throughout the country, a great development of sacerdotalism. It was an admitted fact that sacerdotal practices, such as prayers for the dead, had largely increased. Vestments, candles, incense, genuflections, sisterhoods, guilds, masses for the repose of souls, the confessional and detestable little manuals specially designed to train children in the way they should not go—the use of all these things had greatly extended of late. Mr. Lee then traced the progress of the present struggle against Ritualism, tracing the progress of the controversy in Parliament, and describing the attitude of the Bishops and Archbishops; and then he asked, "What should be the attitude of Nonconformists and Unitarians with regard to this important question?" They might very fairly look on the details of the controversy as childish and degrading to civilised and educated men and women of the nineteenth century. But the real question was that of Clericalism and Sacerdotalism. Was there to be a class of men acting as mediators between God and man, and standing apart from their fellows as successors to the Apostles themselves? Were Unitarians to regard the controversy in the Church of England as a purely domestic quarrel? Were they to stand aside while the two parties to it fought it out, being sure that the result in any case would be the destruction of the Church of England as they had hitherto known it? Their orthodox brethren, the Congregationalists, had not adopted that view, but had expressed their resolve, through their Council, because of their conviction that Sacerdotalism portended national decay, to give their hearty sympathy to that section of the Church of England which was striving to resist the inroads of "the common enemy." What, then, should be their attitude as citizens, Nonconformists, and Unitarians? Should they, as descendants of the Puritans, stand by with folded hands and see the great work of the Reformation undone before their eyes? It would be cowardly to stand aside and enjoy the spectacle of two parties fighting it out. They might be certain of what Priestley, Madge, Crosskey, Dale and Spurgeon would have done. They, the Unitarians, should do something, or, at any rate, say something to help the party in the Church which was opposing those practices, which, whether legal or not, were plainly opposed to the spirit of the Prayer Book. In this matter they had on their side the great majority of the English people, and all the Welsh and Scottish.

While, however, he was prepared to help the Low Church party in the Established Church, he would go farther in search of a remedy. It was permissible to remind the public that the difficulty was greatly enhanced, if not caused, by the fact that these disobedient Romanising priests were seeking to retain public funds while refusing to comply with the conditions on which those funds were given to them by law. The time had come for the discussion of this question on a Unitarian platform. If these priests objected to the conditions imposed on them, they should come out of the Church. The 2,000 ministers, the founders of English Nonconformity, who were ejected from their livings in 1662 because they would not consent to everything laid down in the Prayer Book, did not differ from their conforming brethren on points anything like so important as did the modern Romanising priests. Yet, those early priests were excluded, while the modern Romanisers expected to be allowed to retain their comfortable benefices. The present position was the natural inevitable result of the extraordinary compromise which resulted in the foundation of the Church of England. That compromise may have had its advantages, but they were now reaping the natural result of attempting to exercise Parliamentary control on religious opinions on which the Established Church was based.

Disregarding for the moment the possibility of compromise, there were but two acceptable ideals. One was that comprehensive Church which was the dream of Baxter, and had been the dream of many excellent men far more deeply imbued with the spirit of religion than he (the speaker). Dean Stanley and Dr. Martineau were two distinguished names out of a great many who had dreamed this dream. Would not the present condition of the Church, however, have rudely awakened them from such dreams? If a Church was to be comprehensive it must not be only in matters of detail, but in breadth of doctrine. The tests applied to the clergy would have to be modified, and ministers would have only to be of good moral character, and up to a sufficiently high standard of education. A large proportion of the clergy of this comprehensive Church would probably develop into Unitarians or something very like Unitarians, while others would adopt Sacerdotalism, and a more elaborate ritual. Personally, he would be willing that the only tests applied to a clergyman of the new comprehensive Church should be those of good character and sufficient education, but such a Church would be impossible as long as the laity possessed ideals of truth in religious thought. The tithes in one parish would be used for the support of a clergyman whose opinions would be regarded, in the neighbouring parish, as soul-destroying. Such a Church would be torn by bitter dissensions, and must collapse. It was this fact—namely, the existence of such vast difference of opinion among Christians—which would prevent any lasting success on the part of the Churches which called themselves Christian only. The ideals of a comprehensive Church was a fascinating one, but, so far, only the Church of Rome had made a gigantic attempt at establishing such a Church, but it must be considered to have failed. At first there had been a real attempt to create a comprehensive Church, but later it had been sought to effect this by annihilation of unbelievers. Failing, then, the creation of a comprehensive Church, there remained but one other ideal. He could urge his fellow-members of the Unitarian body to cordially support the policy of Disestablishment and Disendowment. The time was ripe, because fortunately the foolish excesses of the Ritualistic clergy formed most excellent object-lessons for the public, and it was his opinion that the sturdy manhood, and for that matter the sturdy womanhood, of this country did not like these object-lessons. The monstrous system of patronage, whereby a large landowner of indifferent moral character, or no moral character at all, had the right of appointing clergymen to many livings, would have to be abolished. Under the present system, a clergyman who, in his search for truth, came to a conclusion not sanctioned by Parliament was compelled to give up his living, although his congregation agreed with him and wished to retain his services; while, on the other hand, if the religious views or Ritualistic practices of a priest were totally unacceptable to his parishioners, they had no power to terminate his appointment. It was sometimes urged that Disestablishment would involve greater evils than the present system by making clergymen too dependent on their congregations, but the experience of the Irish, Colonial, and American Episcopal Churches scarcely supported that view. It was certainly better that the congregation should have too much control rather than too little, and the caprice of individual congregations could be checked by the ecclesiastical body. He, therefore, advocated the claims of the Liberation Society which had not hitherto received its due meed of support from Unitarians. The Society did not wish to act unfairly towards incumbents at present in office. For example, endowments made since 1688 were not to be interfered with, and cathedral endowments—a most complicated business—they proposed to deal with quite separately. No doubt the Disestablishment of the Church would involve a complete revolution in English rural society, but on the whole he believed it would be a beneficial revolution. In conclusion, Mr. Lee dwelt on the good results that would follow the abolition of the terrible predominance in the community of one sect, and expressed the hope that during the ensuing year Unitarians would heartily throw in their lot with those who advocated Disestablishment.

Dr. HERFORD, in inviting discussion on the addresses, said there was much in the spirit of the first paper, and in Mr. Lee's address too, to be admired, but he doubted if they were very much open to discussion. In his opinion they were not.

Mr. P. W. CLAYDEN, who said he had listened to Mr. Lee's address with great pleasure, said that he had lately been telling some of his friends on the Nonconformist Council that they were entirely wrong in some of the things they had been doing and saying lately. They had said let the two Church parties fight their quarrel out. We go in for Disestablishment. But that was not sufficient. The Sacerdotal party in the Church of England was going in for Disestablishment without Disendowment. The court that had recently been sitting at Lambeth Palace was, as the Archbishop of Canterbury had told Mr. Kensit, not a tribunal, it was a court purposely intended to supersede and replace the courts by law established, and to introduce again into this country that which they had always protested against—namely, Ecclesiastical courts. The only true remedy for the present state of things was Disestablishment, and until that was brought about, they should see to it that the legal courts were not replaced by others having no binding force in ecclesiastical affairs.

The Rev. CYRIL A. GREAVES remarked that if Edward the Sixth had lived but a little longer there would have been no locus standi for the semi-Popish party in the Church.

Mr. JOHN DENDY thanked Mr. HARGROVE for his paper, which was a model of the spirit in which the problem should be approached. He was inclined to think, however, that the less they said on one side or the other the better it would be. He believed in the vast reserve of common sense in the laity of the Church of England, who, when they took the matter in hand, would settle it perhaps more speedily than his hearers would imagine possible. This strong common sense would at last prevail. In the Church of England there were enthusiastic fanatic extremists; there were those who advocated the rowdiness of a John Kensit; but there were also vast numbers of steady, straight-thinking men who would eventually turn to the Romanising priests and say "Drop it." And when they had said it, and he thought there were signs that they would say it soon, the Romanisers would "drop it." If, however, there was one thing above all others to prevent these men adopting such a course, it was to give them ground for believing that the present controversy was to be utilised as the occasion for a great Nonconformist campaign against the Church they loved. These men resented much that was going on, but the result of their interference might be to do more harm than good, if the crisis was to be made the foundation of a platform campaign against the Church.

Dr. BROOKE HERFORD reminded Mr. Dendy that his hostile criticism of Mr. John Kensit's methods was about two centuries late. It was Jenny Geddes who had begun. He recalled the story of a lady who had a railway gate slammed in her face. She saw the train she had wanted to catch steam out of the station, and wept. A gentleman standing next to her used very strong language, and the lady said: "Thank you very much, indeed, sir; I couldn't say it myself."

The Rev. H. RAWLINGS expressed his entire agreement with Mr. Dendy's comments. He considered that in discussing the subject, principles rather than men and minute details should be considered. He, however, maintained that the present was one of the most splendid opportunities that had ever been presented in the history of their body for making their principles perfectly clear. They should, therefore, watch the movement, and make the most of the opportunities it afforded them.

Mr. THOMAS HUDSON considered, in settling the dispute, a disturbing element would be found in the Evangelical clergy, as it would be a matter of great difficulty to persuade them to leave the Established Church.

The Rev. LESLIE SMITH said that young people did not leave their Association for nothing. Unitarians must show that their religion was fully capable of satisfying all the needs of human nature. The priestly class stood not only as a means of reconciliation between man and God, but as the custodian of truth, to point out to them the grounds for their true apprehension of God. It was in human nature and in the Spirit of God that they had to find the means of sure and certain grace. In that great battle with Sacerdotalism, it was necessary to be true to their grand faith, and to carry from those meetings to their special spheres of labour, renewed determination to carry out with enthusiasm the work they were called upon to perform.

The Rev. J. HOCART, as one intimately associated with Catholic communities, commented in strong terms against the degenerative effects of the confessional.

Mr. BIPIN CHANDRA PAL, of the Brahmo Somaj (Calcutta), said that since his arrival in England, eight months ago, he had followed this agitation with the greatest interest. He had been struck, however, by the remarkable absence of religious feeling and predominance of Parliamentary and political intriguing in the movement. India was grossly sacerdotal and ceremonial, but they knew that these had their proper place in the divine economy. If they worked against it, they must rely on the divine simplicity of the Unitarian ideal, and they could not accept an infallible authority demanding an infallible interpreter.

The Rev. J. FREESTON said that he wished to see the connection between Church and State broken.

Mr. HARGROVE, in replying, said that he thought the discussion had wandered a great deal from his subject. The whole question resolved itself into this: if the claims of the priesthood were true, then they had to submit to them, and if they were not, then they had to stand up against them and do their best to expose them. He believed that the claims were not true, and that their duty was to fight them.

Mr. GROSVEFOR LEE, in his reply, said that Mr. Dendy had said that the laity of the Church of England might be trusted, and that when these resolved to take the matter in hand all would be well. He (the speaker) thought that if they would act they should certainly have the first hearing, as they had the most to do with the controversy, but he must say that they seemed very slow in making a beginning. Mr. Dendy had said that the matter should be dealt with with the greatest delicacy and reserve. He thought that in a matter involving such dangerous issues, which might, for instance, result in mothers and daughters succumbing to the influence of the confessional, delicacy and reserve could not be practised. He believed in the old Spanish proverb, that "Cats that go rattling must not wear gloves." Lastly, Mr. Dendy had said they should not rush in precipitately. The Liberation Society had been founded exactly fifty-five years ago, and he was sure that Unitarians could not be accused of rashness, if they now adopted some of those principles which the Liberation Society had advocated for more than half a century.

The meeting then terminated.

In the evening the meetings were concluded by a conversazione at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, Prince's Hall, Piccadilly, when the President and Mrs. Brooke Herford received the members of the Association and a large number of other friends.

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION SOCIETY.

THE annual meeting of the subscribers and friends was held at the Mission House on Thursday evening, May 18. In the absence of the President, Sir John T. Brunner, M.P., who was detained in London, the chair was taken by Mr. WALTER HOLLAND.

The report of the Committee notes a much improved state of trade in the district during the past winter; speaks with gratification of the success of the recent Conference, and mentions the services of the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones and also of the choir under the leadership of Mr. Frederick Robinson at the meetings during the Conference; it also asks for renewed support of a personal character from the subscribers.

The Treasurer's accounts showed an increase in the debit balance from £167 at the commencement of the year to £264 at its close.

THE CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, read a telegram from Sir John T. Brunner announcing a donation of £100 towards the funds, together with a similar donation from himself. In an interesting address, Mr. Holland alluded to the question of education, and said that knowledge might be a panacea, but it could hardly endow the people at large with qualities which had been found wanting in some of the wisest of mankind. He deprecated too great reliance upon education as the one thing necessary.

The Rev. W. J. JUPP seconded. He felt himself sometimes weighed down by the immensity of the problem which confronted them in their large centres of population. Faster than we can rescue or redeem the present state of things seems to be contributing to the continuance of the evils we deplore. One great need seemed to be to lessen the evils of overcrowding.

Rev. Dr. L. DE BEAUMONT KLEIN moved a resolution of sympathy with the missionaries. He said that we were very ready to congratulate most men on what they had done for themselves, or their manfulness in bearing their own burdens; but in this case we congratulated men on what they had done for others, and how they had borne the burdens of others, which made all the difference. He had the greatest admiration for men who could carry on this work with undiminished enthusiasm, as did Mr. Lloyd Jones and Mr. Anderton. He then proceeded to enlarge upon the Chairman's allusion to the education question, and said that we should insist upon the difference being recognised between instruction and education.

Mr. CHAS. W. JONES seconded, and alluded to one of the papers read at the recent Conference. He said he believed that there were no new methods of missionary work, and that if Dr. Tuckerman were standing in that room to-day he would say, "This is what I intended."

Miss H. JOHNSON supported, and pleaded in a very earnest manner for some more careful attention to the plea in successive missionaries' reports for more thorough dealing with the evils of alcoholism.

The missionaries, the Revs. T. LLOYD JONES and J. ANDERTON, briefly replied. The new committee, with Mr. Walter Holland as president and treasurer, and Mr. Harold Coventry as secretary, was elected on the motion of Alderman Bowring, seconded by Mr. Richard D. Holt.

Great regret was expressed at the absence, through illness, of the Rev. R. A. Armstrong.

Cordial votes of thanks to Sir John T. Brunner and the Chairman closed the proceedings.

MILITARISM.

THE sermon by the Rev. Joseph May, of Philadelphia, on "Militarism, the Enemy of Civilisation," a part of which we have already reproduced, contained also towards its conclusion, the following passage:—

I remarked how, in civilised lands, we have repressed and nearly extirpated all recourse to violence between individuals in their disputes. Orderly adjudication of these is now a fixed fact—it is one of the great triumphs of civilisation. We must press for the establishment of international courts, with the confident assurance that when they are provided, the disposition to resort to force for the settlement of international disputes will speedily abate. I cherish an ardent hope both that such courts will be established and that they will serve rapidly to curtail the influence of the war-spirit, the practice of warfare and the extension of militarism. Nations will be ashamed to confess that they dare not entrust their causes of dispute to such adjudication. The verdicts of such courts will become the sufficient corrective and assuagement of the false pride which now impels them to refuse justice lest concession should imply weakness. If the populations become, as I think they must become, restive under the awful cost of militarism, the popular demand will require that appeals should be to the courts and not to the senseless ordeal of battles.

What could be more irrational for the settlement of a dispute, than that two nations should choose masses of the most precious thing they have—their young manhood—and hurl them against each other, like so much timber or metal, till the mere physical issue should incline this way or that! A profound immorality underlies the whole method. Might cannot make right. If force is ever to be invoked to maintain right, it can only rightly be used when all just moral methods have been exhausted.

It was a nobly prophetic word, uttered by one of our preachers very lately—"There is no such thing as a right of conquest. Mere conquest confers no right whatsoever."

The strength and security of nations rest in their allegiance to the truth, to every highest ideal and law which they discover. This, which is the teaching of religion, is equally the verdict of history. The progress of civilisation has actually consisted in the gradual ascendancy in communities of the unselfish virtues. Its key-note is the third Beatitude. Let us open our eyes, and, seeing the danger to which our nation is now perilously exposed, use all our influence to bar the extension among us of the war-spirit, and to resist the system of militarism.

Yield to the Lord, with simple heart,
All that thou hast and all thou art!
Renounce all strength but strength divine,
And Peace shall be forever thine!

LITERATURE.

THE LAST LINK.*

THE lost link has been found, and is now put before us as the Last Link connecting Man with a long line of predecessors. This at least is the confident teaching of Professor Haeckel, of Jena, whose address at the Fourth International Congress of Zoology is now republished. In approaching the consideration of the descent of man, and of the different stages of his animal pedigree, he says truly, "It is now generally admitted that this problem is the most important of all biological questions. Huxley was right when, in 1863, he called it the question of questions for mankind." In the lectures referred to, Huxley showed that the structural differences which separate man from the gorilla and the chimpanzee are not so great as those which separate the gorilla from the lower apes. In fact, it is very difficult to show why man should not be classed with the large apes in the same zoological family. We all know a man from an ape; but it is quite another thing to find differences which are absolute and not of degree only. For example, very few men can move their ears as apes do; but we all retain by inheritance the remnants of muscles which were intended to serve that purpose. This is but a single instance of the surviving rudiments, which connect man's body with lower forms, and which exist to the number of several scores. During the forty years which have elapsed since Darwin's first publication of his theories, the general problems have been much discussed; and in spite of divergencies of view, nearly all writers agree that the natural development of man cannot be separated from the fact of general transmutationism.

Professor Haeckel has been led to the conclusion that all the Lemures, Simiæ and Homines (lemurs, monkeys and men) descend from one common ancestral form—from a hypothetical "Archeprimas." This creature becomes the lost link, though that term might also be applied to any creature between Archeprimas and Man. Haeckel thinks that Man's descent has been through a line of Catarrhine ancestors (Eastern monkeys—which differ from those of America). The next question is whether fossil bones confirm the descent of man from ape-like creatures? In Haeckel's opinion they do, though skeletons are rarely preserved, and only found by good luck. We have, however, a growing number of positive facts, the most interesting and most important being the celebrated fossil Pithecanthropus erectus, discovered in Java in 1894 by Dr. Eugène Dubois. Unfortunately the remains are scanty: only the skull-cap, a femur, and two teeth. Yet they seem sufficient, by their marked characters, to indicate an intermediate form. When they were exhibited at the International Zoological Congress at Leyden, out of twelve experts present three held that they belonged to a low race of man, three declared them to be remains of a man-like ape of great size, and the rest maintained that they belonged to an intermediate form, a true link. This conclusion was assailed by the illustrious pathologist Rudolf Virchow; but his arguments were overthrown. He urged, for example, that certain growths on the thigh indicated recovery from an injury, under careful hospital treatment; and thereupon Professor Marsh exhibited a number of thigh-bones of wild monkeys which showed similar growths and healing. From further evidence, Haeckel feels justified in saying that the pedigree of the Primates (lemurs, monkeys, and men) from the oldest Eocene Lemures upward to man, is now so well known, and its principal features so firmly fixed within the Tertiary age, that there is no missing link whatever. Beyond that, our ancestry is harder to trace; and we shall not follow our author in his bold attempt. Concerning the birthplace of the human race, he considers that man—known with certainty to have existed as an implement using creature in the last Glacial period—originated probably somewhere in Southern Asia. In any case, "all modern researches have confirmed the views of Lamarck, Darwin, and Huxley," and "the direct descent of man from some extinct ape-like form is now beyond doubt."

What then? Why, "the immense significance of this positive knowledge of the origin of man from some Primate does not require to be enforced; its bearing upon the highest questions of philosophy cannot be exaggerated." This thought is not pursued, but only dropt as a hand-grenade and left to explode as it may. Next to biological theory its most important bearing is on the philosophy of religion. Yet it is really harmless when taken up and examined. We say nothing now of the story of the Fall in Paradise, and the doctrines built upon it, but take up rather the more important question of creation and a Creator. We have all been taught as children to say that God made us, and we teach the same to our own children without misgiving: yet we know very well that children are born of parents, and grow up with a form and nature derived by laws of inheritance. When, therefore, it is shown that the parents of the human race derived their being by birth from creatures who preceded them on the stage of life, we are in the same position as before. The doctrine of Evolution has not introduced a new difficulty. It is the notion of some persons that a new-born child may be said to have God for its maker if the first parents of the race were created by fiat, and not otherwise. They are consequently afraid of the doctrine that the human race was born naturally, and not created directly from the dust. Yet the mind that can rest in the thought of a creation six thousand years ago, and a process of birth from that day to this, ought to find equal satisfaction in the thought of an earlier creation, containing the seed of the later. Of course, that way ad infinitum lies. It may be well, therefore, to open the mind to another view of things, which does not seem to place the Creator in the dim and distant past, nor compel us to think of creation as clock-work alone. The other view recognises God in Nature, perceives His active Spirit in the energy of Nature, His will in accomplished things, His purpose in converging tendencies. The causes which seem to be parents of the effects, have had their productive power infused into them; and the direction taken by the results is not of their own choosing, but is guided and determined. Nothing is adequately explained by being traced back to its physical cause, nor to be accounted for without reference to Mind. The Divine Spirit is behind all things now; God is working in what is "natural," and without Him nothing would be as it is. All is natural, and yet everything is miraculous. Thus it was in the past, thus it is now, and ever will be.

So we may continue to speak of God as our Creator, though we have our birth and parentage registered in the fly-leaf of the Family Bible; and we may still say that God created man, though Genesis and Biology give different accounts of the process. GEO. ST. CLAIRE.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE PROPHET AND THE VIOLET.

(Adapted from Lowell's "A Parable.")

IN a town a long way from here there once lived a good man whom the people called a prophet. Although he had many things to make him happy, he came to be very sad and weary of life. He had been trying for years to make the people lead better lives, and to get them to worship God, and nothing but failure seemed to be his lot; the town instead of growing better appeared to get worse and worse, until the prophet came to believe that God had left it altogether. The more he thought it over the more he felt sure it was true—God had gone away.

He heard of a holy mountain many miles from the town, upon the top of which God dwelt; and so sure did he feel that God's presence had gone from his own people and land, that he determined to set out for this distant hill and there hear what God would have to say to him. On the morning on which he was to start his little girl, who had been up very early playing in the woods, came to him to say good-bye, and slipped into his hand a little flower—a violet—that she had picked. His heart was so heavy, and he was so anxious to be on his journey, that he scarcely noticed what she had given him, and before he had gone many miles he let it fall from his hand to wither and die on the dusty road.

After many weary days, tired and footsore he found himself close to the holy mountain. Its sides were rugged and steep, and very soon, as he mounted up, he found nothing but rock all around. On he climbed with his feet and hands scratched and torn, but his heart full of great hopes. At last the top was reached—the spot, so he believed, where God showed Himself to those who believed in Him. Flinging himself down on the hard rock he prayed that God would come and speak to him in some wondrous way, giving him some great "sign" by which he might know that He was really there. For a long time he waited, expecting every minute to feel the mountain shake beneath him, listening for some voice of thunder to come rolling through the skies, ready to see some mighty flame leaping up from the mountain's top; but never a sound broke the stillness of the evening air, and the prophet's heart sank within him as he began to fear his search was all in vain. Then he chanced to look at a little tuft of moss beside his hand, and he saw it open, and out of the hard rock there sprang—a violet.

Something spoke within his heart and told him that that little flower was God's message to him; it was exactly like the violet his little girl had given him before he left his home, and it told him that God was present there, in that land of unthoughtful people, just as much as upon what men called the sacred hill; the flowers grew close to his own door, but the prophet had forgotten them; they spoke every day of the love of the great Creator and His goodness in all the beauty of the world, but he had been too busy thinking of other things, and when he wanted a sign from God forgot the wonderful things by which he was always surrounded.

Back to the town went the prophet, having learned that God never leaves His earth, but is always speaking to those who are willing to hear His words. And you may be sure that after that he was wiser and more hopeful and patient in his work among the people. He learnt to see that God was not only in the flowers at his very door, but in the homes of the common people; and so the prophet was better able to help them to be good, and to teach them the wonderful things of God.

This little story should help you to understand what people mean when they say God speaks to us in Nature. Every flower is a "word" from God.

ARTHUR HARVIE.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From the Journal of John Woolman.

Now as I had experienced the love of God, through Jesus Christ, to redeem me from many pollutions, and to be a succour to me through a sea of conflicts, with which no person was fully acquainted, and as my heart was often enlarged in this heavenly principle, I felt a tender compassion for the youth who remained entangled in snares like those which had entangled me. This love and tenderness increased, and my mind was strongly engaged for the good of my fellow-creatures. I went to meetings in an awful frame of mind, and endeavoured to be inwardly acquainted with the language of the true Shepherd.

One day, being under a strong exercise of spirit, I stood up and said some words in a meeting; but not keeping close to the Divine opening, I said more than was required of me. Being soon sensible of my error, I was afflicted in mind some weeks, without any light or comfort, even to that degree that I could not take satisfaction in anything. I remembered God, and was troubled, and in the depth of my distress He had pity on me, and sent the Comforter. I then felt forgiveness for my offence; my mind became calm and quiet, and I was truly thankful to my gracious Redeemer for his mercies.

About six weeks after this, feeling the spring of Divine love opened, and a concern to speak, I said a few words in a meeting, in which I found peace. Being thus humbled and disciplined under the cross, my understanding became more strengthened to distinguish the pure Spirit which inwardly moves upon the heart, and which taught me to wait in silence sometimes many weeks together, until I felt that rise which prepares the creature to stand like a trumpet, through which the Lord speaks to his flock.

From an inward purifying, and steadfast abiding under it, springs a lively operative desire for the good of others. All the faithful are not called to the public ministry; but whoever are, are called to minister of that which they have tasted and handled spiritually. The outward modes of worship are various; but whenever any are true ministers of Jesus Christ, it is from the operation of his Spirit upon their hearts, first purifying them, and thus giving them a just sense of the conditions of others. This truth was early fixed in my mind, and I was taught to watch the pure opening, and to take heed lest, while I was standing to speak, my own will should get uppermost, and cause me to utter words from worldly wisdom, and depart from the channel of the true gospel ministry.

When he was thirty-six, in 1756, Woolman began to write the journal from the first chapter of which the above passage is taken. He died at York, in 1773, while on a visit to this country, and Yorkshire Friends bore this testimony to his character:—

"He was a man endued with a large natural capacity, and being obedient to the manifestations of Divine grace, having in patience and humility endured many deep baptisms, he became thereby sanctified and fitted for the Lord's work, and was truly serviceable in his Church. Dwelling in awful fear and watchfulness, he was careful in his public appearances to feel the putting forth of the Divine Hand, so that the spring of the gospel ministry often flowed through him with great sweetness and purity, as a refreshing stream to the weary travellers towards the city of God."

Where Woolman speaks of the operative Spirit of Christ giving to ministers the true insight and the word to speak, we should understand the Spirit of the Eternal, moving in those who have learnt with Jesus the humbleness, self-surrender and love of the children of God. But such difference of theological interpretation cannot keep us from close fellowship with this true disciple of the Master.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Aberdare: Highland-place.—On Sunday last the anniversary meetings were held, the services being conducted by Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal, of Manchester College, whose eloquent and forcible sermons, delivered with rare vigour, made a deep impression upon those who were privileged to listen to him. There were an unusual number of orthodox friends present at the various meetings. The attendance was good, especially at the evening meeting, and the collections were up to the average at these services.

Dundee.—A social meeting was held in the school-room, on Wednesday week, to inaugurate the opening of the new rooms recently erected. The Rev. H. Williamson presided, and was supported by the Rev. D. B. Cameron, B.A., minister of Rosebank Parish Church, and ex-Bailie Macdonald, a respected elder of St. Peter's Free Church, Dundee. Both gentlemen, who are colleagues of Mr. Williamson on the School Board, spoke in warm appreciation of the efforts put forth by Mr. Williamson in the cause of education in Dundee, more especially on behalf of working girls and the children of poor people. Mr. Cameron also complimented the congregation on having got their premises so well equipped and furnished for the carrying on of all kinds of work connected with a Christian congregation. He wished Mr. Williamson all success in his work, and said that after all the difference between himself and the Unitarians was small, and that the points of agreement outnumbered in importance the points of disagreement, and that instead of keeping aloof from each other they ought to unite in all Christian work and endeavour. Handsome presentations were then made to Mr. Alex. McGibbons, who had acted as church officer for a number of years, and Mrs. McGibbon, on their retirement from office. Tea was then served, and the rest of the evening was pleasantly spent. The donation from the McQuaker Trustees not being sufficient to meet the expenses of the improvements and alterations, a subscription list has been started by the congregation in order to finally wipe off the debt thus incurred.

Halifax.—The S.S. anniversary sermons were preached at Northgate-end Chapel on Sunday, May 14, morning and evening, by the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, of Gateacre, and the afternoon address was given by Mr. John Dendy, of Manchester. There was special singing by the choir and scholars under the direction of Mr. A. Wilson. There were good congregations all day, and the collection was £26 14s. 6d. On Whit-Sunday the prizes for attendance and good conduct were presented by Mr. J. Sayar, one of the chapel-wardens; (the prizes consisted of thirty-five copies of the Revised Version of the Bible. The school treat was held on Whit-Tuesday, but rain compelled the Committee to abandon the ride to the field at Hipperholme, so the younger children had a ride round the outskirts of the town, and coffee and buns were served at the school.

Horsham.—The 126th Whit-Sunday anniversary of the Free Christian Church was held on Sunday last, when, as usual, friends from neighbouring churches met to exchange greetings, and by their presence to strengthen the hands of the local workers. The Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Leigh, was the preacher of the day, and took for his morning subject, "The Need of our Work." The evening sermon was a ringing trumpet call—"I have fought the good fight of Faith"—not soon to be forgotten by those who listened. The improved appearance of the chapel, by its recent renovations, and by the addition of the memorial window just completed, was a subject of general congratulation, and formed one of the topics of the afternoon meeting, which was opened by the Rev. J. J. Marten, who paid a high tribute to those whose names were inscribed upon it, one of whom, Mr. J. Kensett, had been present at the Whit-Sunday anniversary 67 out of the 68 years of his life. Mr. Dolphin spoke of Mr. Nash as one whose genial presence made it always good to be in his company, and who, if the times in which he had lived had required such sacrifice, would have cheerfully gone to the stake in defence of his principles. Mr. Edwin Ellis testified how much of the good work of the Horsham congregation had been due to the initiative of Mr. Price, and to his faithfulness in standing to his post. Mr. Burgess gave interesting reminiscences of various congregations with which he had been connected; Mr. Tarring deprecated too loose a hold on the good things of the past, and the Rev. E. M. L. Buckland drew a glowing picture of the future. The collections for the day, amounting to about £5, were for the British and Foreign and Provincial Assembly.

London: Bermondsey.—On Sunday, May 14, the annual Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held, conducted by the Rev. H. Rylett. The church was prettily decorated with wild and cultivated flowers, and, as usual, several friends in the country sent hampers of flowers. Collections were taken on behalf of the Sunday-school, and a substantial addition was made to the school funds. At the close of the evening service the flowers were distributed amongst the Sunday-school scholars present. The Sunday-school excursion has been arranged for Chislehurst, on Saturday, June 24, when a large attendance of friends is expected, as by the kindness of the railway company the train stops specially at Spa-road Station on both the outward and return journeys.

Manchester.—Last Sunday the usual Whit-Sunday Scholars' Festival was held in the Free Trade Hall, when about 4,000 scholars and friends assembled together to take part in a service conducted by the Rev. J. J. Wright. Mr. Oliver H. Heys acted as conductor, and Mr. Edwin T. Heys presided at the organ. The singing was excellent, and a larger number of scholars were on the platform than in previous years. The anthems were effectively rendered, being well within the capacity of a scratch choir gathered from the various schools.

Newchurch.—On Sunday, May 21, the anniversary services of the Bethlehem Unitarian Sunday-school were held. Large congregations gathered at both services to listen to the Rev. J. E. Manning, of Sheffield. Special hymns and anthems were rendered by the choir and scholars. The collections realised £62 2s. 8d., being a little in excess of previous years.

Padstow.—On Whit-Sunday the Old Nazareth Chapel was reopened, after being for twenty years unused for regular services. It is in a poor quarter of the town, and it is hoped that it may prove a useful centre for Mission work. Many of the older generation of Unitarians were there to hear the Rev. Adam Rushton, who was minister of the Chapel forty years ago. An old scholar, the Rev. Joseph Anderson, of Mill-street Mission, Liverpool, was also present, and gave a stirring address especially to the younger members present. The chapel was crowded, and a collection of nearly £10 showed the keen interest felt in the occasion.

Sheffield Upper Chapel.—The annual outing of the children of the Sunday-school took place on Whit-Monday, though the heavy rain, which had fallen, prevented any visit to the fields. The morning was spent in a long country drive in drays and waggons, kindly lent for the purpose, and after an early tea in the Channing Hall, the evening was spent in games. There were about 200 scholars present.

Sheffield: Upperthorpe.—The anniversary sermons were preached on Sunday week by the Rev. E. Cedric Jones, of Bradford. Special hymns and anthem were sung by the scholars of the Sunday-school, admirably trained by Mr. W. R. Stevenson. Last Sunday the Rev. John Ellis gave his customary address to parents and teachers, when the children repeated their festival hymns. Highest commendations of the music, and the conduct of the children, were passed. On Whit-Monday morning the children assembled at the schoolroom, Addy-street, formed into procession, and made a short tour of the neighbourhood, singing at the houses of some of the older friends of the church. Owing to the rain, the intended programme of an afternoon in the open air had to be abandoned, so tea was served in the schoolroom, and an impromptu entertainment of games indulged in.

DEPTFORD CHAPEL, Church Street.

FOUNDED 1600.

AN URGENT APPEAL FOR £250.
 £104 STILL REQUIRED.

It is absolutely compulsory that the roof of the above Chapel be entirely and immediately reconstructed. The Vestries adjoining the building are also beyond repair, and it is proposed to replace these by erecting an Iron room which would afford much needed accommodation for Sunday-school and other purposes.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Provincial Assembly of London and South-Eastern Counties, and the General Baptist Assembly, have made grants in response to this Appeal.

Donations or promises will be thankfully received by the Treasurer to the Fund, G. W. CHITTY, Esq., Mildura, Park Avenue, Dover; or by the Minister, the Rev. A. J. MARCHANT, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E., by whom they will be acknowledged.

MATTHEW HENRY'S CHAPEL, CHESTER.

BI-CENTENARY RESTORATION.

The Congregation, desirous to render the old Chapel (foundation-stone laid September, 1699) seemly for the Public Worship of God, caused an exhaustive examination to be made by Messrs. T. M. Lockwood (F.R.I.B.A.) and Sons, who report—and their opinion is independently borne out by the City Surveyor—that, in addition to the other urgent needs of the Chapel Fabric, the Roof is "positively dangerous." They are consequently in the position either of setting up a New Roof, or of having NO CHAPEL at all. The estimated expenditure for all NECESSARY repairs, &c., amounts to over £700. Even if we could build a new Chapel, £400 must be spent on a new roof for the old one, if the historic building is to remain in existence.

£285 has already been promised, including £50 kindly granted by the B. and F.U.A.; and as some sign of growing life in the congregation, it may be noted that NEW MEMBERS have contributed over ONE-FOURTH of the total sum promised by the resident lay members of the congregation.

JUBILEE

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY, 1900.

An Appeal to Unitarians to assist in raising at least £12,000 for the support and spread of Liberal Christianity in the Metropolitan Area.

We look forward to the year 1900 with peculiar interest, as it will mark the beginning of another great epoch in human history, with possibilities which no one can measure. Already several religious organisations are devising ways and means of celebrating this event by raising special funds for the extension of their work. In view of the decay of old faiths and the growth of materialism, the friends of liberal and progressive Christianity should also bestir themselves; for man needs the wisdom, love, and strength of true religion to help him to live his life worthily and well in the sight of God and of his fellows. The sin, sorrow, and suffering of the world can only be removed and alleviated, and the highest and purest happiness can only be secured, by the abiding influences of pure and heart-felt religion.

Thankful for the noble services rendered on behalf of truth and freedom by our forefathers in the past, conscious of the call to faithful service which the present demands of us, it is surely fitting that we Unitarians should mark our gratitude and prove our earnestness and sincerity in some practical and helpful way.

Conferences and Committees have met and discussed how best to do this; and it has been decided to raise the sum of not less than £12,000 during the year 1900. The London District Unitarian Society, which will then be fifty years old, has done and is doing splendid work for the cause of truth, freedom, and fellowship in religion. It has opened ten new churches during the last twenty years. It would like to do a great deal more. Compared with other denominations, we London Unitarians are doing very little for the religious needs of the vast and increasing city in which we live. There are many important districts within or just outside the metropolitan area, with populations far exceeding large provincial towns, where the Unitarian movement is without a representative or a home. There are fields of thought and life ready waiting for us, if only the men and the money were forthcoming. The congregations at Forest Gate, Kilburn, Plumstead, and Wood Green, worship in halls or schoolrooms; the land stands vacant at the side, awaiting the future churches; at Lewisham the congregation has only the lease of a building, for which a heavy rent is paid; the congregation at Kentish Town is hampered by the payment of an annual ground rent. It is time that something large and generous was done to remedy these defects, and to put our work in London on a sound financial basis, and thus give our whole movement a strong forward push.

The plan suggested is a two-fold one,—by Donations and by a Bazaar. Let all good Unitarians of every age, class and condition, deny themselves something and subscribe to the Special Fund. And we hope, too, all will work for the Bazaar, to be held in 1900. This central Bazaar will bring us all together, and will arouse interest, and kindle enthusiasm in our work. It will give our young people something to work for; they will gladly, we feel sure, work together for one common object. It will do us good to combine, east and west, north and south, rich and poor, young and old,—all in one united effort to help forward the cause of religion.

We mean to raise the whole sum by the month of May, 1900; so we must begin at once. Will you help in one, or if possible, in both of these ways? (i.) Send a promise of a Donation to the Treasurer, to be paid in one sum or by instalments; and persuade some of your friends to do the same. (ii.) Begin some piece of work yourself, and help in organising a little circle of fellow-workers at your church or home.

At the Bazaar there will be no raffling, and no spirituous liquors sold,

Do you ask, "What is to be done with the money when obtained?" Our reply is that it will be expended with thoughtful, judicious care, in the following ways:—

(1.) A portion of the Fund, not exceeding one-third of the net amount raised, shall be devoted to paying off debts or charges on, or purchasing the freehold of, some of our chapels and halls in or near London. The particular congregations to receive this assistance, and the amount of the assistance to be given to each such congregation, shall be settled by the Committee of the London District Unitarian Society, regard being had to the efforts made by each congregation to help itself.

(2.) The remainder of the Fund, not less than two-thirds of the whole, will be formed into a Permanent Chapel-Building Fund, for granting loans towards the purchase of sites and the erection of buildings with OPEN TRUSTS. This Fund shall be vested in a body of twelve Trustees, who shall be nominated in the first instance by the Council of Ministers and Delegates and the Subscribers to the Special Fund. The Trustees shall have a voice in the selection of the site, and shall themselves decide what amount they will advance towards the cost of its purchase and of the erection of the building.

(3.) The sum so advanced shall be a charge on the land and building, and shall be repaid in such manner and subject to such conditions as the Trustees shall in each case deem proper. The Trustees in their discretion may remit payment of interest. The income of such portion of the Fund as is not out on loan, and the interest on any loans, shall either be paid to the Treasurer of the London District Unitarian Society, or added to the capital of the Fund, as the Trustees may in each case determine.

This is a special opportunity for a vigorous and united effort; and we appeal to you personally, and solicit your sympathy and generous support in making this united effort a success. It will be a great encouragement to us if you will respond quickly and give liberally. We are, faithfully yours,

JOHN T. BRUNNER, President.

A YEAR OF SUNDAY LESSONS.

Based on the Two Great Commandments,
Love to God and Love to Man.

Compiled by MARIAN PRITCHARD.

Reprinted from "The Helper," 1899.

This series is intended to supply a kind of Treasure Store of suggestive lessons. For those parents and teachers who wish to have some sequence in their lessons throughout the whole year, the opportunity is here afforded them of following out a course with system and method; but at the same time, the divisions are so arranged that a course of four to twelve lessons may be easily selected, or even a single one separated from the rest.

The STORY of DOROTHEA LYNDE DIX.

By FRANCES E. COOKE.

Price 1s. net; postage, 2d.

The New Age says: "Miss Frances E. Cooke is a well-known writer of short biographies, and she has just added to the list a delightful story of the life and work of 'Dorothea Dix.'" The story of the noble devotion and self-sacrifice of this brave, beautiful soul is told in a way that cannot fail to do anyone good who reads it. The magnificent work done for the poor and friendless lunatics by Dorothea Dix places her in the front rank of the world's latter-day saints. We cordially commend this admirably printed little book to all who love courage and care for goodness. It is full of the Christ-spirit."

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE meetings of the Peace Conference at The Hague are proceeding without haste, and in a manner worthy of the great cause to which they are devoted. They are naturally watched with the keenest interest by the friends of humanity throughout the world. The feeling is growing that whatever may be done or not done in the matter of disarmament and the further humanising of the incidents of warfare, something definite will be accomplished towards the establishment of a Permanent Court of Arbitration. Great Britain, America, and Russia have each laid proposals to this end before the Conference, and it is confidently hoped that a practicable scheme will be the result.

DR. JOHN WATSON (Ian Maclaren) preached again in Sefton Park Presbyterian Church, Liverpool, on Sunday last, on his return from a three months' lecturing tour in America. His subject in the morning was "The Secular Spirit and the larger Christian Church of to-day," and, in the course of his remarks on various recent movements in this country, he referred with satisfaction to the attitude his congregation had taken up with regard to seven-day papers. "One could not be in America," he said, "without understanding what an unmitigated curse the Sunday Press was to the people, although there might be here and there a paper of nobler tone than the others. One defended Sunday not upon the ground of the Fourth Commandment, or upon the custom of the earlier Christians, but upon the broader ground, indicated in the question whether a man had not only a body, but also a soul." The resolution of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on this subject was passed on the very day on which the Daily Telegraph announced the withdrawal of its Sunday issue. But while the two immediate causes of offence were thus happily removed, the resolution was a declaration of principle, good to be passed as it stood.

THE union of the United Presbyterian Church and the Free Church of Scotland seems to be now assured. The Assemblies of both Churches have agreed by overwhelming majorities to the principle of union, and it is hoped that the end, so long looked for, will be attained in 1901. The Established (Presbyterian) Church of Scotland will then stand side by side with one great Free Church, instead of two. As to what the union means, an Edinburgh correspondent of the Daily Chronicle wrote as follows :—

The union means a great deal to Scotland. It means a great United Voluntary Presbyterian Church, with a membership of about 600,000, and a total yearly revenue of nearly £1,200,000. It means a great saving of men and money in theological halls and in general organisation. It means one strong congregation in many localities where now there are two feeble, struggling, debt-burdened bodies. It means stronger and more united effort in the mission field abroad and in the crusade against intemperance and indifference and heathendom in the city slums and rural districts at home. Lastly, it means a stronger and more united influence in political and social problems. Judging the future by the past, a Free and United Presbyterian Church of Scotland is certain to be on the side of Scottish Liberalism.

At a meeting of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, on May 24, a motion was accepted by 111 votes to 58, ordering the appointment of a committee "to consider the power possessed by the General Assembly to modify the terms of subscription and adherence of ministers to the formula, and to report to the next Assembly." The Very Rev. Principal Story, in supporting the motion, said (as reported in the Glasgow Herald) that it would be generally admitted that the mind of the Church towards the Confession of Faith, and therefore necessarily towards the formula which required the adherence of her clergy to the Confession, was very different to what it was 200 years ago. The existence of the Confession of Faith bound upon the shoulders of the clergy by a strict bond which the Church refused to meddle with, or questioned the propriety of altering, had become a burden heavier than many of them could bear. To maintain that they must always be bound down to the seventeenth-century formula or dogma was to deny in the most explicit way the Church's belief in the great promise of the Lord—"My spirit shall lead you into all truth." There was a living spirit in the Church, and if there was, the thought of the Church must grow, the belief of the Church must ripen and expand. Bonds of union there must be in all Christian fellowship, but the form should be as undogmatic as possible, and the bonds of adherence as light as they could be made. In the interest of the progress of spiritual life in the Church, he felt this to be a pressing question, and that the case for inquiry had been made out.

LAST week's New Age printed some notes of a remarkable sermon by Canon Cheyne, preached from the pulpit of Rochester Cathedral. The attitude of a devout critic towards the Bible at the present time was well stated in the following passage :—

The Bible is a book like any other book, and has its deeps and shallows. It is not altogether unique; it is one of a class of books of mysterious origin which has grown—not been made, books which express the highest genius of the people and contain great diversities and incongruities. Parts can be understood by all, but parts need study. We dare not say all parts of the Bible are equally fine, and even those parts that are most important are irradiated with a light not their own when considered as necessary links in a chain of progressive evolution. Happy is the student of the Homeric poems, which became the Greek Bible, or any of the great Scriptures of the non-Christian or non-Jewish world, but happier still the man who, accepting the guidance of the students of our Scriptures, can realise the most valuable, accepting the wheat and rejecting the husk. For those too old to change or too busy to think—is there no counsel for them? There is. The counsel is not less needed by them than by their more thoughtful and studious brethren. The words and acts of Jesus, interpreted by the spirit of Jesus, are the jewel which this strangely-wrought casket of the Bible enshrines. There may be words and acts which criticism does not allow to be ascribed to Jesus. This will harm no one when interpreted by the spirit of Jesus. A faithful study of the Gospels in a devout but thoroughly undogmatic spirit is the best way to make ourselves good Churchmen. It will not make us either Catholic or Protestant in the old sense of these words, but it will do something far better—it will make us Christians.

At a recent session of the London Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends, the subject of Worship and Ministry was discussed. Mr. Edward Grubb pointed out the need for improvement in the quality of ministry, not only in spiritual power, but in grasp of truth and in adaptation to the needs of the day. The source of all true ministry was nearness to the Spirit of God, but there was need of religious instruction, to develop the human material out of which the Spirit of God could bring forth enlightened and effective ministry. He trusted that friends would get rid of unworthy fears of the modern methods of studying the Bible, and throw themselves heartily into such means of religious education as were being afforded by their summer schools. Mr. W. E. Turner said that silence was not the aim, but only the basis of meetings. Prophecy was not the only gift; they had too much neglected that of teaching. The mind was given to be used for God. Mr. William Tallack, on the other hand, thought more of the dangers of culture than of its importance. Over-development of intellect led to Unitarianism. Later in the discussion, which we find reported in the British Friend, another Friend urged that they need not be afraid of beauty, and culture, if it were "the beauty of the Lord our God." They had power to discriminate between what was of "the creature" and what was informed by the Spirit. Behind cultured and uncultured ministry lay the same Divine power which alone could make either effective.

A DESCRIPTIVE sketch, with illustrations, of the new church built in Sefton Park by the congregation of Renshaw-street Chapel, appeared in the Liverpool Daily Post of Monday last, an historical sketch of the congregation having been given on the previous Saturday. The new church, which is to be opened on Sunday, June 18, is to accommodate 440 worshippers, and is built in the style of the earlier decorated period. The architects are Messrs. Thomas Worthington and Son. A further description we shall hope to give at the time of the opening.

"THE Second Church" in Boston, which was founded in 1649, has many interesting historical associations, noted in an illustrated supplement to the Christian Register of April 20. The Ancient Chapel of Toxteth in Liverpool has a special interest in this church, for its first minister, the Rev. Richard Mather, as a sturdy Puritan, silenced by the Archbishop of York, went out to New England in 1635, and his eldest son, Samuel, was for a few months the first minister of that second church, while another more famous son, Increase, afterwards ministered there for sixty-two years. Then followed the still more famous Cotton Mather, the son of Increase, who died in 1728. Later, on the roll of ministers, came Henry Ware, jr., and Emerson (1829-32). For forty years, after Emerson's retirement, Chandler Robbins held the pulpit. The present minister, the Rev. T. Van Ness succeeded the Rev. E. A. Horton in 1893. The 250th anniversary of the founding of the church falls in November of the present year, and the congregation are preparing for a fitting celebration.

THE May number of the Pacific Unitarian contains more than one note bearing witness to the cordial reception the Rev. Stopford Wentworth Brooke has received as minister of the First Unitarian Church of San Francisco. Among the "Notes from the Field," under the heading of this church, is the following:—

"The month has passed pleasantly. Rev. Mr. Brooke is fully sustaining the good impression he made at first, and gaining in his hold upon people of varied tastes. He is no mild lecturer; he preaches,—and we like it. His sermon on Job was a good instance of the manner in which he takes one large thought and enforces it in a way that leaves it as a distinct conception—never to be forgotten. At the close of his excellent sermon, on April 17, he prefaced the final words with: 'As California's great poet has said.' There was a moment of wonder, not unmixed with apprehension. Could this stranger have discovered our great poet, or did he share the English appreciation of Joaquin Miller? But the faith of the faithful was justified when he went on:—

Forenoon, and afternoon, and night—Forenoon,
And afternoon, and night—
Forenoon, and—what!
The empty song repeats itself. No more?
Yea, that is Life: make this forenoon sublime,
This afternoon a psalm, this night a prayer,
And Time is conquered, and thy crown is won.
He knew and loved Sill, and another bond was wound."

THOMAS HOOD was born on May 23, 1799, and Messrs. Macmillan and Co. have marked the centenary by the issue of two volumes of his Poems, edited by Canon Ainger. Of his own religion Hood wrote the following lines:—

Well!—be the graceless lineaments confessed!
I do enjoy this bounteous beauteous earth!
And dote upon a jest
"Within the limits of becoming mirth";—
No solemn sanctimonious face I pull,
Nor think I'm pious when I'm only bilious—
Nor study in my sanctum supercilious
To frame a Sabbath Bill or forge a Bull.
I pray for grace—repent each sinful act—
Peruse, but underneath the rose, my Bible;
And love my neighbour far too well, in fact,
To call and twit him with a godly tract
That's turn'd by application to a libel.
My heart ferments not with the bigot's leaven,
All creeds I view with toleration thorough,
And have a horror of regarding heaven
As any body's rotten borough.

THREE of the papers read at the Liverpool Conference of Domestic Mission Workers on "Old and New Methods of Work," "The Relations of Domestic Missions to Charity Organisation and other Kindred Agencies," and "The Drink Curse, and how to deal with it," by the Rev. W. J. Clarke, Mr. Richard Robinson, and the Rev. J. C. Street, respectively, have now been reprinted and issued in pamphlet form, to be had for a penny from the Liverpool Booksellers' Company, 70, Lord-street, or from Mr. Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C.

THE function or end of the religious man is to be a minister or vehicle of the divine purposes: and so the function or office of religion is to qualify man for this work. To perform it he must have a nature more or less open to God, and stand, so to speak, in a relation of reciprocity with Him. The worst atheism is that which reduces all God's action in the world to interference or miracle. The supernaturalism which limits His grace and truth to a single Church, however universal it may claim to be, profanely expels Him from nature and humanity.—A. M. Fairbairn.

THE GOSPEL OF THE ATONEMENT.

SIR,—Mr. Wicksteed's letter criticising some sentences of my recent article on the Gospel of the Atonement calls for a few words of reply. His remarks on Gregory of Nyssa are to a certain extent a necessary correction of my statement, which, however, with certain reservations, I still hold to be true. The theory of the Atonement to which Mr. Wicksteed refers is certainly to be found in Gregory of Nyssa and others of the Greek Fathers, especially in Origen, who ought to have the credit of introducing it into orthodox theology. But I greatly doubt whether it was held by them as a "legally binding formula." With Origen it probably betrays the influence of Gnosticism and of crude popular mythology. It has no proper relation to his real thought; and is of the nature of an obiter dictum in theology. For Origen, Athanasius, and Gregory of Nyssa—to use only three representative names—the interest in the Incarnation is centred in the identification of the divine with the human, in the striking phrase of Athanasius, "God became man that we might become gods." Their thought is best described as a form of Christian pantheism. "There is," says Harnack, of Gregory of Nyssa, "a real relationship between him and the pantheistic monophysites, the Areopagite, Scotus Erigena, and even the modern "liberal" theology of the Hegelian type may appeal to him for support." (Dogmengeschichte, Bd. II., s. 167.) When we turn to the West we find that the atonement as a transaction between man and God, legally necessary to re-establish a lost relationship, is no longer an addendum but of the very essence of Christian theology. Cyprian's "satisfacere deo" has no analogue in the East, but for centuries it is expressive of a fundamental Western idea. I must not further elaborate this point, but it is worth noticing that the conception that the sacrifice was made by Christ's human nature, as that alone could be satisfaction for human sin, is necessary to Latin legalism, but impossible to the much more spiritual Greek theory that the whole of human nature was taken up into the divine by the Incarnation. We are in presence of two contrary schools of thought, to only one of which is a transactional theory of the atonement at all congenial.

In regard to Anselm, I fully agree with Mr. Wicksteed that he represents a great ethical advance. But I believe, none the less, that the ethics of the "Cur Deus Homo" are still in bondage to Roman jurisprudence. Will not Mr. Wicksteed admit that Anselm uses debitum in a legal as well as in an ethical sense? "Tene igitur certissime, quia sine satisfactione, id est, sine debiti solutione spontanea nec Deus potest peccatum impunitum dimittere, nec peccator ad beatitudinem vel talem, qualem habebat antequam peccavit, pervenire" (Cur Deus Homo, Lib. I., cap. 19). In a passage like this, and others that might be cited, we are in presence of "a disturbed moral order that needs re-harmonising," but it is a moral order which is still subject to legal categories. WM. H. DRUMMOND

THE religion of some sectarians consists in a definite notion of an infinite subject.—Sir A. Helps.

"THE TEMPERANCE PROBLEM AND SOCIAL REFORM."*

THOSE who complain that Temperance is too often advocated in language which is without temperance may safely read the book which bears the above title. There is not a single harsh phrase in it—not a word which even the most sensitive brewer or publican could condemn as discourteous or too personal. Yet he would be a strange person who should find it cold or dull on that account. For the authors are in earnest about their subject, and it loses nothing of gravity in their hands. Only they rely upon the weight of facts rather than the fire of declamation; and, whenever possible, they let official documents, responsible statesmen, and acknowledged experts speak for them in well-selected quotations. The very sobriety of the book should give it a special influence. It summarises in a lucid and striking way a mass of evidence which has been collected with great industry and care. Its most characteristic feature is cumulative force.

But the chief value of the book consists in its constructiveness. The lack of this element has hitherto been a cause of weakness in a large amount of Temperance advocacy. Earnestness has too often been accompanied by narrowness of view; legal restriction has been a too exclusive and too immediate aim; and many keenly sympathetic friends of Temperance have been unable to show enthusiasm for a policy so limited. Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell's book should help to unite the forces thus scattered. This is a result which they themselves hope for.

"Union," they say, "is essential to success, and the help of all possible allies must be secured. This proposition may seem elementary and self-evident, but it is one that has hitherto had little place in the counsels of the Temperance party. To give only one illustration. It has been shown that the agencies which make for Temperance must be both restrictive and constructive. These agencies often appeal to different orders of mind. Broadly, the restrictive agencies appeal most strongly to those who are occupied with direct Temperance work; while the constructive agencies hold the first place with those who are concerned with the wider aspects of society as a whole, the general conditions of city life, the wretchedness of the highly-rented room, and the dreariness of existence to multitudes of workers. Both classes of agencies are essential to success, but hitherto the representatives of the two schools have failed to unite. Now it requires no special gift of reasonableness for those who value the restrictive agencies to agree among themselves, nor for those who value the constructive agencies to agree among themselves. But what is now wanted is the wider outlook, the statesmanship quick to discern the full strength of the forces which may be marshalled on the side of Temperance, and the practical sagacity to bring about a working union. A just appeal may be made to both bodies of reformers to unite for a common end. To those who place their confidence in restrictive agencies it may be pointed out that even if these were enacted to an extent beyond anything that appears probable in the near future, there must still remain a great volume of trade outside the reach of these restrictions. This will be especially the case in large towns, where the trade, if carried on as at present, will continue to be disastrous to the public weal. A scheme of policy which makes no allowance for this covers only a portion of the ground, and obviously needs to be supplemented. Those, on the other hand, who attach little value to restrictive agencies may be reminded that public opinion has rejected the theory of free licensing, that some restriction is universally held to be necessary, that the sphere of wise restriction cannot be determined by a priori considerations, but must be arrived at by experience, and that definite results will be reached the most quickly by giving large liberty to the localities to carry out experiments" (p. xi.).

This admirable passage has been quoted in full, because it displays the method and spirit of the whole book. Now for a brief account of its contents.

Under the heading "The Statement of the Problem," the first chapter gives a large amount of information as to the quantity, the cost, and the effect of the drink consumed in the United Kingdom. It is appalling to read that the amount expended on alcoholic liquor in 1898 "represents an average expenditure of £3 16s. 10½d. for each man, woman, and child in the Kingdom, or £19 4s. 4½d. for each family of five persons" (p. 8), and that an approximate calculation of the amount spent by the working-classes alone shows an average expenditure of £16 13s. 4d., or 6s. 5d. per week for every family. The results of some special inquiries made by the authors are recorded on p. 15 ff. Here are two details: out of 9,613 working men of 43 different trades, 535 were found to spend between 10s. and 15s. per week on drink, and 167 over 15s. What texts! But our authors do not indulge their feelings—they are scrupulously business-like. The greater part of the chapter is occupied with a statement of the economic results of this enormous expenditure. Perhaps this statement might have been shortened with advantage, in order to make room for a fuller and more direct treatment of the moral aspects of the problem. Of course, however, these come under notice, since every moral weakness has its economic effect. And in this commercial age that is the point most likely to arrest attention. Everybody feels the force of it.

The second chapter draws attention to "The Social and Political Menace" of the trade. The enormous power of the organisations of brewers and their allies is well illustrated, and quotations from their journals show that the use of this power in elections is being governed, not by the general interests of the country or of local areas, but by trade interests alone. The authors have done well to give prominence to this evil. In the third chapter, the discussion of remedies is commenced with a thorough examination of Prohibition. The results of the application of this method in America are carefully analysed, the conclusion being that it has been fairly successful in the rural districts, but not in the towns. The detailed evidence is full of instruction, but cannot be even summarised here. Next, the effects of "State Monopoly and High Licence," where these remedies have been tried, are brought under scrutiny, and, in spite of a certain amount of good fruit, they are pronounced unsatisfactory. Chapter five discusses "The Company System in Sweden and Norway," and here the authors find themselves on what they believe to be the most hopeful track. They have made a searching investigation into the Scandinavian experiments, and, while thinking them (especially the Norwegian) the most successful that have yet been tried, they suggest various improvements. Their treatment of the subject is of great interest and importance. It must suffice here to quote their own summary of their proposals—namely:—

1.—"That localities shall organise and control the traffic (either directly or through a company as in Norway) under the direct supervision of the central government, and only within certain clearly defined statutory limits.

2.—"That the whole of the profits shall, in the first instance, be handed over to a central State Authority.

3.—"That the sole benefit which a locality shall receive from the profits of the traffic shall be an annual grant from the State Authority for the establishment and maintenance of recreative centres, the primary object of which shall be to counteract the influence of the drink traffic. Such grant to be a fixed sum in ratio to population, and not in ratio to profits earned.

4.—"That similar grants shall be made to prohibition areas, all inducement to continue the traffic for the sake of the grants being thus effectually destroyed.

5.—"That where the municipal councils adopt the system and elect to control the traffic, they shall, as in the case of the present technical education committees, invite the active co-operation of a fixed number of influential citizens, other than members of the Council, in the work of local management.

6.—"Finally, the right of prohibiting the traffic is placed within the power of every locality" (p. 421).

The student of the subject will at once see that we have here a valuable constructive scheme, which differs in many respects from anything yet proposed and which deserves the fullest consideration. The authors maintain that it obviates the objections raised against Scandinavian methods by Temperance reformers, amongst others, in England. And they have made out a strong case. It is to be hoped that this new effort will bring more unity into the ranks and expedite the long-delayed legislation.

One point, however, is inadequately treated in the book—namely, the Compensation question. A short-time notice is the plan approved by the authors, and precedents are duly quoted. But here lies the chief obstacle to reform. As we are told in the Preface: "In making proposals for Temperance legislation, it would be foolish to ignore the enormous strength of the liquor trade, the magnitude of its vested interests, and the degree in which these interests permeate British society" (p. x.). Would it not have been worth while, then, in what is practically a handbook of the Temperance question in its social and political aspects, to commend with ample reasons any proffered solution of the knottiest of its difficulties? Probably the attitude of the Temperance party upon this point alienates more sympathisers than anything else. The book makes no serious attempt to grapple with their objections.

IMPRESSIONS OF THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

I.

AN echo? Mr. Editor. Very well!

"We sit down with inexpressible pleasure to describe the anniversary, holden according to custom on the Wednesday in Whit-week. We wish we could convey an adequate idea of the meeting to our readers! It will be long, very long, remembered, and serve, as long as it is remembered, as a stimulus to the zeal of many. Though now mere reporters of the proceedings of the day, we must be indulged if we be seized with some of that enthusiasm which we honestly confess transported us with joy whilst engaged in them."

It is an echo from ninety years ago. Your post-card found me reading the Rev. R. Aspland's glowing account of the third annual meeting of the Unitarian Fund in 1809, wherein he rejoices over a "respectable" congregation, to hear the sermon, a "satisfactory collection at the doors, flourishing finances, valuable missionary work done up and down the country and in Scotland and Wales by the Rev. R. Wright and others, the determination to erect a place of worship at Soham, and an increased attendance at the annual dinner from 150 of last year to 190 persons—"a company larger than ever assembled, even in the Metropolis, on such an occasion, as avowed Unitarians, and the sight of which infused spirit and joy into everyone present.

I cannot help wondering what the zealous Secretary of 1809 would say to the Secretary of 1899, if he had been privileged to stand on the site of Lindsey's chapel—"the venerable Lindsey," as they toasted him in those days—during four days, so crowded with meetings, to hear of a society whose tentacles are felt all over the world, with a missionary in India and correspondents in Australia, which grants over £2,000 to congregational and mission work, and distributes 1,695 books and 103,000 tracts. What would have been his enthusiasm to hear of the determination to raise £12,000 in and around London; and I fail even to imagine the spirit and joy which the sight of 900 people at the conversazione would have infused into him.

In those days some were already tolling the bell over the grave of Presbyterianism, as there are some who lament the Unitarian demise to-day. Is it not strange? And though I could not quite accept Mr. J. C. Street's enthusiastic statement that the progress of Unitarianism has been more rapid than was Christianity itself during the same early period of its existence, yet surely only the blindest eyes can deny the progress. That was a striking parallel, however, suggesting not only encouragement, but also reflections on our apostolic zeal. Do we care for our cause, and are we as ready to sacrifice and to work for it, as the first Christian missionaries were for theirs? Do we deserve to spread as rapidly as early Christianity did?

The anniversary sub-committee is to be congratulated on the success of the lecture. It is noteworthy how important a feature the Essex Hall Lecture is becoming. But I prayed that Parliament would speedily pass that law against organ-grinders. It is also to be congratulated on the success of the Annual Business Meeting, as newly arranged. But ought not Mr. Blatchford's stirring appeal to have come beside Mr. Dendy's earnest address, and the Sunday-school Association meeting have been fixed at such a time and in such a manner as would have prevented that plentiful lack of Sunday-school teachers and young people at what used to be one of the brightest and best of the gatherings? "Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way"—that led to the breakfast, even though our friends from the North had to turn aside homewards before we reached it. But let me not grumble. We had a plentiful and varied feast during the week—a feast of reason and a flow of sociability—and I have no doubt the meetings will be long remembered as a stimulus to the zeal of many.

According to promise, Mr. Editor, I have pleasure in sending the following lines relative to the recent meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. At the outset let me express, on my own behalf and that of the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians, my cordial thanks for the kindness of the reception extended to me, as well as for the hospitality given during the meetings. The above Association, which honoured me in appointing me its delegate, was founded sixty-four years ago, and as the resolution of the primary meeting, which was held in Strand-street Meeting House, Dublin, on July 29, 1835, may be of some interest to your readers at the present time I give it here. The said resolution was moved by the Rev. Dr. Armstrong, and seconded by the Rev. Dr. Montgomery, and reads as follows:—"That whereas the Synod of Munster, the Presbytery of Antrim, and the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster are perfectly unanimous in acknowledging allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ as the only King and Head of the Church, and, in the maintenance of the great principles of the Reformation—viz., the sufficiency of the Scripture, the right of private judgment, and the rejection of human authority in matters of faith—they do agree to unite under the denomination of 'The Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians.'"

The proceedings of Tuesday, when we had Mr. Dendy's and Mr. Wicksteed's addresses, both very fine in their way, were most helpful and pleasing. The large congregation that assembled the following day in Essex Church had the right note struck for it when the Rev. Dendy Agate emphasised Christ as the quickener of life; and the tribute which Mr. Agate paid to Channing and Thom was richly deserved. The luncheon to the delegates in the Holborn Restaurant was a happy thought on the part of the hospitable promoters, who, no doubt, have the great satisfaction of knowing that it was not only admirably carried out, but greatly appreciated. Then what could have been better than the addresses by Rev. Dr. Herford, Rev. C. J. Street, Dr. Blake Odgers, and Rev. A. N. Blatchford in the evening of this day? On Thursday Rev. Charles Hargrove, and Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee worthily opened the proceedings by most interesting papers on the Ritualistic question. The ministers meeting in the afternoon was full of hope and cheer; and the conversazione, when the President and Mrs. Herford received the guests in the Royal Institute of Water Colours, was a brilliant function, and could not easily have been surpassed. And the Temperance meeting on Friday evening, over which the Earl of Carlisle presided with his usual dignity, and at which Mrs. Ormiston Chant delivered an able and touching address, brought to a close the series of meetings so well arranged by those in charge; and no doubt the labour so cheerfully given to make the meetings successful will be rewarded by the knowledge that new life and courage have, through them, been communicated to many souls.

III.

I gladly comply with your wish in giving a brief impression of the annual meetings, although the impression as yet has not had time to crystallise. But still the impression is deep, and of a nature calculated to do me good.

It was my first visit, and during the previous week I had been imagining the nature of the meetings. I had but little Unitarian data to work upon—the experiences of a few members of my church. The other part of the data was my experiences of the annual orthodox gatherings of Welsh Nonconformists. Having worked my way out of the labyrinth of puritanical orthodoxy to the daylight of Unitarianism, I had hoped that the meetings would bear a resemblance to the glorious truths which I had seen and felt when I finally decided to cross the Rubicon.

So I left Swansea Tuesday morning in a state of suspense, fearing that the Conference would be a tiny gathering, and that the able ministers and laymen I had read so much about, would leave without my having the privilege of speaking a word to them. But it turned out otherwise. I knew of the cordial welcome of one—Mr. Bowie. I can never forget him—how, when I went to London to tell him the story of my heart, he took me by the hand, and when I longed to throw away the superstition which had been clinging to my nature as a parasitical plant, eating up its vitality, he pointed out to me the path of peace. That path I have found, and it has coloured my whole life anew.

The attendances at the gatherings took me by surprise. Had I not heard from my boyhood of the "dying sect," and was not I born and brought up not far from the "black spot" of Cardiganshire, where the Unitarians have flourished for nearly 200 years.

The gatherings testified to me most clearly the revival of the denomination—a revival in which I saw the outcome of the highest and best in the development of the day.

Also I had been wondering how the business part of the meetings would be transacted. I had asked myself, have they, as a denomination, lost their idea of unity in their strong individuality? And how glad I was to see that it was not so.

It is true that the leaders did not over-dwell on trivialities and legal technicalities. How could they when men like Dr. Herford and Dr. Odgers took a leading part in the conduct of business. The whole level of viewing things—of leaving out the trivial and unessential to private judgment, struck me as differing much from the mode of conducting the affairs of the annual gatherings of some other denominations.

Here I felt were men who had studied and understood the trend of things, who felt that there are more pressing questions touching the modern world than the question whether a minister ought to be satisfied or not with his sixpence a wedding. I felt that the speakers went to the root of the matter in all the meetings. This note touched me deeply, for I felt that the denomination was lifting itself up above the level of the clique, trivialism and pence. This seemed to be a proof that the meetings were attacking the reality of things.

Another impression which pleased me much was the part the ladies took in the work of the Association. The ability displayed in their speeches, the method which they adopted in their procedure, brought to my mind a fact which I had not fully realised before—what an enormous influence for good they can exercise in our churches.

Lives of ability and energy such as are shown by Miss Pritchard, Miss Taggart and others point out clearly that there are possibilities in store with the women of our churches, which will have to be taken more notice of in the future than in the past.

In regard to the addresses I felt a difference to what I had ever experienced before. Here I found men speaking real things—things which were not in conflict with any modern scientific and philosophical developments—men who welcomed the light from all quarters, and who stood on ground which they had made their own. The note struck by Mr. Wicksteed of enjoying present truth and of continuing in the pursuit struck me forcibly. I saw that here were men who had not given up their “faith”; but I also saw that what, through effort, had been gained by them was in accord with this faith.

I instinctively felt that the speakers lived in a universe of thought which they had made their own, and that true religion meant moving upward from an already solid foundation—the climbing from a lower rock to a higher one. And finally the feeling of brotherhood was new to me. I spoke to more people and felt more at home during the single evening of the conversazione than I had at any previous gathering during the past ten years. Every face in that great gathering seemed so expressive, intelligent, and happy, and so I witnessed a thing which I had never previously witnessed in any large religious gathering—the possibility of being natural and religious at the same time. It did me good. And the readiness of all to extend a welcome to strangers like myself and Mr. Pal—two men brought together to Unitarianism from the extreme points of the compass, and the extreme points of thought—showed me the depth of feeling and the broadness of mind which are possessed by the men and women who take a prominent part in sowing the good seed of liberal religion in our day and generation.

IV.

I do not remember any Whit meetings of recent years that appeared more helpful. It is true no “burning” questions were before us for discussion. Indeed, the arrangements left very little time at the disposal of speakers, who were not previously appointed. The course adopted, however, was certainly justified by the result. It was pleasant to find an earnest tone pervading the company assembled, and that the numbers were fairly maintained throughout the week.

To speak first of the Essex Hall lecture, it was indeed worthy of the occasion. Mr. Wicksteed's study of Dante and his age has enabled him to make a valuable contribution to our material for thought. Happily in its published form it will reach a far wider circle than the audience to whom it was addressed. Whilst those who heard it will be glad to avail themselves of an opportunity of more carefully following the reasoning.

It is certainly very desirable that at our principal gatherings the example set by Professor Carpenter at the Sheffield Conference should be followed, and that some subject of profound importance, philosophically or theologically, should be placed before us, at one of the sessions, not for discussion, but for very careful meditation. The impression left by such lectures as Mr. Carpenter's on “Immortality,” and Mr. Wicksteed's on the “Eternity of God” is not likely to fade speedily.

Mr. Agate's old friends, now living at a distance from him, were especially delighted to hear his voice once more.

The experiment made at the business meeting of the B. and F.U.A., of separating the formal matter from addresses by leading ministers, certainly proved successful. Time spent in lengthening out speeches on routine resolutions is not always appreciated by hearers. Far better get through the necessary work with all reasonable speed, and afford time for such useful addresses as fell from the President and the friends upon whom he called. They gave the key-note for our message at the present time.

At the Sunday-school Business Meeting Mr. Dendy's address was admirable in every way and most timely. No question needed greater emphasis. Teachers should combine with ministers in combating those “qualifications,” which tend to destroy morality. But one could not say much for the proceedings after Mr. Dendy sat down. I imagine more than one present recalled the keen interest and the earnest tone evinced in the gatherings after the old “Breakfasts.”

The question of Sacerdotalism is one with which, alas! we are all too familiar. Mr. Hargrove's Paper was calculated to help our thought during experiences in the present ecclesiastical world. A clear assertion of the essential principle beneath all the disputing of the hour is of immense service. But the effect of all one hears is heightened by the sympathy of others. It is a true refreshment for ministers to become listeners, to hear the voices and grasp the hands of friends known and valued many a year, and to receive kindly welcome into their homes, or to pass a few hours in their society. It does, besides, help those who are isolated to be brought into communion with fellow-believers, and to gain encouragement from their steadfastness.

F. W. STANLEY.

V.

Amongst mere externals what struck me most this Whitsuntide was the predominance of new faces in the audiences and of old ones on the platform. Young men and young women were well in evidence, not only at the conversazione, but at all the meetings throughout the week—a feature as helpful as many of the speeches.

The Essex Hall Lecture, which one newspaper described as “very long, very abstruse, and closely reasoned,” struck a note not often heard in our midst, and will furnish material for many a sermon. Mr. John Dendy was a little bit hard on the pulpit in his earnest address, and seemed to overlook the fact that many ministers are themselves Sunday-school teachers. His words had the ring of the ancient prophets, and certainly deserve the larger audience, which it is to be hoped awaits them.

The business meeting, despite the Sunday-papers' incident, seemed somewhat formal; we much miss those men with grievances who, in years past, so much enlivened these proceedings. Surely the Secretary and others need to take to heart the warning, “Wo unto you when all men speak well of you!” Sermon, service, window, and organ-case at Essex Church were all good and inspiring. Which helped me most I cannot say. There was deep religion evidenced in each. May I be forgiven for saying that after Mr. Hargrove's paper on Thursday all the rest was weariness and vexation of spirit. The conversazione was the brilliant success that it usually has been for a dozen years. The absence of speeches was a marked advantage.

The Temperance meeting on Friday was a worthy conclusion of a very refreshing and stimulating set of meetings. Behind all, and for weeks beforehand, there must have been much earnest thought and careful organisation, and we who go back to somewhat lonely posts, strengthened by contact with fellow-believers and inspired by the words of our leaders, owe very much, I am sure, to men and women of whom we know but little, but who, through all this week, have been “the presence of a good diffused.”

OXFORD SUMMER SESSION.

SIR,—I shall be glad if you will allow me an opportunity of informing Sunday-school teachers desirous of joining the meeting at Oxford that the time for giving in names has been extended until Wednesday, the 7th inst.

Membership tickets will then be forwarded, and Mr. J. H. Woods, 20, Waltonwell-road, Oxford, will be prepared to furnish particulars as to lodgings on application for same, stating requirements, being made to him. Special railway facilities, if granted by the companies, will be made known to the members later on.

I may add that so far as regards numbers the success of this Oxford gathering is already assured.

ION PRITCHARD, Hon. Sec. S.S.A.

WINIFRED HOUSE.

INVALID CHILDREN'S CONVALESCENT NURSING HOME.

THE annual meeting of the subscribers and friends of the Home was held at University Hall, Gordon-square, on Monday, May 29, at which some fifty ladies and gentlemen interested in the work were present.

MR. URBAN PRITCHARD, M.D., F.R.C.S., presided. Letters were read expressing regret at their inability to be present, and containing all good wishes for the work, from the Countess of Aberdeen, vice-president of the Invalid Children's Aid Association, and from Mr. Robert Hampson. Mr. Hampson wrote that it was a great grief to him to be absent from the meeting, for it was the first time since its original work, so well known under the name of Mrs. Hampson's Home, was commenced in 1876, that he had not been able to attend the annual meeting; but that, unfortunately, this year ill-health compelled him to remain at home.

MR. W. M. BLYTH read the financial statement, which was not altogether satisfactory, for it showed that £16 16s. had had to be taken from the sums received on account of the following year, in order to cover the past year's expenditure; and he pleaded earnestly for an increased subscription-list in order to place the Home on a firm financial basis.

MISS MARIAN PRITCHARD then read the annual report. Fifty-eight children had been tended in the Home during the last year, the average number of beds in use being just under 16. Seventeen children (and these were among those whose stay was protracted) had worn some form of surgical instrument, and who therefore needed very special care. The work done during the past year had been most prosperous, and there was no death, and no invasion of epidemic to record. Almost every child had done well, and some wonderfully well; notably, little Maurice, who came at 3½ yrs. old, weighing 17 lbs., and could neither walk or talk. He left after a stay of ten months, having almost doubled his weight, and being able to run about on a sturdy pair of legs, and to chatter most delightfully.

The warm thanks of the Committee were given to the senders of the useful parcels, containing welcome gifts to the wardrobe, the play-cupboard and the house-keeping, and they were glad to say that Mrs. A. T. Young, 121, Ferme Park-road, Crouch End, N., has kindly agreed to continue to take charge of the wardrobe department; so that friends desiring to have information upon the size or kind of garments most needful are requested to write to her.

THE CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, referred to Caroline Winifred Hampson's great love of children, which made this Home such a fitting memorial to her honoured name. He continued: "Speaking now as a hospital surgeon, we had always felt the difficulty of sending our patients out—only to get worse again. But now, in long-continued cases, such as hip or spinal diseases, we are able to send them out of hospital into a home where they will still receive good treatment, and what I may call good 'garden' treatment. For if you have visited Winifred House you will have been struck with the difference between the faces of the children and the nature of their ailments—the children's faces look comparatively robust, and yet, at the same time, you know that they are suffering from some lingering illness, such as tuberculous disease of the spine, &c. Another point to be noted is that where children have to be in 'boxes,' or obliged to wear some form of surgical instrument, constant care is needed in order that they do not cause undue pressure or otherwise produce discomfort or pain. I hear that no less than three children who have come into Winifred House were suffering in this way when admitted, and skilled attendance was required, of course, in each of these cases. I think, therefore, we may be proud of our Home, and look upon its work during the past eight years as a real success. I cannot finish without saying how sorry I am that Mr. Robert Hampson is not able to be here. I seem to miss his presence more and more every moment, and I trust that next time we meet we shall have him with us again."

MR. ARNOLD HAMPSON having seconded the adoption of the report, the resolution was put, and carried unanimously.

The re-election of the officers and the Committee, with the addition of Mrs. Alfred Wilson, was moved by the Rev. W. WOODING, seconded by Mr. TREMAIN, and carried.

MISS MCKEE, M.L.S.B., moved a vote of thanks to the honorary medical officers, to Miss Emma Hope, and to all the workers at Winifred House. After a few words of appreciation, Miss McKee referred to the new Invalid Cripple School in Tavistock-place (The Passmore Edwards' Settlement), where children were fetched daily from their homes and taught. This institution might, she thought, be found useful in the cases of some of the children when they had left Winifred House.

MR. T. PALLISTER YOUNG seconded the resolution, which was carried with acclamation.

Other duties having prevented the medical officers from being present,

MISS MARIAN PRITCHARD responded on behalf of Miss Hope and herself, giving a few anecdotes of some of the children whom they had had with them during the past year. "There was one point," she said, "to which I should like to draw special attention, and that is to the fact that we want more children—boys from 5-10, and girls from 5-12 years old; children who have no special ailment, but who are out of health, and whose constitutions need 'building up' for two or three months. The hospitals, the C.O.S. district officers, and the Invalid Children's Aid Association, send in more applications for 'carrying' children than, unfortunately, we can always take in; but it is to our private friends, to our Sunday-schools and our Missions that we look to provide us with simply delicate children to fill in the extra beds upstairs. At the present time there are no less than twelve children who have to be carried—and now that the 'garden' season has commenced, this is really heavy work. But we have room, besides these, for six or eight 'running about' children, and instead of this number we have only three at present. I shall be very glad if friends will bear this in mind, and send in applications whenever they know of a suitable case, in order that our Home may do all the good of which it is capable."

A few words of thanks to the Chairman terminated the proceedings.

OBITUARY.

ABRAHAM LEE KILBURN.

THE Park-street congregation at Hull has reason to mourn the recent loss of one of its most esteemed members, whose hearty co-operation, in everything pertaining to the welfare of the Church, has ever been ungrudgingly given.

Born in Orthodoxy, his strong individuality and earnest convictions led him to the Old Bowlalley-lane Chapel, and for over thirty years he took an active part in the councils of the Church of his adoption. He was essentially a "strong" man—strong in his convictions, fearless in his avowal of them, never shrinking from an unpopular cause if his conscience approved, and withal of a kindly and affectionate disposition. He was a factor in municipal and political affairs, and took an active part in the establishment of the Saturday Evenings for the People and the Children's Help Society. Under the leadership of the Rev. H. W. Perris, he worked assiduously in the successful effort to relieve the tedium of the dull Sunday afternoon, by founding the pleasant Sunday afternoon movement in this city—since widely copied.

For many years the successful manager of the Hull People's Public House Company, he was held in high esteem by his employers and his fellow-managers throughout the kingdom.

A speaking fact, well within the writer's ken, is the real affection and confidence he inspired in his numerous body of employés.

His mortal remains were interred in the Western Cemetery, on May 20. The Rev. E. W. Lumnis conducted the service, and a large concourse of friends attested by their presence their regard for our lamented friend, and their sympathy for the sorrowing widow and family.

SACERDOTALISM.

You have asked me, Mr. Editor, for some remarks on the discussion which followed my paper read last week at Essex Hall; and, perhaps, as my reply was both hurried, and even such as it was was ill-reported, I shall be justified in intruding again on the attention of your readers, although I feel almost ashamed of the many columns I occupied so lately.

Well, my first remark must be, that, like all discussions I have listened to, it wandered for the most part very far from the subject. The Conference was announced as one "on the claims of Sacerdotalism," but Disestablishment as a protection against those claims was most to the fore. Believing as I do, first, that Disestablishment is at present out of the power of us or any party to bring about, and, secondly, that if ever accomplished it would be to the great reinforcement of the Sacerdotal party in the Church, I could not take any keen interest in the talk about it. I have no complaint to make of my paper being slighted; on the contrary, it was better spoken of than I expected or deserved. But I should have liked a little more genuine criticism. I suppose I was partly myself in fault in not making my own view sufficiently clear and emphatic. To hear a paper read is one thing, and to read it in print another. It may read very well and be easy to follow, but heard for the first time be difficult to take in. I am afraid it is often so with our sermons; what to the preacher is perfectly simple is to the hearer quite unintelligible; of course any sensible man understands his own meaning; to make others understand it, who have not dwelt upon it and thought it out, is harder than he always remembers it to be.

Briefly, my argument was this. Sacerdotalism is a claim made by and on behalf of a certain class of men to supernatural powers. There is no method of testing this claim except by the results following upon the acts by which they profess to exercise these powers. But an honest investigation shows that such results are nil, for those who are supposed to be benefited by these acts are to no discernible extent better than those who ex hypothesi receive no benefit. Therefore I conclude that the powers claimed are imaginary and not real. It is the old test of Hotspur in Shakespeare's "Henry IV."

I can call spirits from the vasty deep is the proud boast of the Welsh chieftain, but it falls before the common-sense of the rough English captain—

Why, so can I, or so can any man;
But will they come when you do call for them?

Any one may claim superior lights or divine commission, but what proof can he afford us that we may venture to believe him and trust to him our salvation.

An able critic in your Unitarian contemporary makes two objections to this argument. First, that if it be true that Sacerdotalism does no good, yet unless its effect is positively injurious there is no reason for quarrelling with it any more than with Ritualism; and if it is intolerant, so too is Evangelicalism. Why should we set ourselves against the one more than the other? My reply is, that if Sacerdotalism is false, as we believe it to be, it is in fact a power so much the more to be dreaded, as its claims are the more extravagant. A triumphant Presbytery were to be feared indeed, for it is rare that men possess power to coerce their fellows and abstain from exercising it; but Puritanism at its worst has never gone to the fierce excesses of sacerdotalism. If the priest is really God's minister, it is for our own good we submit ourselves to his jurisdiction; but if he is not, his power is a despotism, tempered only by the might of our revolt.

I cannot admit that his second objection is of as much worth as the first. The admission of my main contention, he writes, "would not settle the question for a sacramentalist." Assuredly not, nor did I for a moment imagine I was going to dispose by my paper of one of the most ancient and venerable creeds of the world. The reply generally given to all assertions of the virtues of unbelievers is that the devil spares them temptation and even prompts them to good deeds, in order more surely to damn them in the end by pride and unbelief; and, moreover, lead others astray by the lustre of their seeming merits. I am really quite unable to answer such an assertion. I can only judge by what I see; and when I see two men in no respect differing in all outward signs of piety and goodness, I cannot believe that one owes all to the devil, and the other to God. Of course, sacramentalists will not admit the test, for it works only to their inevitable confusion; but their refusal to allow it does not invalidate it. If no distinction is discoverable between two children, in disposition, conduct, relations to God and man, an impartial jury would refuse to believe that one was in reality immeasurably the superior of the other. To say that "Sacerdotalism does not claim to produce sensible changes," if it means changes which can be perceived in conduct, is to my mind a confession that Sacerdotalism is, according to the title of my paper, "A human pretension, and not a Divine reality." "By their fruits ye shall know them" is the test sanctioned by the highest earthly authority, and by it we should judge and claim to be judged.

CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I WENT to see a relative of mine the other day. He has a large garden, which almost makes me envious. Being very fond of gardening, I, of course, accompanied him round it to examine his crops and to take notes of what improvements he had been making. On our rounds we were accompanied by a robin-redbreast, which hopped about our feet and chirped in a very friendly way. It said as plainly as a robin could say, "Find me a worm, please." A tamer robin I never saw. You can easily guess it got what it wanted. How came it to be so tame? you will ask. Well, the gardener is an old man with a very kind heart, and while he is digging in the garden he talks quite familiarly with his feathered friend; and this little robin has learnt to trust him; and certainly it is a pretty picture to see this wee birdie joyously hopping round your feet, expecting you will be equally kind and turn it up a few fresh worms. How tame wild creatures will become if they are treated kindly. I remember once having tea at a cottage in Bolton Woods, and the weather being fine we sat in the open air. A number of chaffinches came round us asking for crumbs, and some of them actually alighted on our table quite fearlessly. We lingered over our tea an unusually long time just to enjoy their company. Their friendliness was no doubt due to kind treatment received from many visitors.

We are all God's creatures, because God is our Father. You and I are brothers and sisters, but God is also the Father of bird and horse, and so, in a certain sense, they, too, are our brothers and sisters, and we are at least bound to treat them mercifully and with the kindest consideration. I am not averse to children going in for natural history, if they will abstain from all cruelty. You can get together a collection of birds' eggs, for instance, without the birds knowing it, if you are satisfied with one specimen, and take it out of the nest with the greatest care. If you collect butterflies and moths, don't torture them, but kill them mercifully with chloroform. Cruelty of any sort will degrade you. If you keep any animals as pets, be kind to them. In my time I have kept most things from a white-mouse to a goat. I have tamed almost everything that runs or flies wild in the woods and fields; but my parents insisted upon my being kind and attentive to anything I might have. Rabbits and hares and birds have been my pets, and I have even brought up a lamb from its being a day old. If I had neglected any of these animals, omitted to feed them or clean their hutches or cages regularly and thoroughly, my father would have immediately opened the doors and allowed them to escape. I always wanted them to love me, to become tame, to follow me about, to come to me without fear, but pretty sure that I should have a fit-bit of some sort for them. Having learned to love pets of your own makes you feel all the more kindly towards all other birds and animals. I am always suspicious of the boy who is wilfully cruel.

Be kind to your pets and never purposely torment them; treat them as companions and friends, and make them as happy as you know how. They will know how to be faithful to you. If you have a bird be careful to give it fresh water and seed regularly, and keep it warm in the winter; it will repay you with its song for all the trouble you take on its behalf. Nothing grieves me more than to know that a poor helpless little bird, once so beautiful and joyous, as God intended it to be, died of starvation and neglect because its owner, a boy or girl, was too selfishly intent upon play to give it the necessary seed and water. Remember never to give unnecessary pain to any creature. Do not join other boys and girls who take off their jackets and hunt the poor yellow butterfly that comes flitting up the street. They knock its gauzy wings to pieces until all its fair beauty is spoilt, and then they throw it away. That is a cruel thing to do. And don't go ruthlessly bird-nesting, taking all the eggs you can find. You big boys who are strong enough, pluck up your courage when you see any other boys being cruel to any poor helpless animal that God has made, and prevent them. Cruel people are always cowards. Be kind always, as real Christians, loving and not hating the creatures God has made; and say a brave and strong word for those poor animals which so many boys and girls seem to think have no feeling. Remember, God is your Father, and cares for all living creatures, and that He wants you to love them and be kind to them all.

FOR THE KINGDOM OF GOD.

WE gather in this week the aftermath of the Whitsuntide meetings. Having fully reported last week the meetings of the greater societies, we now have reports of the Central Postal Mission, the Essex Hall Temperance Association, and of Winifred House, recording work in three directions, in which, although the operations cannot be said to be very extensive, there is yet no littleness, but the nobility of a true ideal, in religious helpfulness, in moral reform, and in practical philanthropy.

The work of the Postal Mission is distinctly that of religious helpfulness of the simplest, most unassuming sort, and for that reason among the most effective and most gracious in its ministry for good that is exercised in our day. To reach anxious and bewildered minds, in the confidence of friendship; to offer new light and guidance, to open a new world of thought and aspiration through the silent messengers of the post, which no distance can balk, such is the privilege enjoyed by many faithful workers in this service. The churches into which Unitarians are gathered may or may not remain few in number, but the fellowship of Unitarians throughout the world, held together by the bonds of earnest sympathy in thousands of scattered homes in many lands, may yet grow to the clear consciousness of a greater unity in the Spirit, in a true brotherhood by reason of their living faith in the Eternal Father, and in common service in quite humble places for the kingdom of God. Postal Mission work shows signs of developing in various ways, in reading circles, in little groups of friends even where no church can be gathered for stated public worship; it will all make, as we trust, for the growth of genuine religious life, in the gladness of a free spirit and the sunlight of the truth of God—not for theological dogmatism, but for the opening of the pathways of faith, the liberating of the heart held in cruel bondage, the strengthening of all that is good and healthful in the lives of the children of God. But whatever new ways of service may be discovered, the first simple method of this mission must always remain ready and effective, quick to respond to every cry for help, most welcome as a bearer of good tidings, bringing the surprises of unexpected sympathy, the delight of growing friendships even between those who may never meet, except through this silent ministry of letters. One likes to think with what affectionate insistence PAUL would have urged the claims of this mission on the generous support of the Churches: "Help these women, for they laboured with me in the gospel."

The Essex Hall Temperance Association stands for one special branch of moral reform, but it may be taken as typical of the effort to be true to the obligations of duty in practical life, without which all our religion must be in vain; and with this zeal of the reformer goes the beneficent activity of compassion and brotherly kindness, of which Winifred House may stand as an emblem. We commend the reports of these two societies to the attention of our readers. The Earl of CARLISLE, as President of the Temperance Association, spoke some wise words, the more forcible for their moderation, while the work done in the Winifred House Nursing Home is eloquent of tenderness for pathetic sufferings and of a truly wise helpfulness. It will be noted that for the efficient support of this work there is serious need of new subscriptions.

We have spoken of the work of these three societies together, partly because the interest of their reports appeals to us at the same time, but chiefly in order that we might use them as illustrations of the fundamental truth, to which they all bear witness. It is for the Kingdom of God that we have always to strive. From different sides those three make for the same great end, and this must be the test of our activities of whatever kind, as the realising of what it means will be the source of the renewal of our strength and consecration. This applies to all the work that has been pressed upon our attention during these past days. Are we eager for theological truth? It must be because to think rightly of God opens the way for more whole-hearted service, for the life with God, in which His Kingdom must be established among men. Are we bent on the reform of Church order? It must be to the same end, to make it more natural for men to live the life of the children of God. And as with theology and the Church, so with morals and the healing of all the ills that flesh is heir to. The Kingdom of God is righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.

If, therefore, at any time we are discouraged, or apt to think little of our work, or doubt the wisdom of its methods, to this we must always return. It is not for ourselves, it is for the Kingdom of God. We are to be surrendered to Him. It may be little that we can do, or little that we can see or understand, but it is for a great end, or it is false and must be abandoned altogether, and however dim our vision we keep our faces turned heavenward, simply holding to truth and righteousness, so far as we can comprehend and grasp them, and above all holding to love and the surrender of an unselfish spirit. The greatness of the ideal lifts us out of all unworthy littleness of spirit. Are we doing the best we can for the Kingdom? That is all we have to ask—for that means truth and righteousness, compassion and brotherly love; it means the mind of CHRIST and the love of God. In this ideal we find the unity of all our efforts, and the greatness of our calling.

FOR LIBERTY.

O God of freedom! by whose hand
From Egypt Israel came,
Her path the wet mid-ocean sand:
Her guides the cloud and flame:

Thou whose just laws are freedom's laws,
Bequeathed to make us free,
We pray Thee bless our sacred cause:
We cry for Liberty.

For Liberty, true Liberty
We pray: we struggle still.
Come sacred Spirit! make us free
From threatening forms of ill:

From Faction's busy barbéd tongue
And Jealousy's hot breath,
And, creeping over old and young,
The apathy of death.

From spider Priestcraft's lurking snares,
Spun in the subtle brain:
From Anarch, who thy title wears,
Yet shows the brand of Cain:

From huge machines for slaughter framed
To wrench, and crush, and tear,
While plundered peoples, cowed and tamed,
Look on in dull despair.

The base design, the craven will,
And Licence, Lust, and Greed,
From these: from every form of ill
Save us, O God, we plead!

It has been well said that no man ever sank under the burden of to-day. It is when to-morrow's burden is added to the burden of to-day that the weight is more than a man can bear. Never load yourselves so, my friends. If you find yourselves so loaded, at least remember this: it is your own doing, not God's. He begs you to leave the future to Him, and mind the present.—G. THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER
AS SOCIAL REFORMER.

THE Address on this subject, given by Mr. John Dendy, as President, at the recent Annual Meeting of the Sunday School Association, was so earnest and direct an appeal to us all to consider our duty in the matters dealt with, that we have invited a discussion upon it, which will be continued for two or three weeks in these columns, after which Mr. Dendy, if he desires to do so, will reply. The Address contains a challenge both to the ministers and laymen in our churches, and we trust that the serious consideration of it will not be neglected. This week we offer the three following contributions towards the discussion:—

I.

I do not remember listening to a more significant address than that delivered by Mr. John Dendy at the meeting of the Sunday School Association. We had not any opportunity of discussing the grave topics it dealt with, but we were all driven into the region of serious meditation. I should like to say a few words about it.

Mr. Dendy started with the terrible assumption that notwithstanding our nineteen centuries of Christianity certain great evils like impurity, gambling, commercial dishonesty, and intemperance, were rampant among us, and seemed as if they had "come to terms" with religion. We cannot shut our eyes to the evidence ever before us that Mr. Dendy is justified in his assumption. The message of Jesus to the world is more or less faithfully delivered by his disciples, but the great sores are not only unremoved, but are running with ghastly stream through all the channels of our civilisation and domestic life.

After this tremendous indictment Mr. Dendy sorrowfully assumes that the "clergy of all denominations decline to so large an extent the duties of the prophet in regard to these matters." I am afraid there is no satisfactory answer to be given to this grave charge. Mr. Dendy will not be content if I assure him that not a few ministers of religion do grapple with these evils in public and in private, and from pulpit and platform use their utmost influence to uproot all noxious weeds, and heal all moral sores. He will say he knows that a few are found faithful among the faithless. But he will fall back upon his general statement. I wish I could challenge its accuracy, and prove up to the hilt the boldness and fidelity of those who are by station and function the recognised leaders of the spiritual life of the Christian world. I cannot do this. I sorrowfully admit the truth of Mr. Dendy's indictment. I know what an awful reflection this is upon the clergy of all denominations, and how it strikes at the very root of their utility in dealing with the moral issues of the world.

But I am not willing to let the matter rest here, and sorrowfully go with Mr. Dendy to commit to the Sunday-school teacher the work which the prophet and preacher fails to do. At least, I cannot do this without a protest and an appeal. Some of us declare we are doing our best—many of us are eager to find out how we can do more—and, in our hearts, all of us are dissatisfied that we are doing so little. But we must not be passed by. We must not be relieved of our responsibilities. We must not have our work transferred to others. So far as I am concerned—and I speak for many others—I admit that it is our duty to do the work which Mr. Dendy invites the Sunday-school teacher to undertake, and I make an appeal to those who are engaged in the ministry to read Mr. Dendy's paper not in the light of a message and a suggestion to Teachers, but as a layman's solemn appeal to the preachers to face the awful problems of vice and immorality with boldness, and to let their pulpits resound with condemnations of customs and practices which they know are imperilling the welfare of many of those to whom they regularly minister, as well as the multitudes who stand outside nearly all the ministries of religion.

I rejoice, however, in Mr. Dendy's appeal to the teachers. They can be invaluable auxiliaries to even the most faithful ministry. They have charge of souls at a happy seed-time. They come very close to the lives of the young at the season of their greatest receptivity. Their words and example are of far-reaching power. By all means let us enlist them into the service, so that a ministry quickened into a new sense of its duty, reinforced by a godly band of men and women in the Sunday-schools may make united and successful war against the great evils which deride our religion, and laugh at our civilisation. Against these evils there needs the plainest speech, and the sternest denunciation. We must not take refuge any longer in a coward's castle, and cheat ourselves by the thought that it is best to leave unpleasant and unfragrant things alone. The evils are here in our midst, working their dreadful havoc, and bringing their harvest of woe, and we must warn, entreat, and rebuke with all the earnestness of our natures. Silence is cowardice. To speak is our duty.

I venture to commend Mr. Dendy's paper not only to those who heard it read or who may read it in your pages, but to the Sunday School Association, and to ask them to give it the widest circulation among ministers and teachers, so that they may at least see what a demand is made upon them and be stirred up to do the work which is so imperiously laid upon them.

JAMES C. STREET.

II.

In common with almost all who heard or who read the paper I wish to express my gratitude to Mr. Dendy for such a manly, outspoken, and righteous appeal to all that is best in human nature against the terrible evils that still, as he says, "seem as much a part of our civilisation as our churches" themselves.

One of the most disheartening signs is, as he points out, that these vices are entrenched in the very citadels of outward religiousness; and that because a man makes profession of following a Christian standard of life is no guarantee that he does not practise these and similar vices, and, perhaps, uses his religious profession as a cloak to enable him the more safely to mislead his fellows. The distrust on the part of the ordinary commercial man of the over-pious tradesman is one testified to by overwhelming and sad experience.

I think that in his paper Mr. Dendy hardly gives full weight to the lessons such a fact should teach—namely, the strangely-mixed character of most human natures in which the good and the bad are so wonderfully woven, and next the extreme difficulty of correct moral judgment when one comes to measure out condemnation amongst different forms of vice, and, of course, still more of differing kinds of sinners. Francis Newman's beautiful passage on this subject in "The Soul, its Sorrows and Aspirations" (p. 71) will occur to most readers.

To Mr. Dendy's appeal to Sunday-school teachers to become social reformers, I add my humble and glad approval. I cannot conceive of a Sunday-school teacher who could refuse to be a social reformer; and I am quite certain that if social reformers would become Sunday-school teachers, they would add immensely to their power for good, and their influence to bring about their ideals.

While saying so much and acknowledging to the full the obligation to speak out against such vices as Mr. Dendy inveighs against, and others which he does not mention, I must earnestly differ from him in his advice to teachers to add to the curriculum of the Sunday-school concrete and particular cases of vice in order to let it be seen "in all the true proportions of its ugliness."

Especially dangerous, in my opinion, would be the treatment on these lines of the first-mentioned class of evils by Mr. Dendy—those connected with the word impurity.

It is a true instinct which leads us to keep from the knowledge of the young whole classes of the literature of the day in which these vices are dragged into the daylight; and it did not need the terrible evils wrought by a sensational and indiscreet journalist a few years ago to show the danger of too much publicity in matters of this kind. The old legend still is true that the apple of moral discord is found upon the tree of knowledge of good and of evil.

I cannot but think that Mr. Dendy has not fully appreciated the possible effect of this emphasis which he is anxious that teachers should give to that part of their work which leads them to warn against evil.

My own opinion very strongly is, that the best form of preparation which parent and Sunday-school teacher alike can give to the young to enable them to withstand evil influences of whatever kind, is that love of and delight in goodness and in holy things, the knowledge of fine examples and pure lives lived in the past, the affection which leads to the rejection of anything which would pain or hurt those they have been taught to love, the sense of the grandeur of right conduct which will inevitably cause the opposite line of conduct, when presented, to look poor and mean by comparison. I have faith in the capacity of such souls so trained to know the right when they see it, to distinguish the wrong by an unerring guide. They may not always win—who can?—but at least they will know which was best.

It must not be supposed by this that I would urge complete silence on these questions, but occasions will arise to every conscientious parent and teacher alike, when a serious word may be spoken in warning of some particular evil to which he may discern some leaning on the part of a child, as to which the natural course of the lessons may lead him.

But I am convinced that the more exceptional such denunciations are the better.

I remember one dread warning given to me on one of the vices mentioned by Mr. Dendy, which stood absolutely alone because it was never repeated, but which, possibly by its very solitariness, has never left my memory. With this exception, I wish to accord to the paper, as a whole, my cordial and grateful appreciation.

RICHARD ROBINSON.

III.

Of the reality and enormity of the four evils—impurity, gambling, commercial dishonesty and intemperance—which Mr. Dendy so vividly brought before us, there can scarcely be two opinions; and of the need for more powerful and effective work towards the “reform” of these evils, we must all be fairly well agreed. It is when we come to the means and methods of reform in these matters, that differences arise. The gist of Mr. Dendy’s message, as I understood it, was that we must fall back mainly upon the Sunday-school teachers of our land as the one great untrammelled moral force, which, more than any other, can cope with and do most to conquer these awful social evils. I think I clearly see his point. And to a very large extent, I am at one with him. But, in putting forward the Sunday-school teacher as the Social Reformer, it seemed to me that Mr. Dendy had made a considerable assumption (1) as to the teaching ability of the average Sunday-school teacher, and (2) as to the easy possibility of dealing with these subjects in Sunday-school classes.

Upon the minor reason which Mr. Dendy gave why the Sunday-School teachers should boldly and systematically take these subjects in hand, I must here say a word. It was that, for something or other—which he did not name—the pulpit had not adequately dealt with the evils mentioned. If this meant that the pulpit had not been powerful enough to end these evils, the sad fact must be sorrowfully admitted. But if it meant that from any motive touching self the ministers of our churches (of whom only we can speak in this discussion) have been silent when they should have spoken, or that they have not used against these real sins and evils of the world, whatever of preaching power or pulpit influence they possess, then it cannot be admitted, in my judgment, by anyone who at all widely knows our ministry. Though himself the son of a late minister, Mr. Dendy’s actual knowledge of what is said in our various pulpits must be rather limited. But he is an active and influential member of a congregation. May I tell him where the difficulty in dealing with these evils lies? It is chiefly in the pews, not in the pulpit. I could name to him several ministers—some among the acknowledged best—who have had to suffer severely for wise earnest words in the pulpit concerning such evils. This, however, has not deterred them. One minister I know intimately who, for appealing to his young people, in the most careful language, to keep themselves pure, and by the nature of the appeal necessarily condemning one form of impurity, much too common at the time, leading to early marriages or worse, thus earned for himself years of enmity from certain families concerned; who, also, on the subject of raffling, which, but for his pulpit word, was about to be used at a forthcoming bazaar in the school, and although the united chapel and school committees, after he had spoken, decided to have no raffling, yet earned for himself the unfriendliness of certain well-to-do families who wanted raffling! I have thought it best to give instances, and not mere generalities. And now it dawns upon me that perhaps it was because of such members being found in so many of our congregations that Mr. Dendy almost despaired of the pulpit’s power to deal with these social evils. I cannot think he meant for a moment to censure our ministry generally for its silence, but he may know as well as any one—and especially as the son of a minister—what some members of congregations will do towards a minister who ventures to speak as Mr. Dendy himself would speak.

And so Mr. Dendy falls back upon Sunday-school teachers as the reformers who can most effectively deal with these social evils. In so doing, he falls back upon what I will call a splendid moral reserve. Banded together, of set purpose, wisely, definitely, and enthusiastically attacking these evils week after week for three or four years, what might not a noble army of Sunday-school teachers accomplish? But, alas! we must descend from paper to practicalities, from the ideal to the actual. What about those two points?—

1. The teaching ability of our average Sunday-school teacher. Ethics—morals—he or she is to teach. There is nothing more necessary. The kingdom of Moral Law is never far from the Kingdom of Heaven. To make young folks feel and know that there is such a kingdom; to teach them what is meant by Moral Laws; to train them into allegiance to such Laws, is, as Mr. Dendy sees, a primal need to-day. Long since I have said that we could spare a good many other things if we could teach and train them to these Moral Laws and what they lead to. So that I am not differing from Mr. Dendy in asking what percentage of the actual teachers in our Sunday-schools feel themselves capable of doing this work? Thank God, we have in some schools our Mr. Dendys; but how few? And it must not be forgotten that most of our ministers are Sunday-school teachers. But while my heart and head say “yes” to Mr. Dendy’s noble aim, my knowledge of “things as they are” makes me say: “This is another reason why we require greatly to improve the Sunday-school teacher.”

2. Even to the best teacher, are all the evils named so easy to deal with in class? Intemperance may not now be very difficult, and more might be made of it in Sunday-schools than is, though it is dealt with in Bands of Hope, &c., and in many day-schools. Commercial dishonesty and gambling are not quite so easy as intemperance. Teachers who have dealt with these topics in young men’s classes will have experienced the difficulties. Of course, this is no argument against dealing with them—when you can get the teachers who will do it, or try to do it. But come to the subject of impurity. Doubtless Mr. Dendy has dealt with it in a class, or in a gathering of young people over a certain age, or with individuals as I myself have. But is it not very difficult? Shall you speak of the effects of impurity, &c. Why I dare not even write the difficulties down to be printed in THE INQUIRER! And yet I feel as strongly as

Mr. Dendy possibly can the crying need there is for the Sunday-school teacher—especially of the older classes—to deal with these matters. But in order to do so he or she must not only be wise and good, but, as I think, must get into very friendly relationship with those whom he or she wishes to warn and guide.

Wendell Holmes says: “The patient can almost always be saved if the doctor be called in time; but he should be called two or three hundred years before the patient is born!” There is always wisdom in his wit. And one strong major reason given us by Mr. Dendy why the Sunday-school should become the Social Reformer—namely, that we thus systematically begin earlier than we have hitherto done, while character is unhardened and unset—is a reason which must commend itself to us all. His clear bugle call is an awakening summons to us to realise once again the supreme importance of the Sunday-school to our national life, the unique opportunity towards the making of moral character which it offers, and the noble need there is for more capable and consecrated teaching power.

J. J. WRIGHT.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION AND UNITARIAN WORKERS’ UNION.

THE eleventh annual meeting of this Society was held at Essex Hall on Thursday afternoon, May 25, the President, Miss Taggart, in the chair. There was a good attendance, including the following:—Miss Clephan, Miss J. Durning Smith, and Miss Preston, Vice-Presidents; Miss Dowling, Birmingham Postal Mission; Miss Holt, Liverpool P.M.; Miss F. M. Cooper, Three Towns P.M.; Miss Barmby and the Rev. T. B. Broadrick, Western Union P.M.; the Rev. T. B. Badcock, Shepton Mallet Circle; Mrs. Powers, Hampstead Circle; Mr. G. Cosens Prior, John Pounds Mission; and of members of the Central Committee, Miss Burkitt, Miss Dressler, Miss L. K. Garrett, Mrs. Farquharson, Mrs. Morton, Miss Lake, Miss E. L. Lister, Mrs. Stronge, Miss Teschemacher, and Mrs. Rutt.

THE PRESIDENT, in opening the proceedings, made reference to the loss sustained by that Society and all Unitarian workers in the death of the Rev. Robert Spears. To him had been due the first attempt to form that Society, and to gather together the ladies of their congregations for united work. He was one to whom the truth he held so courageously was constantly a motive force, and no one could doubt that the reality of God’s presence inspired the energy and self-sacrifice of his life. It was for the Unitarian workers there assembled to go forward and inspire others, following in his steps, who had now attained to the transcendent fruition. She moved the following resolution, which was passed in reverent silence:—

We desire to express our sense of the loss which this Society has sustained in the death of the Rev. Robert Spears, who was one of the first to encourage the initiation of the Postal Mission in England, and always gave it his unfailing and hearty support.

The past year had been very active, but their work was by no means finished. On their Postal Mission work followed something more, and they had to consider what to do for those who were drawn to them, scattered about the country. She pleaded for the maintenance of their old chapels. They ought not to let their hands go off any piece of land or property they held. If it was not wanted at present, it did not follow that it would not be wanted, for they might find that there were many people longing for such fellowship and worship as they could provide. The old Battle Chapel was such an instance, which she had bought and renovated as an institute and club, which met a distinct need in the place, and she hoped it would not be long before religious services would be again held there. She also referred to the revived activity at College Chapel, Stepney, which had been under the active management of their late friend Mr. Spears, and she thought that no further defence was needed of the Unitarian Workers' Union.

In their summer excursions an important religious work was done, drawing people from different congregations together and deepening the sense of unity. Many valuable friendships had been formed. When the meeting was at Bournemouth, five chapels in the neighbourhood had been visited. The surplus from the very successful excursion to Grindelwald had been devoted in part to their mission work. This year she hoped that many friends would again be gathered together in Switzerland.

Miss FLORENCE HILL (Hon. Secretary) then read passages from the annual report:—

THE REPORT.

The report opened with references to the loss sustained in the death of Mr. William Tate, who had rendered such good service as treasurer, Mrs. Weiss, and Miss Bartram. Miss E. M. Lawrence had been good enough to undertake the duties of treasurer, and the receipts had nearly doubled. She had also taken an active interest in the Suffolk Village Mission. Taking together the work of all the affiliated Postal Missions, including the central, it was found that during 1898 there had been 1,922 new applications for Unitarian literature, old correspondents on the books numbering 1,133. Correspondents borrowed 1,397 books, and a large number of tracts were distributed. Twenty people were recorded as having joined congregations through the agency of the Mission. The circles had been very active. In addition to meetings for religious readings and social intercourse they had done practical work, raising funds by sales of work both for their own chapels and for charity. The work of the Suffolk Village Mission had been vigorously carried on. There were signs of reviving life at Framlingham and the little chapel at Bedford was a centre of healthy religious and social life.

The Central Committee had advertised in nine papers at a cost of £14 19s., and 440 new applications for literature had been received. Through an advertisement in the Review of Reviews, response had come from Australia, New Zealand, Cape Colony, Canada, Newfoundland, India, Sierra Leone, Greece, Italy, Switzerland, China, Cairo, and Jerusalem. An advertisement in a New Zealand paper brought twenty-three applications, and one from a man whose interest in liberal religious thought had been awakened thirty years ago by hearing the Rev. Samuel Martin preach at Trowbridge.

The help derived from visits paid to scattered correspondents, and from the monthly religious Conferences at College Chapel, Stepney, was also noted. The demand for books from the Central Library was increasing, and two new boxes of books had been added to the Travelling Library, bringing the number up to twelve.

College Chapel, Stepney, in charge of Mr. L. Taverner, acting as lay-worker under the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, was showing welcome signs of reviving prosperity.

Miss E. M. LAWRENCE then presented the Treasurer's statement.

The general account opened with a balance of £29 11s. 8½d. in hand; subscriptions amounted to £74 17s., donations to £24 2s. 6d., making with other small receipts a total of £134 4s. 8½d. The expenses included: post and stationery, £24 2s. 5½d.; advertising, £14 19s.; printing, £15; grant to Suffolk Village Mission, £34 3s. 6d. A balance of £4 remained in hand. Of the balance of £77 17s. 7d. from the Grindelwald excursion of 1897, £25 had been set aside as a summer excursion guarantee fund, £12 had been spent in furnishing the Battle Institute, £10 had been granted to College Chapel, Stepney, and £30 17s. 7d. remained in hand. For the work of the Suffolk Village Mission £58 3s. 6d. had been received in subscriptions, £27 donations, and £50 from the B. and F.U.A. The total expenditure was £179 3s. 5½d.

In presenting this statement, Miss Lawrence pointed out that the expenditure had nearly doubled. £180 a year was required to maintain the work of the Suffolk Mission, and she made an earnest appeal for new subscriptions. Dr. Odgers had said on the previous evening that it was their duty to take the gospel to the people, and that is what they were doing at Bedford.

Dr. BLAKE ODGERS, at the request of the President, then made a statement as to the work of the London District Unitarian Society, and the bazaar to be held next year to strengthen its work and to raise a permanent Chapel Building Fund. Almost the first encouragement he had received in connection with that effort had been the promise that the Central Postal Mission would have a stall at the bazaar. Of the £12,000 aimed at, £6,000 had already been promised in donations.

Miss CLEPHAN, in moving the adoption of the report and statement of accounts, said it was a privilege to be connected in any way with such a report. The report was full of helpfulness, hopefulness, and of the vigour of fresh new life. They were constantly being asked what Unitarians were doing? They knew that some of their finest preachers had to preach to half-empty pews; they could not often build large new chapels; there was very much that they could not do. They were glad that they were not making a new creed or a new catechism. What were they doing? Just the same work they had done in all the past years, pioneer work, making the way, preparing a highway for the Lord. Unitarians were like a little band of sappers and miners, who went ahead into the difficult places, to make the way ready for the multitude, who then went up on it. The leaders of the multitude asked, Where was the difficulty? And even some of their own number were apt to think they might go back on their steps and join the multitude, and all go on comfortably together. But was the path finished yet? And who was to do the pioneer work, if they did not? They had their dreams of a comprehensive Church, but they must remember, it was never behind them, it must ever be before them, and they could never go back on their steps, even for the sake of fellowship. Their work was not finished, and that brave little organisation showed them the fallacy of thinking that it was. The response to its efforts to spread the good news was the answer to any such suggestion. Nearly 2,000 new applicants for literature proved how much need there was for that work, which they alone of all the churches were able to do. During the past year the number of constant correspondents had nearly doubled, and twenty new members had joined one or other of their churches through the agency of the Mission. Each of those was worth a dozen ordinary good men. Perhaps the most interesting part of the report was the extracts from letters received from those seeking the truth, letters from thirsty souls, so much in need of a good fresh draught. There were half-timorous souls, who found the truth so strong that they were obliged to take it, in spite of the scruples and fears which even yet encompassed them; when they had got through their fears they found the truth all the dearer to them. Then there were lonely souls, like one whose words were quoted in the report:—"I wish there were a Unitarian Church here, it is dreadfully lonely to be one alone in one's beliefs. Do you know of any Correspondence Class or Reading Circle I could join amongst Unitarians?" They could help lonely souls, knowing themselves what it was, through most of the year in their little isolated places.

The need was there, and the organisation was there—the great thinkers who spoke the good news, the workers who sent it out; what they always wanted was money to carry on the work. They should pass that report with gratitude and pleasure, and then ask next year for another twice as full of work, and twice as long also in the matter of the subscription list.

Miss COOPER, in seconding, drew special attention to the Conferences at Stepney, which should prove useful to all Postal Mission correspondents. Writing was very good, but speaking was better, especially when there were difficulties to be solved, and thus to bring correspondents face to face with sympathetic friends was a great service.

Mr. H. FISHER SHORT, a correspondent from Sheffield, told of what he owed to the Postal Mission. Five years ago he had written, out of curiosity, to see the literature offered, being then a Methodist. And he said frankly he had been disgusted with the books. Here, he felt, was someone trying to undermine his faith. But when later he was going in for an examination as a local preacher he had come to a different conclusion. The conviction had taken hold of him that God was a loving Father, and by that all else had to be judged. Eternal hell, total depravity, and afterwards the infallibility of the Bible would not stand the test. So the struggle went on within him, until a little over three years ago he obtained through a Postal Mission advertisement Stopford Brooke's sermon on "Eternal Punishment," and this brought him satisfaction. He read it over and over again, and had passed on hundreds of it to others all over the country. He was attached to his work, to his Methodist connection, but conscience urged him on, and he had to separate from them. Among Unitarians he found in the preacher a man speaking in his natural voice, and he understood that "the highest life was always the soul's in development." They need not be discouraged. It was a good work, and it was sure to spread.

The report having been adopted, Mr. W. H. SHRUBSOLE, F.G.S., proposed the election of officers and committee for the ensuing year. He expressed his satisfaction that the Society did not confine itself to work done through the Post Office, and gave an interesting account of a recent visit to Framlingham and Bedford, where he had preached on Sunday, and on Monday had given a public lantern lecture at which the rector had been present, and others, unconnected with their body, had given cordial help. He spoke in high terms of the work at Bedford under Mr. Amey's care.

Mrs. POWERS seconded, as representing the Hampstead reading circle, which she felt to be a valuable branch of the work. The reading of great books, and the discussion of them, was one of the best agencies for creating warm sympathy, breaking down reserve, and leading to true friendship. The increase of the number of circles and of the numbers belonging to them, would only increase the debt they owed to the Postal Mission.

Mr. G. COSENS PRIOR then gave an account of the good work done by the Girls' Home, under the superintendence of Mrs. Rogers, in connection with the John Pounds Mission at Portsmouth. Another Postal Mission correspondent, from a colliery district in South Wales, told of the benefit he had received when a member of an orthodox Baptist Church, and of the new light Unitarianism had brought to him; and Miss FREEMAN CLARKE spoke of the great value of the work, of which she had had intimate experience in America.

A vote of thanks to the President, moved by the Rev. F. Summers, brought the meeting to a close.

ESSEX HALL TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

THE sixth annual meeting of this Association was held in Essex Hall on Friday evening, May 26, under the presidency of the Right Hon. the Earl of Carlisle.

There was a large attendance of members and friends, including Lady Cecilia Roberts, Mrs. Ormiston Chant, the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, H. Shaen Solly, Peter Dean, C. D. Badland, W. T. Jones, A. L. Smith, T. A. Thomas, F. Summers, A. Harvie, T. Lloyd Jones, Fisher Jones, W. C. Pope, V. D. Davis, and others.

The proceedings opened with a hymn, followed by prayer, and the President announced that letters of regret had been received from Mrs. H. S. Solly, the former Treasurer of the Association, the Revs. R. A. Armstrong, W. Copeland Bowie, J. Estlin Carpenter, J. Drummond, S. A. Steinthal, and F. Allen.

Mr. T. A. EDWARDS, in presenting the Treasurer's statement of accounts, pointed out that the increase of £10 in the expenditure was due to the fact that the accounts were for fifteen months, being brought down to the end of March, and the balance in hand of £17 0s. 1d. was also due to some of the New Year's subscriptions having come in, and only a quarter's expenses having fallen upon them. The total receipts were £73 0s. 1½d., the whole expenditure £63 4s. 5d. He expressed regret that a resolution on Sunday closing had not been brought forward by the B. and F.U.A., but had been passed on to their Society. It was a matter of course that they would pass such a resolution, but it ought to have been dealt with by the Society representing their whole body.

Mr. J. BREDALL, secretary, read the Committee's Report, which stated that there were fifty-eight societies now on the roll, and 123 individual members; 10,173 copies of Young Days had been issued at half price to members of Bands of Hope, involving a charge of £7 8s. 6½d. to the Association, which was held to be well spent. Successful united meetings, both in North and South London, had been held. The circulating libraries, each containing thirty-five volumes, offered on loan to affiliated societies, had not been used as much as had been hoped. The gift by the Unitarian Temperance Society of Boston, U.S., of 500 copies of the Rev. J. T. Sunderland's pamphlet, "Some World Aspects of the Temperance Question," was cordially acknowledged.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report, said that he had noticed among recent speakers on the Temperance question a certain note of discouragement. He did not know why, unless it was that they were thinking mainly of the legislative side of the question and the delays in legislation. He had good hopes that Lord Peel's report would tend to the shortening of those delays. But even if there was some delay in legislation, it was a truism to say that whatever legislation they obtained would be ineffective unless supported by a mass of Temperance opinion of strong teetotalers in the country. They had to prevent the time from being wasted, by increasing the body of that opinion, that would make legislation possible, and when made, effectual. There were those who thought that having worked for a certain number of years, it was not likely that they would gain any larger proportion of the people; that they had already secured the co-operation of those who by temperament and character were likely to join them. That might be so in districts which had been thoroughly worked by their Temperance Societies. But there were classes of society and large districts which had not been so worked.

Some religious denominations had put the Temperance question in the fore-front of their work, but others had not done so. He felt that the character of the work was such as to demand the sanction and the help of any religious body, however liberal and however sensible, and he hoped their meeting would help forward that object. Statistics seemed to show that the consumption of alcohol per head was not now so great in this country as in some foreign countries. But it was not enough simply not to head the list and just to miss the evil distinction of being the most drunken nation in the world. They ought to be in a better position than that. But in so far as they had achieved anything in that direction, it was the work of Temperance Societies, and, above all, of Bands of Hope.

The CHAIRMAN then quoted some evidence that had recently come to his knowledge. An officer in command of a recruiting district in Lancashire had informed him that of the thousand young men last recruited in his district, four hundred were teetotalers. This average had additional force, when it was borne in mind that recruits were generally drawn from a class specially open to temptation. A teetotaler was no longer laughed at in the Army, but receive encouragement and was respected by his comrades.

Another piece of evidence came from Khartoum, where two companies of a regiment had been lately sent. Unfortunately it bore a bad character for drunkenness. Those two companies found themselves at Khartoum where no liquor was to be got, and one of the officers overheard some of the men at work, when one said to his comrade: "Well, I don't like this place. I don't hold with this not getting any drink, but I'm bound to say I feel a sight better for it." The narrator was not a teetotaler and did not know he was addressing one.

It was sometimes affirmed that the improvements in the drinking habits of the community were due to education, but education by itself would not do what they wanted. There was, no doubt, improvement in the matter of drunkenness after dinner among the richer classes, but there were other evils formerly unknown, and it was difficult to say whether the former open drunkenness was as mischievous as the nipping that goes on now. It was not enough to say that they wanted the working classes to be like the rich, they wanted them to be better; in many respects the well-to-do would have to learn from the working classes.

The motion was seconded by the Rev. W. C. POPE, and supported by the Rev. T. LLOYD JONES, who said that the Association had all the machinery for much more extended work, and he hoped the Committee would take further measures to spread their literature throughout the country, and make it felt that theirs was a national society.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT, in moving the election of officers, explained that the Committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association had thought that the Sunday Closing resolution would be more appropriately dealt with by that Association, which ought to be recognised as representing their whole community in the matter of Temperance.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS seconded the resolution, which was carried.

Mrs. L. ORMISTON CHANT, in an eloquent speech, then moved the following resolution:—"That in the opinion of this meeting the sale of intoxicating drinks to children under sixteen years of age should be prohibited by law, and that copies of the resolution be forwarded to the Home Secretary and to the member of Parliament for the Strand Division."

Referring for the moment to the Sunday Closing resolution, she was amazed to hear doubts expressed as to the passing of a resolution on the subject by any liberal, religious body. The whole country was sound upon the question, and the only antagonists were the manifest supporters of the drink traffic. It ought to be patent to every man and woman that only by closing the public-houses on Sunday could we approach to a happy, bright and sober day of rest—a day which should draw the soul upwards to the Unseen Kingdom. The sale of intoxicating drinks to children was closely connected with the Sunday Closing question, and all who had any experience of life in the London slums know something of that. She had to witness every Sunday the painful spectacle of little girls employed during a great part of Sunday, fetching drink for their fathers, who were, in many instances, too drunk to fetch it for themselves. It was a direct violation of the law. Nothing else than white hot enthusiasm on the part of reformers would prevent England from being totally throttled by the drink traffic. It had not only its grip on the neck of the Churches, but seemed also to have gripped the neck of the law, as shown by the recent refusal to allow, out of the Borough Rate, the expenses of a chief constable in opposing the renewal of licenses. Mrs. Chant referred in terms of warm appreciation to the Rev. J. T. Sunderland's pamphlet, "Some World Aspects of the Temperance Question," and also to a book on the Temperance Question by Mr. Joshua Rowntree, the finest utterance on the subject which had yet appeared.

It was not necessarily foolish or wicked people who fell victims to drink. Alcohol was a brain poison, and the educated were subject to special dangers.

The British nation spent 154 millions of money last year in intoxicating drinks, which meant an appalling amount of misery and degradation, and piling up the burdens of the coming generations. England is proud of its Christianity, but to enable her to hold her head high among the nations of the world, its people must be taught to do their duty to each other, and help each other to fight and labour for the Kingdom to come.

The Rev. A. HARVIE, in seconding the resolution, said it was high time that ministers should speak out fearlessly, and that the work of the Churches ought not to be crippled because of owners of public-houses and brewers. Magistrates in many places had exercised a salutary influence by making their opinion in this question known to licensees, but it could only be fully dealt with by the force of law.

The resolution was unanimously carried.

Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR moved—

That this meeting regards with much satisfaction the conclusive evidence as to the good results of Sunday closing in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, which has recently been submitted to the Royal Commission, and earnestly calls upon Parliament to pass a Sunday Closing Bill for England, in order that similar advantages may be realised in this country.

This, he said, was not a question of party politics, and he protested against the exclusion of that resolution from the agenda of the B. and F.U.A.

The resolution was seconded by Mr. L. TAVENER, and having been supported in an eloquent speech by Mr. BIPIN CHANDRA PAL, of the Brahmo Somaj, Calcutta, was unanimously adopted.

A cordial vote of thanks to the Earl of Carlisle for presiding and to Mrs. Ormiston Chant for her address, moved by Mr. A. J. Pain, seconded by Mr. H. Pallister Young, brought the meeting to a close.

COUNTRY AIR FOR WEAK AND AILING CHILDREN.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the followingsums: H. G. Chancellor, Esq., 10s.; C. Jecks, Esq., £1; P. M. Martineau, Esq., £1 1s.; O. Nettlefold, Esq., £1 1s.; J. F. Schwann, Esq., £5; W. Spilier, Esq., £5; Miss H. Woods, 10s. 6d.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—W. E. A. A.; C. D. B.; G. B.; F. E. C.; A. H. D.; R. J. D.; A. M.; C. E. P.; H. S. P.; C. T.; F. W.; S. F. W. (all three at once, thanks).

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

LONDON.

THE readers of last week's INQUIRER need not be told that many instructive and helpful words were spoken at the meetings which it amply chronicled. As one who attended the whole series of public gatherings which began on Tuesday afternoon and ended on Friday night, I may venture to add some impressions of them. From the point of view of numbers, I think last year's anniversary must claim the palm, though I should not be surprised to learn that actual count showed as many to be present at the conversazione as last year; and certainly the congregation on Wednesday morning was larger than in several recent years. The Essex Hall lecture, too, was very well attended—in two senses; if the audience had been less attentive it must have missed much of the close-packed and elevating thought which Mr. Wicksteed gave them. During the week a large number of well-known friends were seen and heard, the Lancashire contingent being specially strong. Last year's interim meeting of the National Conference brought together more representatives of the congregations than usually attend at Whitweek, and they seem to have got back to the average this year; but among those whom we missed were several who have been frequently amongst us, and whose counsel is of the wisest and weightiest. The weakest point that occurs to my mind in recalling the week's work is the discussion after the papers on Thursday morning. But discussions usually are not our strong point.

The experiment was tried of dividing the purely business part of the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association from the more distinctly declaratory and hortatory utterances which we naturally expect on such an occasion. It was quite a success. The idea, I believe, was the President's, and in other ways the programme benefited by his suggestions. Dr. Herford, it need not be said, has been a hard-working President. Everyone would expect that of him, and would know that no considerations of personal comfort would be allowed by him to excuse him from the labours in which he delights. It is well known that in the course of the summer he will receive a ministerial co-adjutor, the Rev. E. M. Daplyn, in his work at Hampstead. We all affectionately trust that the assistance thus given him may enable him to renew his youth like the eagle—though that is not exactly the creature that most appropriately suggests his kind, wise, and cheery nature. The Association has not had many ministerial Presidents in the course of its history; but the three who in recent years have held the office—Dr. Crosskey, Mr. Dowson, and Dr. Herford—have assuredly not been less useful in the capacity of leaders of business than in that of leaders of thought.

Since my last letter the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor has been happily welcomed to the work at Hackney, and has been introduced to London friends generally at the annual meeting of the District Unitarian Society. His work, in common with that of most ministers in London, has to be done in the face of much difficulty, and perhaps there are difficulties peculiar to the district surrounding the new Gravel Pit Church. But Mr. Bloor seems to have all the brightness and energy demanded by the situation, and we hope soon to congratulate him on unmistakable successes as pastor and preacher.

Highgate still awaits the successor to its first minister, Mr. Spears, though the words recall one at once to the real impossibility of finding anyone to fill all the offices and do all the work which, to the last of his strenuous life, occupied our late friend. Not in one place alone, nor in two, his cheery presence and helpful words are missed sorely. His personality and energy were such that his removal leaves a great gap, and his bereaved co-workers in many places have passed through many hours of anxiety, and almost of gloom, since his death. They are working on, however, bravely and effectively in their several ways; and the Highgate friends are, I understand, very hopeful of securing a strong and able minister for their leader before long. The ministry to which such a leader will be called is second to few or none in London. It is in the midst of a great residential population of the middle and humbler classes. Already a wide-spread area of influence is reached through the schools and other institutions; and of the congregation itself a most interesting and important section is that formed by the girls of Channing House School. When one reflects on the invaluable service to be rendered to our cause by women, the potentialities of a ministry which includes the spiritual training of so many intelligent daughters of our people are clearly very great. May the selection prove a wise and beneficial one in every way!

The report of the annual meeting of the District Unitarian Society, already referred to, drew attention to the difficult position at Bermondsey. It was resolved at the meeting to commend a special form of church work for the people at this centre, and some steps have been taken, I believe, towards the formation of a committee ad hoc, and distinct from the society which has hitherto had charge of the church. It is, however, too soon to announce any scheme; I can only express the earnest hope that when the appeal comes our London friends in easier localities will not in any way starve this effort to help the people of Bermondsey.

Happy news comes from Richmond. Our church there is at last, by dint of much perseverance and rare self-denial, free from debt. If this is not absolutely so to the letter, I am assured that June will not vanish before the very last farthing is paid. I am fortunate in knowing a little intimately the story of this seemingly prosaic event; it is a story too delicate—I almost wrote too sacred—to tell here. But never has it been easier to follow the apostolic injunction, and to "rejoice with them that do rejoice." "Free Church" has been the name of this place since it was erected three years ago; but now it is doubly free. If any debt-burdened minister and committee want to know how the happy consummation has been reached let him and them consult Mr. Farrington, and be prepared, as the son of Sirach says, "for trial."

Of course money can be raised in various ways. One way of raising it is by holding a great —, but dare I write the word? Last week Dr. Blake Odgers was among the speakers at the evening meeting on Wednesday, and as usual, not to say inevitable, he made a good speech, full of go and earnestness. Had Londoners been asked beforehand they would have declared with one consent that inevitably he must mention—and something more than mention—the great London Bazaar. But not one syllable about it escaped his lips. Several times our expectant hearts beat quickly; we thought it was coming; he was “leading up to it”—no, he wasn’t. Now, when the reader of last week’s INQUIRER turns again to the full-page announcement of the Bazaar, and reads it once more very carefully, from the statement of needs and prospects to the very handsome list of subscriptions already promised, he must see that the Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Bazaar could not possibly have forgotten the subject. Human nature is but human—though Mr. Grosvenor Lee said something about “thirty years a lawyer” which might tend to differentiate some from others. But which of us having already secured some five or six thousand pounds, and eager to raise them to ten or twelve thousand, would—or even could, except Dr. Odgers—have kept silence about it? My belief is that it was supreme tactics. Sometimes silence speaks more than words, and subjects like persons may be conspicuous by their absence. However that may be, our friends everywhere must know that the Bazaar project is going forward most energetically. All the London congregations, and some beyond the area, have their bands of honourable women, not a few, meeting regularly to sew and practice other allied arts. Treasurers are busy as bees. Committees meet and work. One committee is going to play—“Comus” to wit, in a sylvan spot famous in literature, as is fitting. And all is for the benefit of this great scheme—I hope, most earnestly, a great scheme for helping on the work in London. But I must not wax eloquent where our learned leader was so significantly silent.

(It is true that in the comparative privacy of a meeting consisting largely of ladies—namely, the annual meeting of the Central Postal Mission—Dr. Odgers did speak fully and forcibly on the subject of the Bazaar, but it will not do to spoil my point by that circumstance!)

W. G. TARRANT.

THE Annual Meeting of the Society for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Protestant Dissenting Ministers was held on Tuesday, May 30, at the Sunday-school Union House, 56, Old Bailey, Robert Grace, Esq. presiding. The report showed that £905 had been distributed among seventy-two aged and infirm ministers during the past year, and several new applications are under consideration. Subscriptions and donations will be thankfully received by the Treasurer, Philip Cadby, Esq., 24, St. Peter’s-square, Hammersmith, W., or by the Secretary, the Rev. P. G. Scorey, Gibbons House, Billingshurst, Sussex.

EPPS’S COCOA ESSENCE.—A THIN COCOA.—The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—James Epps and Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEALS.

Belfast Domestic Mission.—A movement has been set on foot for the purpose of helping parents connected with the Mission to obtain for their children a short country holiday in the summer. It is hoped that it may be possible to arrange such a holiday for adults also who may be in need of rest and change. The committee desire to enlist the interest of all friends of the Mission in their new undertaking, and they appeal to them for financial help. Any contribution sent to the secretary of the movement, Mr. Geo. J. Slipper, will be gratefully acknowledged.

Panteg.—The chapel at Panteg, three and a-half miles from Newcastle Emlyn, Cardiganshire, was built in 1764 and rebuilt many years afterwards. There remains a small band of earnest worshippers, who now desire to carry out necessary repairs at an expense of about £40 beyond what they themselves can raise. They, therefore, appeal for help from friends at a distance. Donations may be sent to the Rev. J. Williams, Panteg, Newcastle Emlyn, or to Mr. Samuel Hughes, Llwynbedw, Newcastle Emlyn.

Bessell’s Green.—Spring services were held in the old Meeting-house last Sunday. The communion table, stove, &c., were beautifully decorated with flowers, and exclusively spring hymns were sung. After the evening service further music and readings were contributed by friends.

Hollywood, near Birmingham.—The annual spring flower services were held in Kingswood Chapel on Sunday last. The chapel was prettily decorated with flowers and pot plants. The Rev. J. H. Matthews preached morning and evening to good congregations, and, the day being very favourable, friends from Birmingham were present. The collections amounted to £3 15s. 6d. At the close of the morning service the annual meeting was held, at which Mr. Lewis Lloyd was elected treasurer, and the usual business was transacted.

London: Essex Church.—The Rev. F. K. Freeston, who has been concluding his holiday of convalescence in Italy, is to preach again on Sunday week, June 11, and proposes on the evening of that day to begin a short series of addresses on “The Churches and Saints of Italy: their Teaching for To-day.”

London: Peckham.—A series of summer excursions, under the auspices of the Literary Society connected with the Avondale Church, was inaugurated on Saturday last by a visit to the Natural History Department of the British Museum, South Kensington. Dr. Woodward, F.R.S., the eminent geologist, kindly acted as conductor of the party, and, a comprehensive tour of the museum being, of course, out of the question, confined his descriptive remarks to a few types of bird life and marine mammals, for an hour and a-half, entertaining his hearers (about thirty in number) with an admirable discourse on the exhibits selected. At the conclusion of his remarks, which were enlivened by many touches of quaint humour, Dr. Woodward was cordially thanked by his audience, and a hope was generally expressed that the afternoon’s enjoyable experience might soon be repeated.

London: Welsh Services.—The service last Sunday evening was conducted by the Rev. T. A. Thomas, of Pantydefaid, who preached from the text, “Watchman, what of the night?” The congregation numbered nearly 50. After the sermon Mr. Thomas and the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, of Liverpool, who was also present, gave a few words of kindly advice, sympathy, and exhortation to the friends present.

Manchester: Goulden-street Ministry to the Poor.—On Whit-Saturday about 80 poor folk were taken by the Rev. B. Walker, by luries, to spend the day at Sale Lodge, where Mrs. James Worthington kindly entertained them during the day. Through the kindness of a “Friend” an extra treat was given on the Wednesday to the poor who are attached to the mission, and which included a visit of the adults to Whitworth Park and museum, and a good tea afterwards. Mr. Walker still regrets his inability to procure a larger meeting-room to accommodate the numbers who have gathered round him.

Stalybridge.—On Whit-Sunday the usual Whitsuntide school service was held in the afternoon. The church was crowded with scholars, teachers, and parents, about 400 being present. The scholars sang the Whitsuntide hymns, and the Rev. W. Harrison conducted the service. On Thursday, 25th ult., the annual Sunday-school procession took place through the town, led by a brass band and banners. The afternoon was spent in a field. On Saturday the teachers, to the number of 50, went on a picnic to Chatsworth.

NONCONFORMIST MARRIAGE ACT.

THE following memorandum has been issued from the office of the Registrar-General:—

Inquiries having been made of the Registrar-General as to whether strong iron chests or boxes, such as are used by Registrars of Births, Deaths and Marriages, would be regarded by him as sufficiently suitable receptacles for holding the Marriage Registers, Certified Copy Forms, &c., which are supplied to authorised persons for use under the Marriage Act, 1898, he is disposed to consider that such strong iron boxes would be satisfactory, because, although not strictly “fireproof safes” (Rules and Regulations, page 1), as generally understood, these boxes have in some cases of fires in Registrars’ houses preserved the Registers and documents inside them uninjured.

The Registrars’ iron boxes are 17 inches long, 11 inches wide and 8 inches deep—all inside measurements—and it is understood the cost of those originally supplied to the Registrars was about fifty shillings each.

The Registrar-General is unable to say where they can be obtained now; but from applications which have recently been made to him, he thinks it probable that announcements on the subject by advertisement from safe makers may be looked for shortly.

The Register Books are each 15 inches long, 10 inches wide, and $\frac{1}{2}$ inch thick, and are bound in stiff covers. The Forms for Quarterly Certified Copies must be kept locked up with the Registers.

It is not the most active people to whom we owe the most. It is the lives, like the stars, which simply pour down on us the calm light of their bright and faithful being, up to which we look and out of which we gather the deepest calm and courage. It seems to me that there is reassurance here for many of us who seem to have no chance for active usefulness. We can do nothing for our fellow-men. But still it is good to know we can be something for them; to know (and this we may know surely) that no man or woman of the humblest sort can really be strong, gentle, pure, and good, without the world being the better for it, without somebody being helped and comforted by the very existence of that goodness.—Phillips Brooks.

BI-CENTENARY RESTORATION FUND.

The roof and ceiling of the Ancient Chapel (1700) are now dangerous. The architects recommend entirely new ones. Much dilapidated in other respects, renovation is urgently needed. The cost of these restorations will be £750, or more. Towards this sum the congregation and trustees, with some old members and friends, have subscribed £286, which may be increased. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has given £50.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

ON Monday Mr. John Morley and a small minority of members protested in the House of Commons against the action of the Sirdar with respect to the Mahdi's remains. It can hardly be doubted that the general feeling on hearing of the Sirdar's action was one of shame and disgust, mingled with a peculiar pain that one of the ablest of British officers seen in recent years should have been party to proceedings so discreditable. The vote of £30,000 was carried, of course; as long as fighting men are wanted they ought to be well paid. Mr. Morley and those who supported him are probably satisfied to have made their protest. It will remind military men that they are not above criticism—in this country at any rate. Some good speaking occurred during the debate, and none more worthy of attention than two sentences by Mr. Morley. He said:—"They sent their generals and soldiers to civilise savages; let them take care that the savages did not barbarise their soldiers and generals. It would be a bad day if the country had two consciences—one conscience for the Mother Country, and another conscience for other parts of the Empire."

IF a Church Congress were to condescend to give a morning's attention to the subject of Unitarianism, and a leading Churchman were to read a paper which did impartial justice to our religious movement, as the only logical development of Nonconformist principles, we should all of us, no doubt, be grateful to him, and find merits in his paper more than were discoverable to those who heard it read. We are not, therefore, surprised that the Church Times should devote an article to Mr. Hargrove's recent address on Sacerdotalism. It is always agreeable to have your opponents forced into company with you and exposed to the same attack by which you are yourselves assailed. "He saw clearly and said vigorously, that the Prayer-book is entirely on the side of High Churchmen." This is Mr. Hargrove's great merit, and Dr. Parker, Mr. Birrell, and Dr. Martineau are cited as confirmatory witnesses of his contention. But the Church Times, like an organ nearer home, cannot accept the comparison of priests and sacraments to magicians and magical rites, and is affected "with profound astonishment" that "so acute a man" could be capable of such a suggestion. And, quoting the authority of Hooker, the writer concludes that "the sacraments are moral instruments, the use whereof is in our own hands, the effect in God's. For the use we have His express commandment; for the effect His conditional promise."

Now this theory may apply so far as regards the grace which accrues by the use of the Sacrament to the intelligent recipient: a man, receiving absolution of the sins he had humbly and penitently confessed, or devoutly partaking of the bread and wine of the Eucharist, in the belief that these sacraments are God's ordinances, may well receive from so doing, the assurance of Divine forgiveness or the sense of communion with God and His Holy Church. Nor is there anything magical about it; the effect is, indeed, strictly proportioned to the cause. But how can this be said when the effect is wholly independent of the disposition of the administrator or recipient of the Sacrament? Water is sprinkled on an unconscious babe, and a certain formula simultaneously pronounced, the babe thereby becomes a new being, it is "regenerate," born again! Words are spoken over bread and wine, and by the words a change is effected whose nature may be doubtful, but about whose reality Romans and Anglicans are agreed: what was mere food and drink has become an object of love and reverence, if not of actual adoration! Hands are laid upon a young man's head, and an invocation is pronounced over him, and he becomes a priest, and is gifted with superhuman powers. It is all magic; high and holy and of Divine institution it may be, but essentially magical—the effects alleged have no proportion to the apparent and assigned cause.

BUT the writer further turns the tables very cleverly, using Mr. Hargrove's argument from experience—that those who use the sacraments are no better than those who are without any—against Unitarians. "Does not the weapon of experience break in the hand of the Unitarian champion, and his creed stand self-confessed of being unable to satisfy all the wants of the complex nature of man?" "Judged by the test of experience, it has not achieved the success which would justify it in girding at the historic Church of the country." "Conduct is a test of grace," urged Mr. Hargrove. "Success is test of truth," is the retort. But is it so? "By their fruits ye shall know them," said the Great Teacher, but never "By the number of their adherents shall ye judge them." Whether "Unitarianism as a whole is a failure" we are not careful to answer. That it has produced public servants, distinguished and undistinguished, out of all proportion to the number of its adherents, is a boast we had rather let others make than that it should be forced from ourselves. That "it does not satisfy all the wants of man" we freely admit. Does Anglicanism, High or Broad or Low? Does any one form of religion? But God fulfils Himself in many ways, and we "gird" at none and despise none. We claim for ourselves this only superiority over others—that it is our principle and our privilege, to hold worthy of love and honour all who are engaged in God's service, whatever may be their opinion or their name.

MR. J. THACKERAY BUNCE, who has been for many years associated with the Birmingham Post, and on whom the freedom of this city has been recently conferred, is contributing a series of reminiscences to the weekly edition of that journal. Last Saturday he referred to the Nonconformist ministers who belonged to Birmingham in the "forties and fifties." The Unitarians named are Mr. Kentish, Mr. Samuel Bache, and Mr. Hugh Hutton, and the only additional remark is added to the name of the last of these, who, says Mr. Bunce, "was especially famous from his connection with the Political Union." A longer notice occurs of Mr. George Dawson, who is described as "one of the ablest, most original, and most attractive preachers we have ever had in Birmingham." Mr. Bunce says:—

It seems strange that it should have been so long back, and yet it was actually fifty-five years ago that Mr. Dawson came to Birmingham as minister of the Mount Zion Baptist Chapel in Graham-street. There are still many persons living who remember the sensation he excited by his fresh and original style, his daring choice of subject, and his fearlessness of thought and speech. Nothing like it had been known before in Nonconformist circles; and naturally enough the elder ministers were gravely disturbed,

Two of them—Mr. James [John Angell James] and Mr. Morgan [Baptist]—undertook to remonstrate affectionately, but firmly, with their young brother in the ministry.

The upshot was that "the young man was altogether too much for them, and they wisely came to the conclusion that he had better be left alone. How finely he used his freedom," concludes Mr. Bunce, "and how great an influence for good he exerted in the country as well as in the town, it would take a volume to tell."

APPARENTLY the Church of Scotland is free from heresy and schism. At any rate the meetings of the General Assembly, held last week, passed off without the discussion of any important case of discipline. There was one matter, however, which excited considerable feeling. It concerns the provision for the religious needs of our soldiers in India. Places of worship, erected by the Government, exist in many districts where no voluntary provision of the kind exists; and in these cases the law secures the use of the common place of worship to Anglicans, Roman Catholics, and Presbyterians alike. Unhappily, the first-named, being generally in the majority, have come to think—or their clergy for them—that the chapels are their special property. Among some new regulations on the subject, it is directed that before the Presbyterians may use such a place of worship "it shall be necessary to obtain the consent of the Bishop of the diocese in each case." Naturally the Presbyterians, who are as much members of an "Established Church" at home as the Anglicans, and who are the equals of the Anglicans before the law in India where there is no "Established Church," consider this a piece of ecclesiastical usurpation. Moreover, some not very Christian devices appear to be used here and there, where the Presbyterians' right of user is admitted, in order to make it highly inconvenient for them to exercise their right. On the whole, the subject is chiefly interesting as showing how pertinacious the priestly caste is, and how essentially oblivious of fair play. But tolerance and the priesthood are incompatible terms.

In a new magazine entitled the Free Church Chronicle we find a large number of letters from ministers and others belonging to rural districts, the subject being "The Free Churches in the Villages." In many of the letters a sad story is told, not simply as to the dwindling condition of the congregations, but as to the grossly unfair policy of petty persecution employed by representatives of "the Church." But what strikes us most is a sentence at the end of a letter which is sent by a minister in Sussex. He says "The chief difficulty, after all, is a very prosy and unexciting one. Money and sport and beer, and the supposed favour of various persons, are very visible and tangible." This opinion is given after the recital of several instances of clerical tyranny, so that the writer is by no means blind to that particular form of obstacle to the evangelisation of the villages. Is not a similar thing true of the town population also? "Money, sport and beer," and a lack of the manliness that disdains to cringe for custom—it is these things that have to be fought with, if a really "free" religion is to possess the people.

THE name of Dr. Briggs, the erudite Professor of Biblical Theology, is well known to many of our readers. Even those who have never read any of his volumes on biblical criticism remember the famous trial for heresy which he had to undergo some years ago before his Presbyterian brethren. He has just found rest for the sole of his foot. Last month he was duly ordained priest of the American Episcopal Church by Bishop Potter, of New York. There were many protests, we hear, against the ordination taking place, though the ceremony itself was not disturbed. Bishop Potter not only defends the ordination as just and in accordance with canonical law; he boldly espouses the cause of "advanced" biblical criticism with the statement:—"The author of 'The Introduction to the Study of Holy Scripture' has simply stated conclusions which the best learning and the most devout minds have reached before him." It is pleasant to recall the fact that the same air of critical freedom is characteristic of many in the Episcopal Church on our side of the water. The extreme sacerdotalists are not the only Anglicans. We confess we cannot see how men of light and leading manage to reconcile the results of their studies with the formulas of the Church; but so long as their consciences are not offended it is a very good thing that the Establishment contains such men.

AN English Roman Catholic, Mr. Bagot, who was a convert to Rome under Cardinal Manning twenty-five years ago, has published an article in the Nuova Antologia on the possibility of England's return to the old faith. His opinion, which is said to be very vigorously expressed, is that England will never become Roman Catholic. He declares that "with Manning's death the true and genuine progress of the Roman Church in England died also, and the epoch of agitators and ecclesiastical tribunes began, characters which Manning would never have encouraged. The truth is that Roman Catholicism in England, far from being a progressive movement, is, and has been for several years, stationary, if not retrograde." The crowds that go to their churches are, he says, chiefly made up of persons who go to see the spectacle and hear the music—the amusements of an English Sunday being rare. Their converts are often clergymen who become Roman Catholic priests, elderly persons, or young women who enter convents. Hence but a small family population accrues. He quotes marriage statistics in proof. He points out that, while the Established Church already boasts of being "Catholic," there is an enormous number of really Protestant sects which hate the Anglican Church almost as much as they hate Romanism, because they hate the sacerdotal feature common to both. He further enumerates three special drawbacks to the spread of Roman Catholicism—namely, the clerical intolerance that insists on the Catholic education of the children of mixed marriages, the unhappy state of the Romanist parts of Ireland, and the deeply-rooted historical distrust of Rome, as justified by the reign of Mary, the Spanish Armada, and the Jesuitry of James II. Unless the correspondent of the Morning Post, whose summary we use, has seriously misrepresented Mr. Bagot, his sympathy with the really Roman Rome must still be very imperfect after his quarter of a century's faith and obedience; for he asks in conclusion, "May it not be possible that faith in Christianity may be kept alive by diversity of religious opinion?" We take the article to be a most significant one.

THE Committee of the London Unitarian Bazaar have, after carefully examining a number of alternatives, engaged the King's Hall suite of rooms, Newton-street, Holborn (adjoining the Holborn Restaurant), for the bazaar. The rooms are taken for the whole week commencing April 30, and ending May 5, 1900. It will be a welcome reassurance to many friends when we add that the rooms are quite cut off from the restaurant, with a separate entrance and staircase. No alcoholic liquors will be sold at the bazaar. There will be ample room for other refreshments, and for entertainments of all kinds, in addition to the accommodation of the King's Hall itself, which will comfortably hold more than twenty stalls.

MISS FLORENCE HILL, hon. sec. of the Central Postal Mission, writes:—"As some mention was made in last week's INQUIRER about the speech of Dr. Blake Odgers at the Central Postal Mission Meeting, may I be allowed to explain that he kindly came at the express desire of our committee to ask for the generous help of all friends for the stall which the Postal Mission will have at the London Unitarian Bazaar next May. As many of our Postal Mission friends in all parts of the world see THE INQUIRER, this information will probably interest them; and I hope they will act on it and show practical proof of their sympathy."

CHRIST AND THE CHILDREN.

[Suggested by the statue of "Christ and the Children" executed by Mr. George Tinworth, from the design of Mr. R. D. Darbishire, by whom the statue was presented to Whitworth Park, Manchester, in 1895.]

Thus sat the Master in the ancient days
Upon Judæa's hills and 'neath her trees,
With children clust'ring at his loving knees,
To hear his gentle words of love and praise.
To his sad face their own bright eyes they raise,
The Man of Sorrow every movement sees:
The proffered flower, unwilted by the breeze,
The looks of tender faith and glad amaze Far from the thronging crowd they stand apart,
Far from the Temple and the busy Mart,
From where men barter, and from where men pray.
As it was then, so is it in our day,
For Christ is found where happy children play
And Truth blooms fairest in the childlike heart. W. E. A. A.

LITERATURE.

'A LAODICEAN GOD.'*

THERE are several references in this volume to what the author describes as "the limp, amiable theology of the hour." There is nothing like limpness either in the thought or the expression of these sermons, and they concede very little to the demand which he declares to be the evidence of a sleeping and unfaithful Church—namely, that "it wants a sleeping God and a theology which is pure sunshine." The writer is clearly a robust and vigorous thinker, and his style is direct and forcible. A noticeable feature is his command of illustrations which, though not always wisely used, are striking by their very abundance. The chief distinction of the volume, however, is its note of moral earnestness and its strong insistent sense of the gravity of the issues of life. Sin to this writer is something more than a conventional term, it is a solid and substantial fact, a dread reality. He calls it "the tragic schism, the great divide," and paints with much power and insight its estranging influence upon the human spirit. "Sin is the one only thing which compels God to act as though He were keeping aloof from our reproach and woe." He convicts the present generation of an inadequate sense of the seriousness of sin, which he traces in part to the growth of material prosperity and the spread of self-indulgence and luxurious habits in all classes of society. With this also he connects the materialistic supposition that modern science in revealing an infinitely wider universe in respect to spatial magnitude necessarily reduces man and the motions of his soul to insignificance in the eyes of God. The opening sermon, "The Unheeding God," is a very searching analysis of a conception of God which is growing too familiar in latter-day theology. This conception is the shadow cast by prevailing moral indifference. "The strenuous man," says the author, "will believe in a strenuous God," and it is this strenuousness that is lacking. We are "tepid in our moral sensibilities," with the result that the God whom we worship to-day is "indolently amiable," "lethargic," a "Laodicean." "If it be true that the God in whom we have come to believe would satisfy the Laodicean ideal, the call to repentance loses its urgency. . . . He will not trouble Himself about our peccadilloes."

As we read this, we recalled a sentence by a writer, of whom we know very little but for whom we understand large claims are made as a representative of the modern spirit, Maurice Maeterlinck. "What God," he asks, "that is indeed on the heights, but must smile at our gravest faults, as we smile at the puppies on the hearthrug?" It is the aim of Mr. Selby to remind us that the God, who is indeed on the heights, occupies them not as "an Olympian dilettante," but as "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity," who dwells "with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit."

We cannot follow Mr. Selby in some features of his theology. We think at times the reactionary spirit carries him too far. This is markedly the case in the sermon on "Prayer and Temperament," where he makes the extravagant assertion respecting those who deprecate prayers for rain or sunshine that "men with such a gospel are like nipping winds from the Arctic ice, and freeze devotion at its very sources." Neither are we inclined to share his horror of "the rainbow glories of an æsthetic religion," and we think his fears that men are likely to "commit ethical suicide under the cover of an ornate worship" largely chimerical.

But apart from incidental points like these we heartily welcome these able and outspoken sermons. We are convinced that the particular aspect of religious truth insisted on throughout the book never stood in greater need of courageous and emphatic exposition than at the present time. And perhaps we may add that none will profit more in listening to it than those who are engaged in what Harnack has recently called "the effort to state the old Faith anew, and to state it simply and clearly in the language of our own time." For the effort after simplicity sometimes leads to the sacrifice of depth, and the most lucid of interpreters is not always the most faithful. There are theologies in which the highest of Divine attributes appears to be represented as a species of good-natured or bland amiability. We have heard the Divine Fatherhood expounded in a way that at once conjured up visions of "puppies on the hearthrug." Belief in a doctrine of the Fatherhood of God is no advance if it is accompanied by a relaxation of the sense of sin, inasmuch as without a secure possession of that sense none can properly appreciate what the doctrine means. Nor is it well to recommend Christianity as something beautiful and simple to any who are not already prepared to find that it is exacting and austere. "What," asked Maurice—and Mr. Selby's discourses are an excellent commentary on the question—"what is the worth of simplicity if it does not satisfy wants which we feel, if it does not lead us up to the truth which we desire?"

AMBROSE BENNETT.

FREEMASONRY: A SURVIVAL.*

THE fulness of the title given to this book anticipates its main conclusions, which are, first, that the Egyptian religious system was a system of Freemasonry; secondly, and by consequence, the rites, ceremonies, symbols and passwords of Freemasons, now, are but a modernisation of the Ritual of the Nile Dwellers. And not of the Nile Dwellers alone, for there are sculptured symbols which show that similar ideas prevailed in Assyria and in Mexico; and the author attributes to them everywhere a vast antiquity. Dr. Churchward is a Freemason himself, having attained to the 18th degree, and he is so convinced of the analogy between ancient and modern, so far as those eighteen stages go, that he believes he can learn the secrets of the degrees beyond the 18th by a careful study of the "Book of the Dead." There seems nothing at all impossible in his contention. Freemasonry must have had an origin; the origin is lost in antiquity, the rites are now performed traditionally and without full understanding of their meaning; and the explanation now offered seems likely and appears adequate.

* "Origin and Antiquity of Freemasonry, and its Analogy to the Eschatology of the Ancient Egyptians, as witnessed by the 'Book of the Dead,' and the Great Pyramid of Ghizeh, the First Masonic Temple in the World." By Albert Churchward, M.D., &c. Published by Causton and Sons, Eastcheap, 1898.

What, then, was the object of the Egyptian in his rites? "To know Osiris in his forms of manifestation was the secret of power; to understand Osiris in all his names, all his places, conferred the Crown of Illumination." But in the attainment of that knowledge there were many stages which must be traversed. "The Initiate must pass through the fiery ordeal and be approved as adept; like Paul, who was epopt and perfect, thus showing that Paul was a Mason and initiated into the highest degree. The Adept must be justified in the Tribunal of Truth before he could emerge from the shadow of the halls of death into the immediate presence of the Source of Light. The Justified must become the Illuminate. The Illuminate must be consummated as Master, before he could obtain the innermost mansion of the divine house."

Dr. Churchward has much to say about the Great Pyramid, and the blindfold progress of the Postulant through its mysterious portals and passages, everything being symbolical of spiritual truth. The text is illustrated with coloured sketches of the pyramid interior, the door of entrance, and various symbols familiar to Masons. It is among Masons chiefly that the author expects to find readers. But if his contention is sound, Freemasonry assumes a more general interest, since none of us can be indifferent to the essential ideas of an ancient and world-wide religion.

It is wonderful that such a relic of a pre-Mosaic faith should have come down to us, with the ancient features still recognisable. We deplore the ravages of time in destroying manuscripts. We would give gold for an earlier Gospel, we would offer gold and pearls for the original documents of Genesis; and here in our midst is a living ritual, which is, perhaps, six thousand years old! From the commencement, and through all these ages, the moral teaching has been much the same, as testified by symbols which were early figured and are still in use. The Mason's "square" is depicted in the ritual, and formed the seat of the divinities of Truth, Justice, and Law. "It was first employed in squaring the stones of the builders, and next in squaring the conduct in the sphere of morals." "Much is made in Masonry of acting on the square, and here is the foundation of the whole matter." "The end of Masonry was to show the life that must be led on earth to attain the Throne of Glory, and the trials the spirit would be subject to until that was accomplished."

Comparing the modern Brotherhood with the ancient, Dr. Churchward says:—"Our principal tenets are the same . . . and we Freemasons have practically the same signs and symbols in use now as with the Egyptians, who had the different degrees, with knowledge and secrets restricted to each. . . . The principles and tenets of our craft are the highest principles of Morality, Charity, Truth, and Justice, which we have received as a sacred legacy from our forefathers, teaching us by sign and symbol those duties we owe to others and ourselves, to guide us through this dark life into everlasting light and happiness."

PLATO AND DARWIN.*

A PIN prick is gateway enough and to spare through which to enter the realms of Philosophy: the sensation, the perceptive mind, and the thing perceived. That is the end of a thread. Wind it into a ball, and it will lead you in at Philosophy's gate, and into every mansion of that house, for in that house are many mansions. The thing perceived, at length, involves us in that "great question which the philosopher of Königsberg left unsolved—How to get rid of that dualism which has seemed inseparable from the history of thought." How to comprehend or reconcile the relationships between the glittering phenomenal implement, "all silver white," the pin, as it appears to us, and the real cause of all our perturbation, the latent noumenal "Ding-an-Sich," as it is known to be, by Whomsoever known—that is the Question. The vagaries of the "Ding-an-Sich" in the history of Philosophy have been something like those of "that fellow in the cellarage," hic et ubique, at all points with his exhortations to remembrance, and with urgent injunctions "to swear"—not lost on some of the more modern Schools of Philosophers, who, when asked what Matter is, brusquely respond "Never Mind."

Lo! where that pin prick has led us! A subtle definition of dogma by M. Auguste Sabatier, Dean of the Faculty of Protestant Theology in Paris, was gateway enough and to spare (we surmise from the Hon. W. Gibson's Introduction) for the Abbé Marcel Hébert's novel attempt to get rid of that dualism which baffled Kant. In each dogma, says M. Sabatier, we must distinguish "between the religious content which must be safeguarded and the symbolical expression which may vary indefinitely." "M. Hébert's treatment of the subject"—i.e., of dualism—"is distinctly original" says the editor. "He personifies the antinomies of reason in the characters of Plato and Darwin, and the solution is reached through the medium of a dialogue in which one of these characters sets out from the standpoint of physical science in its Darwinian stage, and the other from that of philosophy in the strict sense of the word. And that solution is dogma, formula, symbol." "Appearances, signs, symbols veil the mysterious reality, but nevertheless adapt us to it, so that it penetrates us and makes us live." The Dialogue first appeared in the Annales de Philosophie Chrétienne of May, 1893. It would be interesting, if space allowed, to indicate the subtle way in which the "solution" is reached. Darwin is driven back step by step from "impregnable" positions with characteristic Platonic force, till at last against the encroaching dogma of "the Perfect," i.e., God, he opposes the inevitable Problem of Evil. Here he feels himself in his last entrenchment, prepared to die in this his last ditch. But no one ever dies in the last ditch. That is merely an Orangeman's "thrasonic brag." There are always plenty more ditches for those who have fallen so far to the rear. Plato does not despatch him, but extricates him with a "charity" which makes us wonder with annoyance why the author waked from his dream, on that auspicious Aug. 20, 1891, with these as the last words of Plato ringing in his ears, "What is charity?" If we might venture to reply for Plato, we should say that charity consists in reading and quoting what Plato himself had to say about it. But the coping-stone had to be placed on the edifice—the antinomies had to escape into a unifying dogma, formula, and symbol. "I walked towards the Duomo. 'Oh,' I said to myself, 'if Plato had known the Christ!'"

Dialogue is an unhappy medium for conveying a metaphysical disquisition. No doubt, however, if it can be done to satisfaction, it can only be done by the French. With a people who can turn Hamlet into an opera nothing is impossible.

To our mind we confess only to have met one formula, or rather Lotze's version of it, which approximately solved that "great question," and "got rid of the dualism which has seemed inseparable from the history of thought." St. Augustine, if we remember rightly, it was who said that God made the world out of nothing, which Lotze says obviously means he had nothing out of which to make it, with the consequent inference, that God is therefore the Ground of all things. Now God is a Spirit, the negation therefore of all that is implied in the acquired idea of matter. The Dualism so apparent and so bewildering to us is therefore contingent on the creation of Free Beings and of that Phenomenal World—fit high school and playground for them—which wears such a subtle materialistic look as to pardonably deceive most people: still "Wen Gott betrügt, ist wohl betrogen." But if things are not as Robert Browning surmised they are

That what began best, can't end worst,
Nor what God blessed once, prove accurst, then are we in a parlous state. If the gift of Freedom involves such evil as is so manifest, and does not contain, as part of the gift, a remedy for its own wounds, then one may well wonder at the nature of that Divine Self-limitation of the Infinite and Perfect which involved the existence of Beings finite and imperfect, and peradventure involved the eternal perdition of a vast portion of them—seeing that the rebellious would prefer to rule in Hell than serve in Heaven. No doubt, humanly speaking, men would rather be damned than not be free, but that is either because they do not know what perdition would mean, or because they attach a fictitious value to Freedom; but sub specie eternitatis and in the will of Heaven must not the essence of Freedom for a finite and imperfect Being consist in a desire ultimately to choose as the Infinite and the Perfect would choose, and so by a parallel self-limitation the finite and the imperfect would approach the Infinite and the Perfect? If what we have tried to express here is what is meant by the words that the author finds the solution of Dualism in Dogma, we have no objections. It is, however, a somewhat uncommon mode of expression, and might lead the unwary to take for granted that any dogma, such as that involved in the doctrine of Transubstantiation would serve equally well as a solution. The author, entering the Duomo at Pisa, "started" as he heard the words—

Sub diversis speciebus
Signis tantum et non rebus
Latent res eximiae!

And we were a little startled too, but were reassured by the philosophical or rather spiritual application of the words, and thereupon we gave the little dialogue our benediction as being uncommonly suggestive, uncommonly subtle, uncommonly elegant, and uncommonly cheap.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

THERE is now a pathetic interest in Mr. Robert Wallace's article in the Contemporary on "The Seamy Side of Imperialism," in the light of which one cannot speak with perfect freedom of its style. Mr. Wallace, once the brilliant Scottish divine, then for a brief period a journalist, was recognised as a somewhat privileged person, after the grade of those whose wit we enjoy or fear, but whose sentiments are not of high importance to us. And yet, setting aside the fun and extravagance of his article, there is enough seriousness in its theme in all conscience. To a generation fascinated by Kipling and dazzled with Khartoum it is but as one crying in the wilderness that any voice is heard protesting that England's greatness and England's littleness are not measurable by acres or pounds sterling. Approaching the same subject from a different side, Mr. A. J. Wilson, in the same Review, again warns us that even what we call our wealth is chiefly made up of promises to pay—promises made by irresponsible sponsors on behalf of generations unborn. His article is called "The Art of Living upon Capital." Like all money themes, it has a moral side, not far to seek. "Within the Workhouse Walls," by Virginia N. Crawford, is an article that brings us face to face with the deadly ineffectual character of our relief of the poor; perhaps the most significant passage is that in which, speaking as an expert, the writer describes the characteristics of the average official in the workhouse. Surely, the personal qualities of the ideal custodian of the nation's pauper wreckage should be second only, if second, to those of the trainers of the nation's children. We are trying to uplift the whole teaching profession; at present the dispensers of municipal charity are left very much to themselves, in an atmosphere terribly corrosive of natural pity and transmutive of wisdom into 'cuteness. We pass with a cordial note of recommendation of Mr. Phil Robinson's capital sketch "The Garden Revisited," to what is to us the most instructive and considerable of all the articles this month. It is Principal Fairbairn's on "Religion in India," which he confesses to be a subject far too great for adequate treatment, but the greatness of which is admirably suggested by his rapid yet graphic sketches. One cannot help contrasting the tone and method of this fine paper with the typical disposition of the bygone leaders of Christian thought in this country in regard to the "heathen" of India. There is something like awe in the tone of Dr. Fairbairn's remarks on the newer Hinduism; and all through his paper there is that temper of discrimination which, indeed, we should have always expected from him, but which cannot but have been greatly strengthened by actual contact with the multitudinous religious life of the great dependency. We strongly advise all our readers—we were about to say, especially those who are interested in the Rev. S. Fletcher Williams's work in

* "A Philosophic Dialogue." By Abbé Marcel Hébert. Translated by the Hon. W. Gibson. Longmans and Co., 2s.

India, but it is really the uninterested who need the advice—to make themselves well acquainted with Dr. Fairbairn's present article, and to be on the look-out for his subsequent utterances on the same important theme. We need only cite one thought by way of illustration. Dr. Fairbairn, after considering the influence of other immigrant forms of thought, traces the result of Christian contract with the Indian mind in a new-born energy towards developing, not an Indian type of Christianity, but purer and more effective forms of the faiths long rooted in the life of the people. It is to that end, chiefly, that any efforts put forth by Unitarian Christians have been, and we think, should be, directed.

There is a long array of articles in the Nineteenth Century, and the majority are distinctly interesting and informing. To cite a few of them:—Mr. Leonard Courtney criticises, more suo, Mr. O'Brien's "Life of Parnell"; Mr. Henniker Heaton, discussing an "Imperial Telegraph System," assures us that it would pay to do our colonial business by cable, even at present rates—which ought, of course, to come down—if we kept the money that subsidises the mail ships; Dr. Henry S. Gabbett draws attention to "Beneficent Germs"; and Mrs. Huxley tells us about the Bathurst gold fever of 1851, amidst which a portion of her girlhood was spent. Several weightier contributions will well repay reading. Among them is Mr. E. M. Bowden's, entitled "Jainism: a Chat with Raja Sivaprasad," an article which may be profitably read in association with Dr. Fairbairn's, referred to above. Two things strike one in it—namely, the reality of the religious feelings under the different types of religion, and the comparative indifference of these feelings to logic and intellectual consistency. Dr. Llewellyn Davies defends a moderate "Erastianism" against the "lawlessness" of the Sacerdotal party. He emphasises, and very properly, the absurdity of the position of those who, while they affect to be too faithful to the Church, to endure for a moment ecclesiastical control by the head of the Church as by law established, and declare they want not the voice of a Privy Council but the dictum of the Bishops, add, in the same breath, that even with regard to the Bishops they must first know what these dignitaries order before they will promise to obey it. An article of considerable significance is given by the Rev. A. C. Deane on the subject of "The Falling-off in the Quantity and Quality of the Clergy." By "quality" he means, not only the social standing of the class whence the clergy are recruited, though that is emphasised, but also the intellectual calibre of the men who apply for ordination. Incidentally, it is a relief to find that the great army of the unemployed curates, of which we heard with pain a short time ago, does not really exist. On the other hand, Mr. Deane seems to have good evidence in support of his contentions that the ranks of the clergy are not being recruited as fast as formerly, and that if it were not for the offers of men of humbler station, the deficit would be greater still. The causes suggested are various, but chiefly they are—the lowness of the incomes offered and the greater necessity for real work from the parsons nowadays. Mr. Deane says this subject presents the true crisis of the Church in our day. Perhaps so; for neither of the causes named is very creditable to the Church as an organisation commanding vast wealth of resource, nor to the Christian enterprise of men aspiring to the title of "reverend." Might not such men take note of the zeal with which, according to Mr. Richard Davey, the singers who mean to excel should discipline themselves? Mr. Davey's article, "The Decline of the Art of Singing," strikes us as a veteran's characteristic lament; but it is highly interesting and suggestive. One of his stories brings in two names, each held in high honour by people who know, and again we may say there is a hint for preachers as well as singers. Madame Titien, writing from Boston in March, 1876, said:—"I have seen Mr. Longfellow. He called at my hotel, and insisted on my passing the afternoon at his delightful house on the common, which I did. He is extremely handsome, with beautiful kindly eyes, and with white hair which sets them off to advantage. . . . I sang to him several times, especially old ballads. He afterwards paid me a compliment which I appreciate beyond any. Taking both my hands in his, he said: 'And I understood every word you sang; you gave each word its true value, and phrased to absolute perfection.' Now if I am vain of one thing more than another," continued the great singer, "it is of being understood by my audience. What, in Heaven's name, is the good of listening to a song if you can't make out what it is all about?" What, indeed! Or of listening to a sermon, either.

WE are glad to hear that the invitation to our Sunday-school teachers to a summer course of study at Oxford has been accepted by a large and widely representative number of teachers. The scheme was propounded in faith, not unmingled with, fear lest only a few would be found ready to embrace such an opportunity. The only difficulty now is the happy one of not being quite sure of finding easy accommodation for all who have applied. Of course, that will be got over by those to whose initiative and intelligent organisation this excellent movement is due. We congratulate them and their prospective guests.

NOTES FROM ASSAM.—I.

Jowai, in the Khasi Hills,
Assam, India, May 3, 1899.

I REACHED Gauhati, situate on the Brahmaputra, in the valley of Assam, on Monday afternoon, April 17. The Gauhati Brahmos gave me a hearty greeting, and after providing me with "creature comforts," took me along Gauhati. I say along, because Gauhati, like "the lang toun of Kirkealdy," consists of one road, or street, three miles in length. It suffered terribly in the earthquake in the summer of 1897. But the houses have been rebuilt with celerity. Most of the private residences, many of them artistic in design, are embosomed in tropical shrubs and trees, fronted by the river, and backed by ranges of richly-wooded hills. In the evening I gave a theological lecture to the Brahmos, hastily called together in their Mandir—about forty present. On the way to the Mandir myriads of glow-worms made brilliant the roads and fields of Gauhati. On the way from the Mandir the heavens gathered blackness, lightning flashed all along the horizon, loud peals of thunder reverberated among the mountains, and Gauhati was visited by one of its torrential storms.

The following morning dawned in glory. I proceeded by tonga to Shillong, a distance of sixty-three miles, covered in ten hours. The ascent to Shillong is steep. A constant change of ponies is necessary. The stages average about four miles each. The scenery inspired me with a philosophical indifference to the jolting of the tonga, which, like a London omnibus in Kingsland, "rattled one's bones over the stones." It was a day of exceeding loveliness; and, although not in June, Emerson's saying constantly came up in the mind: "Give me health and a June day, and I will make the pomp of Emperors ridiculous." Those who know the Via Gellia, near Matlock, will have a faint—and only a faint—idea of the scenery along the first half of the route. The botanist would find in it a paradise. The geologist would read in its rocks and boulders the physical story of the earth. The forester would delight in its wealth of timber. The heart of the artist would leap for joy at the exquisite bits of beauty which charm the eye at almost everyone of the many sharp curves in the road. The Wordsworthian lover of Nature would feel "the Presence that disturbs him with the joy of elevated thoughts." Suddenly the landscape opens out into long stretches of uplands, surmounted and crowned with hills dressed in living green. Towards Shillong these are succeeded by a deep valley rich in pine trees, musical with running water, which now and then gathers over boulders and fragments of rock into a leaping cataract white with foam.

From Gauhati to Shillong, from Shillong to Jowai, from Jowai to Jarain, from Jarain to Nontalang in the extreme north-east—a total distance of 119 miles—the general physical features are all very much alike. They consist of a succession of undulating downs, broken here and there by the valleys of the larger hill streams. In the higher ranges of hills, the country, in places which is denuded of forest, is covered with short grass, which gets longer and more rank in the lower plateaux. A most remarkable feature in the aspect of the country throughout the hills is the sacred groves which superstition has preserved from the destructive hand of man. The sacred groves contain beautiful trees of various kinds, rare orchids, rhododendrons, and wild cinnamon. I passed through one of them in Jowai, and—shall I say like an Englishman without much sentiment?—lunched in the shade of another between Jarain and Nontalang. In the more elevated tablelands the pine-trees (Pinus Khasiana), peculiar to these hills, grow luxuriously, and form most picturesque forests. Stunted oak is also indigenous; and in the lower hills in every direction there are dense forests, containing sal, nahor, and other valuable timber.

Like all mountainous countries, the Khasi and Jaintia Hills are intricately watered. The streams run over rocky beds. Some pass through cultivated lands on the different plateaux. As they near the plains the waters precipitate themselves down deep rocky gorges and chasms, which are choked with boulders. Some of the gorges through which the rivers flow, at the entrance to, at the foot of the hills, are of surpassing beauty. The streams, confined between stupendous mountains covered with primeval forests, run very deep, and swarm with fish. No islands or lakes are formed by any of the rivers, although several of them have large deep pools. The rivers on the higher plateaux, though they might be turned to account, are not utilised as a motive power for turning machinery. Their waters, however, are extensively used for the purpose of irrigation. The hill people display great ingenuity in constructing aqueducts. In this manner, at Shillong, the chief place in the hills, water is distributed in the town throughout its ramifications. It is thus conveyed to the estates of the European residents, to the bazar, and to almost all the houses of the natives. In Shillong, too, a few tanks are made by the construction of embankments, and these are ornamental as well as useful.

Coal and limestone are found in abundance in the hills. Both are of good quality. Lower Bengal obtains nearly the whole of its lime supply from the Khasi and Jaintia Hills. The supply of limestone is said to be literally inexhaustible. For the most part coal is found in localities more or less inaccessible. From this cause the development of the resource has been, and is still, in a backward state. Iron exists throughout the higher ranges of the Khasi Hills. It has been worked by the inhabitants from time immemorial. The ore is described as of superior quality. But, as the value of labour has increased, and as fuel, through the exhaustion of the forests, has become costly, the trade in iron, which was at one time a flourishing industry, has almost died out. At present it is confined locally to the hills to meet the wants of the inhabitants for tools used in cultivation and for domestic purposes.

I have mentioned the exhaustion of the forests. But this applies to twenty-five years ago rather than to the present time. It was owing to jungle fires, which, however, have not entirely ceased; but under the administration of the British Government, as represented by the Chief Commissioner and the Deputy Commissioners of Assam, great care has been given to this matter, special efforts have been made to preserve the forests on the higher plateaux, and large areas have been set apart for the preservation and growth of timber throughout the country. The effect of this policy is apparent to every one who travels in these hills. The natural products in these hills are potatoes, oranges, pineapples, bay-leaves, cinnamon, black pepper, betel-nut, pan-leaves, cotton, caoutchouc, and honey.

"But what," some one may ask, "has all this to do with the Indian Mission of the B. and F.U.A.?" Nothing, perhaps; but I do not think the readers of THE INQUIRER are people with eyes that see not, and ears that ear not, but people with eyes and ears open to all the sights and sounds of Nature. To some of them, at any rate, the few details here given may stimulate an interest in these hills.

At the entrance to Shillong I was met by Mr. Mar Singh, the Lay Worker at the Unitarian Mission, by Mr. Nilmani Chakrabarti, the Brahmo Missionary, and by a number of Brahmo friends, whose attentions spelt out kindness itself. Shillong is the seat of the Local Government for Assam, Sylhet, and Cachar. It is also the headquarter station for the Deputy Commissioner in charge of the country. Being central, it commands the hills in every direction. For these reasons it is the most important place. The Chief Commissioner resides here. It is the station for the heads of all Departments connected with the administration of the Province. Shillong is seven miles in length by one-and-a-half to three-quarters of a mile in breadth. The height of the principal peak in its range of hills is 6,449 feet. Upper Shillong houses are built on the hill-sides, and, in looking over the town, one's mind goes to Matlock and Malvern—it is a sort of amalgam of both. The earthquake wrought terrible destruction. Not a public edifice or a private dwelling was left standing. A book of photographs of Shillong before and after the earthquake helps one to realise to some extent the awful devastation. In a few seconds the beautiful town was in ruins. A few lives were lost, but the destruction of human life would have been appalling save for the circumstance that the catastrophe occurred just when the public offices had been closed, when many of the children were playing out-of-doors, and when numbers of the residents were engaged in pastimes on the cricket-field, on the golf-links, on the polo grounds, and in tennis-courts. As it was, their dwellings became a heap of bricks and stones, the contents were smashed into atoms, food supplies from shops and houses were buried in the earth, and famine stared the residents in the face. The European ladies and their children were compelled to live as best they could for nearly a fortnight in the native market. The men set to work to reconstruct the town. Labourers and workmen of all kinds were imported. Wages went up to an almost fabulous sum in Assam. In a surprisingly short time the public edifices and the bungalows of the inhabitants were re-erected; and many of these, though less substantial than the former structures, are neat and attractive buildings. Prior to the earthquake the increase of the bazar and native settlements during the last fifty years had presented remarkable evidence of progress. Villages in the vicinity of Shillong had rapidly become native towns. One of the largest weekly markets is held in Shillong. The climate has been considered excellent, the temperature being more equable than that of any other hill station in India. But there are those who consider that the earthquake has changed the climate, and they base this opinion on the fact that in the winter of 1898 snow-storms fell—a phenomenon unknown in the previous history of Shillong.

On Wednesday morning, April 19, I visited the school in the little Unitarian chapel. The school has not long been instituted. The number of pupils is at present only nine, but Mr. Mar Singh, a kindly gentle-hearted man, seems to have caught the secret of winning children to himself, and no doubt the numbers will increase as time goes on. The same day I had the pleasure of addressing the weekly meeting of the Brahmo women. At the request of their leader, who opened and closed the meeting with prayer, I gave an account of the advance in women's education and of the opening up of Government, commercial, and professional employments to women in England during the present generation, referred to the work of women on School Boards and Boards of Guardians, and then described the work of our Unitarian women in our churches, Sunday-schools, and in the Postal Mission. Mr. Chakrabarti was good enough to translate this Address into the vernacular, as only a few of the women understood English. In the evening I gave a theological lecture in the Brahmo Somaj Mandir, which was well filled with an audience of between 150 and 160. Among these were eighteen or twenty native Trinitarian Christians.

CAMBRIDGE NOTES.

THE University Nonconformist Union has had a very successful term. The membership is on the increase, and it is hoped that this will continue to be the case.

The officers for the term were:—

President.—Mr. L. R. O. Bevan, Trinity Hall.

Hon. Treasurer.—Mr. E. J. Turner, Trinity College.

Hon. Secretary.—Mr. J. E. Few, King's College.

Six meetings have been held, when the following papers were read:—

April 30.—"Eastern Religions," by Mr. F. W. Lawrence, M.A., Trinity College.

May 7.—"The Work of the Monastic Orders," by Mr. H. R. Haworth, Trinity Hall.

May 14.—"Christ and the Higher Criticism," by the Rev. C. Joseph, M.A.

May 21.—A deputation from the Livingstone Society of Oxford University was entertained. Unfortunately one of the deputation—Mr. Lindsay, of University College—was unable to be present, owing to illness. Mr. Franks, of Mansfield College, Oxford, read a paper on "The Church and the Future," and was followed by Mr. H. S. Jevons, B.A., Trinity College, Cambridge; Mr. Adams, Balliol College, Oxford; Mr. P. V. Bevan, Trinity College, Cambridge; and Mr. E. J. Turner, Trinity College, Cambridge.

May 28.—"Henry Drummond," by Mr. C. Walter, Sidney Sussex College.

June 4.—"The Church and the Liquor Traffic," by the Rev. J. H. Moulton, King's College.

THE INWARD LIFE.

From "The Soul," by F. W. Newman.

THE sacred happiness of a heart which knows it is known of God, is not derived from approving its own attainments, but from the very acting of its insatiable desires, and from its sympathy with the source of life and joy. Its outcry is after Perfection. It longs after God's own holiness: for this it would give Earth and Heaven. It no sooner effects one conquest, than it aspires after another. If God would offer to make it at once and wholly perfect, it would eagerly catch at the offer. For while it does not renounce the world, in any such sense as not to have a thousand objects of worldly interest and desire; yet the One desire—to please God—so predominates over all, that for personal attainment, the soul counts all things as in comparison valueless. And (where the spiritual stage of development has been reached) the consciousness of this infinite longing to be more and more like to the Only Perfect One seems to be the essence of a good conscience. He who breathes forth this steady desire after God's holiness, he is upright, he is reconciled, he is humble; and is truly in peace of conscience, even when most full of sacred contrition. He has no finite standard of goodness: for although what he dimly imagines as Perfection is only a limited idea of his own mind, it is both above what he has yet reached, and it rises the moment he seems about to reach it. This state of things may even be called the exact reverse of self-righteousness—which is stagnation; in fact, the soul is probably so far from self-complacency, as to look with much severity on its own short-coming; because it measures them with the grace and mercy of God which it has known, and feels how much He may justly expect of it.

The thing to be desired undoubtedly is, such a constant presence of God's Spirit with our spirit, that there may be no more "variableness or shadow of turning" in us than in Him; that our hearts may be altars, whence the smoke of incense perpetually rises to heaven; that our wills may be animated by a power uniformly equal to their task, so that duty may be nothing but healthy exercise, without labouring or groaning. But if this is not yet attained, if we get into a stagnant, lethargic atmosphere, which threatens to benumb us, we must be thankful for an occasional healthful typhoon, and not cavil that it is not a trade-wind. Individual character and circumstances of temptation differ so much, and false theories so derange the proper progress of things, that it is delusive to assert any result to be generally true; but it seems impossible to doubt that in a healthy state, the internal life of spiritual men tends to become more and more tranquil, until the observer can detect no disturbances. Happy are those, to whom Habit gives that steadiness which the moralist admires without that languor which the spiritual dread.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

"In this world we are all busy building."
—R. S. Stevenson.

PERHAPS some of you do not know the story—six hundred years old and more—of the Italian peasant boy, Giotto, who, when he was a little lad, used to take care of his father's sheep in the sunny fields round a village near Florence. While the contented creatures cropped the grass and wandered about bleating their friendly greetings to each other all day long, Giotto also wanted something to do, and he used to draw pictures of his sheep, or his dog, or some other object, with a sharply-pointed stone upon the pieces of slate he happened to find.

One day a famous artist, named Cimabue, who lived in Florence, took a journey into the country, and happened to pass by the shepherd boy as he was busy drawing. Cimabue was delighted with the clever way in which the child of ten years old was sketching, quite untaught, the head of a sheep, and asked him if he would like to go to live in Florence and learn to paint well.

This seemed a golden prospect to the boy. Leave must be asked of the poor peasant father next, and it was granted, though Bondoni found it hard to lose the merry-hearted, clever little lad who had been the light of his home. Well, Giotto went with Cimabue, and for years he worked hard, plodding over little details as he studied, till at last, by perseverance as well as talent, he became a wonderful artist. He grew up a homely, plain-spoken man, full of humour and quaint jokes, always glad to turn back from the companionship of the nobles and wealthy people who sought him to that of the peasants from whom he was descended and the poor dwellers in the towns. He used to go from town to town to execute the commissions given to him, painting beautiful altar-pieces in churches and frescoes on their walls which tell us to this day the stories of saintly people, and keep lovely memories in the thoughts of men.

Often his paintings were done for no reward, just for the sake of pleasing poor people who could pay him nothing. So he filled buildings all over Italy with beauty, and wherever he went he left art treasures behind him. At sixty years of age he almost ceased to paint, and became a builder and sculptor, and fashioned his beautiful dreams in stone. Outwardly he was a commonplace-looking, burly man, making people laugh with his ready jokes and homely sayings; yet he was like one inspired in his art work. Could he have done all this exquisite work, do you think, if he had not had beautiful thoughts and visions within him—if he had not treasured every ideal that came to him, and been on the watch for all the beauty he could see around him?

"In this world we are all busy building." Not like Giotto, building and decorating churches and towers; but we are all building lives and characters, and if we would build these well we need, like Giotto, to have beautiful thoughts in our minds, and to keep before us great and noble aims as to what we want to be and do.

Here is another story—a true one—which will partly explain what I mean:—

A young girl, who had spent all her short life in the country among flowers and birds and lovely scenery, was obliged to leave her happy home to earn her living by going to work in a town factory. The noise and movement of the great pulleys and wheels, as they flew round and rushed up and down, seemed to deafen and make her dizzy at first. Worse still, she found that her new companions, the mill girls, were growing into dull drudges with empty minds, almost like the machines which needed so little thought on their part to tend. Was she to sink to their level or to help them to rise? Hear what she did.

She persuaded a few of the girls to try to find out for themselves if it was not a fact that books and reading brought interest and pleasures into life. She lent them the few precious volumes she owned. Then they all found means of getting more books; they became quite thirsty for them, and it grew into a habit with them to meet two or three evenings in each week, when work was over, to talk about what they had read and enjoyed. This was only the beginning. The new influence spread. The little circle of readers increased, till all the mill girls became readers, and their long working hours were brightened, as they almost mechanically tended their machines, by the thoughts that now filled their minds. Did not these girls begin to build well when they set to work to store up thoughts that were worth treasuring, and to place before themselves higher and better aims in life?

A wise man once said: "Make yourselves nests of pleasant thoughts. None of us yet know what fairy palaces we may build of beautiful thoughts, proof against all adversity. Bright fancies, satisfied memories, faithful sayings, pleasure houses of precious and restful thoughts, which care cannot disturb, nor pain make gloomy, nor poverty take away from us; houses built without hands, for our souls to live in."

Now what the little builders in this world, that is the children, have to do, is to be on the watch for all that is beautiful, and good, and kind, and true, and to treasure such thoughts and make them their own. They come to us in all kinds of ways—in poems, and hymns, and stories that we read, from pictures, and brave noble deeds we hear of. They drop into our hearts suddenly—thoughts sent by God to us,—as when we think of a kind deed we want to do, or long to grow wiser and better than we have been. These thoughts and aims are what we must build our characters and lives with. We grow like the ideals we set before ourselves; the thoughts and longings we encourage, make us what we are. But remember, to build well, we must not only think well, we must act well.

THE FRENCH VICTORY.

THE pronouncement of the Court of Cassation on the DREYFUS case marks a great victory—a victory much more to be applauded, we dare to think, than many a feat of war. To those public-spirited men in France who have braved obloquy and loss in order that the truth should be known and justice be done, every lover of righteousness will desire to tender hearty congratulations. It has been a long fight and a stern one. We need not attempt to tell again the story. It is but too familiar. When many months ago the journalists of this country were supplied with a pamphlet professing to give the actual details of Captain DREYFUS's trial and condemnation, there were many of us who were already weary of the apparently interminable wrangle. Accusations and counter-accusations fell thick, and it was pardonable, let us hope, if being without special means of access to the sources of knowledge on the case, some of us deemed it a duty to refrain from adding anything to the chaos of mere opinion. To-day, however, the apparently interminable has come to an end. Confession on the one hand, and sullen silence on the other, support the solemn judgment of the highest court in the Republic, which is to the effect that the accused man was, after all, wrongly accused, and what is infinitely worse, treacherously accused. It is no longer open to doubt on which side the traitors stand. We have come to the point when to be silent would be simply to show ourselves insensible to the great moral issues of this notorious case.

Englishmen have often made it their boast, and there is probably more ground for it than for much else that they boast of, that if there is one thing they like, it is fair play. Our blood is not soon heated; but injustice was ever a thing to rouse the typical men of our race. There could not be, on the other hand, a charge more galling than that any of us had acted unfairly towards others. It is, we would fain hope, our best credential, as we go to our inheritance of domination over various dusky tribes of the earth, that our people, as a rule, will see justice done between man and man. Our interest in this DREYFUS case is largely, almost entirely, based on this love of fair play. We believe, however, that the French have a sense of honour fully as keen as ours, and that if they have been slower than we like to remember to reverse the iniquitous verdict of the court-martial on DREYFUS, it has been because the majority did really think justice had been done. It is obvious that two prejudices of enormous strength fortified this long-persistent error in their minds. In the first place we cannot forget that the frightful disasters of 1870, and the barely averted humiliations of a few years later, have very deeply and painfully impressed the minds of the French people. The army is the one hope they have of retaining a creditable place in history—indeed, of preserving national liberty. Honestly convinced that the reversal of the DREYFUS sentence would be a blow at the efficiency of the army through the discredit it would bring upon men high in military rank, the French public, even at some risk of perpetuated injustice, elected to stand by its generals. It is not the first time that the sentiment has prevailed that it were expedient one man should perish rather than the nation. That sentiment, and the peculiarly exalted enthusiasm of the French for military things, had to be slowly overborne by cumulative evidence before the true proportions of the issue could be realised. Slowly, very slowly, and in the teeth of the most determined opposition, the great change has been effected. The legal reversal has not been simply overwhelming—it is so complete, so absolutely unanimous, that there is no opposition to overwhelm. We believe that the vast majority of decent citizens in France—we should say the whole of them who are not kept wholly subservient to the priests—acquiesce in the judgment. It is a victory for the best life, the moral and spiritual life of the nation.

But there is yet to be named a baser prejudice, the influence of which seems to have brought about this monstrous injustice in the first instance, and to have resisted its repeal most effectively all this long time. This baser sentiment is the more despicable because it gains its most formidable support, if it does not derive its birth, from the very circle where righteousness ought to be most sedulously fostered. It is the anti-Jewish feeling, for the existence of which, indeed, special social conditions are answerable in no small degree, but none the less surely it is a feeling which, according to unimpeachable evidence, has been nursed and stimulated by priests of the Roman Catholic Church. Poor DREYFUS was a Jew, a member of a race often hated when it is not despised; and in proportion as his brethren by race rallied to his vindication, Catholic bigots have ranged themselves in the opposite camp. Happily there has proved something stronger in France than unreasoning prejudice, even of the most violent order: that something is the sense of law, the sanity of justice. In a few deeply impressive words, as many of us remember, Mr. WICKSTEED referred in his Essex Hall Lecture to the sorrow and humiliation with which the friends of France everywhere had witnessed many of the events of recent years. The lecturer had with him the sympathy of his audience, alike in the pain he expressed and in the hope he cherished, that a nation so great, and so variously great, might yet rise to better things. The judgment just given is an assurance that such hopes are not in vain.

MAN.

Who can measure man?

To rest on a hill and mark
The work of his hands;
How the woods fall back at his nod,
And smooth fields show;
And springing corn like a sea;
And, o'er hedge and top,
Trim roofs and spires,
Happy entrenchments,
Wherefrom, at eve,
His heart's enchantment,
With mirth and melody,
Beats off beleaguering night:
O rare vision!

The exquisite web of veins,
Time's uniform
Matching the bud and flower,
Lay it upon the board,
Test its atoms,
Fill your cups with its blood,
Hunt long its secret;
Learn what man is not!

Is the rose the petals it seemed,
Tho' each be set back
In its place of beauty?

Who can measure man?

Like a curious god he peers into crea-tion's eyes;
Half god he is!
The foaming flash that darts from the dazzled eye like a snake, Bearing along its load as though it were lighter than breath, Smiting space asunder in a rapture of strength and speed,
Is it but steel and steam?
Nay,
Like Adam's spade,
'Tis mostly wit!

Who can measure man?

Earth bounds him not,
Nor the last lone star in heaven!
He overfills his house!
He bursts its walls!
And on thought-wings soars to the bodiless day of eternal things!

—BURTON BETHAM,

MORE IMPRESSIONS OF THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

VI.

"EVERY man at the beginning doth set forth good wine," said the governor of a certain feast. The B. and F.U.A. adopted this orthodox policy, and on Tuesday we had "a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees, of fat things full of marrow, of wines on the lees well refined." This fairly describes Mr. Dendy's thoughtful and suggestive paper read at the Sunday School Association Meeting, and it may also be describe the Essex Hall Lecture. That was certainly "full of marrow." In one's impression of a series of speeches there is usually one utterance which dominates the rest, and is likely to out-last them. My dominant impression was received on Tuesday night, despite the unfortunate interruptions.

The intensity of expression on some of the listening faces would have given hints to Scopas. In these days when a rather blatant Protestantism is on the war-path I thought the subject as timely as its treatment was magnificently impressive.

The singing of the National Anthem at the service on Wednesday morning impressed me very happily, though I must confess I did not care for the alterations in that time-honoured composition. I don't mind praying or singing "Scatter her enemies;" but "Make wars to cease" in the same breath seems rather a quick change. However this was only for the soprano solo, in which I did not join audibly.

The meeting on Wednesday evening struck me as rather too "cut and dried." I believe they manage these things better in other denominations. Fancy a great Baptist or Congregational meeting limited to four speakers whose deliverances were all longer than the average sermon! Careful, thoughtful, studied deliverances they were no doubt, but, perhaps, just a little wee bit too inevitable. There were no surprises, no novelties; but Unitarians are not like the Athenians of old. They do not "spend their time in nothing else, but either to tell, or hear some new thing." If they did they would be disappointed sometimes.

I am sorry to say that an engagement to interview J. M. W. Turner at the Guildhall prevented me from attending the Conference. As my impressions of that meeting have been received only from your admirable report in last week's INQUIRER, you will not thank me for recording them.

The conversazione at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours was as thronged as ever. If I were an impressionist painter with a good memory, I would send the result to the next exhibition at Knightsbridge. Such a quickly moving, struggling, entangled mass of colour and form would be very effective. Some think the Institute is not quite large enough. I don't know about that. I suppose we ought to be grateful for the opportunity of being crowded and crushed by our fellow non-subscribing, Presbyterian, Free or Liberal Christians. These are some of my impressions. I have a few more; but I think these will be sufficient.

Newport, I.W. CLEMENT E. PIKE.

VII.

You ask for my impressions of last week's meetings. They are fairly well expressed by your own INQUIRER word last week—that is, I felt them to be encouraging—full of encouragement.

Owing to Sunday-school and other engagements, I had not been able to attend the London meetings till this year for about seven years, and, of course, after so long an absence, I missed many old friends, and noticed some changes. The most striking of these changes was the feeling that somehow we had got out into the open air more than formerly, and more into touch with the world and its affairs. My most distinct recollection of the last meeting I was able to attend, is of a tremendous fight on the subject as to whether questions which might be interpreted from the political or social standpoint should be discussed at these meetings at all. Last week these things seemed to come as natural as possible, and no one appeared "a penny the worse." I faithfully attended all the meetings, beginning with that of the Sunday-school Association, and listened with admiration to our friend Mr. John Dendy, who had got hold of the right end of the stick when he was telling us that if we wish to reform the world of humanity we must begin with the children, and that every teacher should aim at being a social reformer in the highest and best sense of that word. Then following on came that which has left the most vivid impression on my mind—namely, Mr. Wicksteed's Essex Hall Lecture, worthy, indeed, of "the most free and enlightened and advanced sect in Christendom," as we were described in a local print last week. Like Dr. Herford, I want to get hold of the book, and expect to have a good time then. Mentioning the name of Dr. Herford recalls many pleasant recollections and impressions.

It is always good to see him about, and we thank him on the one hand for his Presidential address on "Our Word and Work"—perhaps one of the most distinctly encouraging utterances of the whole series—and on the other for his bright geniality throughout the whole time. I think there was a brotherly and friendly feeling in the meetings this time which showed itself on many occasions. Very useful also was Mr. Hargrove's paper on "The Claims of the Sacerdotalists," which went clean down to the roots of this mighty problem, as he insisted that the appeal must be to the bar of reason and experience. "In what respect is a man the better that he is participator of the good offices of the priesthood," that is the supreme test—of course, comparing him with one of like piety who is not a participator in these offices. The subjects of the papers and sermon were important and living. Mr. Agate gave us the right note; but there were so many other notes and noises that it was not easy to follow his from the far end of the church where I sat. Surely something could be done to deaden the effect of the heavy traffic passing by the church. I had noticed it before, but never so much as this time. Then, again, I should like to add a word with regard to the Postal Mission Meeting and the admirable address delivered by Miss Clephan. There was a grip of realities in it which was very delightful, and gave one the impression that the work of this Mission is a very valuable and important work. Now I must close however, and would only add that of all the friends I missed from the meetings, I thought most of our suffering friend R. A. Armstrong, and am quite sure that a resolution expressing sympathy with him in his continued illness would have met with the approval of all attending the meetings. It was doubtless passed and carried in many minds. On the whole, I feel that the meetings of this year have been full of encouragement.

VIII.

The chief general impression made on my mind by the meetings this year is of a negative character—the absence of any special impression. There was much that was good and useful and interesting, but nothing to rouse the audience to excitement or enthusiasm. There were no burning questions to discuss, no new and large proposals to consider, and no fresh marvel of inspiration to penetrate the soul and spring up as a fountain of living water. There was help to thought and encouragement and instruction, but nothing particularly striking. The mental and spiritual atmosphere resembled that outside: it was cool and grey. Such at least was my impression. Perhaps it would have been somewhat different if I had heard Dr. Herford's speech. For in that, even when only read, there is a strong note of encouragement. By placing our work in its true relation to the great religious movement of which it forms a small but conspicuous part, he has done much to deepen our sense of its worth without any exaggeration of its size; and without anything of the corporate egotism that claims the general advance of religious Liberalism as the work of our little Church. At the same time he made good our rightful claim to our share in the honour, and renewed our feeling of the essential importance of the work that we are able to do.

The two parts of the proceedings that most impressed me were Mr. Wicksteed's lecture and Mr. Hargrove's paper. Mr. Wicksteed's lecture did not fulfil the expectations raised by the title. It was not a general comparison of Mediævalism and Modern Thought; and it had a curious philosophical aloofness from the controversies of the hour. But it was a deeply religious spiritual discourse, impressing upon us with great power a few thoughts which he traced to mediæval thinkers. The impression made by the strong and reverent personality of the lecturer on the delivery was so marked that much will certainly be lost by those who only read the lecture in print.

Mr. Hargrove's paper went straight to the decisive point in the controversy with sacerdotalism; the absence of moral effects corresponding to the supernatural efficacy which is attributed to the sacraments. It seemed to me that he depreciated too much the importance of the arguments from the New Testament and from early Christian History. But he brought out with admirable force and clearness the irresistible argument from moral experience.

I have only to add, further, that the reports of work done by the various organisations were of a distinctly encouraging character.

IX.

I was only able to be present at a portion of the meetings, so that my "impressions" must be read with that reservation. The attendance seemed to be smaller than usual, and the atmosphere was by no means so charged with interest and expectation as was the case at the memorable meetings of 1898. A number of our best-known men were remarkable by their (perhaps unavoidable) absence. We missed the assistance of Klein and Armstrong, Wood and Jacks, Drummond and Carpenter. In such days as these, and with such problems to face, one realises what our churches have lost in a Crosskey and a Beard; one realises, too, what a huge gain it is to our Baptist friends to have the clear, courageous leadership of a Dr. Clifford. One of the most gratifying features of the meetings, in the view of the present writer, was the strong and statesmanlike line taken, on the sacerdotal controversy, by Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee. For nearly 200 years the action of the English Presbyterian Churches on "the Church Question" has been largely paralysed owing to the vain dream of a really comprehensive establishment clung to with a pathetic persistence by many of them. Have they gained anything, for all their pains? Are the formularies or the spirit of the establishment one whit broader or more comprehensive than they were at the outset of the struggle? No; there is only one line along which there is any real prospect of breaking the ancient fetters and inaugurating a period of religious progress, and that is the clear and persistent advocacy of Disestablishment and religious equality. Why is the Nonconformist phalanx to be deprived of our assistance? If we stand aside, with folded hands, at this crisis in the religious history of our country, we lose, perhaps for ever, the hold of our movement on the mind and heart of progressive and liberal England. Two other "impressions" of the meetings I would here briefly mention, in conclusion. Mr. C. J. Street did good service to our cause by his clear statement of the elementary principles which should govern the attitude of our churches and ministers towards social and political questions. One might have hoped that this vindication had been unnecessary; but the experience of some recent meetings proves that there are some who take a surprisingly narrow and exclusive view of the functions of our religious assemblies. The other matter to which I should like to draw attention was the bad arrangement of the "Time-Table" at the meeting on Wednesday morning. Such vastly important subjects as the Peace Conference, Sunday Newspapers, &c., were "polished off" at almost break-neck speed, whilst the bulk of the sitting was given over to formal and complimentary speeches and resolutions. This is not the way to make our meetings successful, or to make our influence felt in the wider circle of the public mind. In conclusion, let me say that the good and wholesome words of Dr. Herford on Wednesday night must have brought "courage and cheer" to the heart of many a country parson.

THE Rev. J. Page Hopps writes:—Will you be so hospitable as to let me ask the attention of your readers to an advertisement in your columns concerning my change of address? In September I hope to be able to give an address that will last my life. Till then, Rushworth, Ashburton-road, Croydon, will find me.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHER AS SOCIAL REFORMER.

IV.

I do not think that the admirable paper read by Mr. John Dendy to the Sunday School Association should be expected to lead to any lengthened discussion. It was really not a debating-class paper, but a very earnest sermon—a sermon to Sunday-school teachers, with some significant remarks to Christian ministers. A good sermon is a thing not to be debated, but to be understood and obeyed. I can imagine, meanwhile, that Mr. Dendy, like any other preacher, might like to know what effect his words have had upon the minds of his hearers; whether they have apprehended his thought, whether they are likely to be better for his advice, or whether he will need yet again to insist on the same truth and to chide the same negligence.

As far as the ministers are concerned, I believe we understood him only too well. We know that the evils which he referred to, in language at once so convincing and so restrained, do certainly exist: we know how inadequate the efforts of the ministry have proved to be: we can sympathise with his desperate appeal to the Sunday-school teachers.

But when Mr. Dendy appeals to the Sunday-school teachers for the "plain speaking and clear teaching" which the pulpit fails to give, I can only remark that it would be an ominous sign if the response should be very eager or the promise very definite. The evils that have to be combated are gross and widespread. But the reticence of the clergy itself may suggest that these evils need to be very dextrously dealt with. If some hundreds of Sunday-school teachers should declare themselves ready to deal with the gambling madness, with the dishonest tricks of commercial life, and with the frightfully graded evils that may all be included under the word Impurity; if we knew that they would give word-pictures of these evils; if we thought that they would describe them in detail, should we feel sure that the result would be blessed and only blessed?

Take one subject on which everybody considers himself at liberty to speak. Is it a good thing that almost every "Gospel Temperance" speaker compels his hearers to "go with him to the drunkard's home," to see the timid, crouching, hungry children, to hear the cries of the helpless wife, and so forth, with ceaseless reiteration and with limitless illustrations? According to my experience, the less instructed teachers in this department are precisely those who are most pictorial, and whose realistic descriptions are taken most faithfully from life. The clumsy Band of Hope rhymes, which I learned in my early days, full of references to drink and drunkards, were, I am sure, much more harmful in their effect on the youthful mind than the original nigger-songs to the tunes of which these rhymes were sung. I believe that more recent Band of Hope song-books are much more wholesome, more wholesome because more reticent. I have personally known more than one perfectly sincere Temperance worker whose best work was marred by a constant and unconsciously degrading habit of dwelling upon squalid details, the habit of holding up the mirror to Vice, and of holding a candle to the Evil One.

I have noticed, too, that just those who have more education and a finer spiritual instinct are those who avoid details, and deal with the evil which they deplore in a manner more delicate and reticent.

I am inclined to think, therefore, that the gross moral evils which disfigure our civilisation and besmudge our Christianity cannot wisely be made a common theme in our Sunday-schools. There are young men's and young women's classes where matters may be dealt with that cannot be very often or very definitely named in the pulpit. But even there those teachers will do most good, and do good with least risk of accompanying harm, who have learned, from their minister or elsewhere, the method of a wise restraint, and who know how to pass over that which is squalid and unwholesome, and to keep the main attention of the class on better things. For the ministry itself it would not become us to say anything in its defence. I do not believe that we have been consciously unfaithful. If we have sometimes supposed our congregations to be more free than they are from the faults of their time it has been an honest misjudgment, and not a politic pretence. We are grateful to be reminded of our duties, and would receive a layman's admonition in that spirit of self-examination and thoughtfulness which is all that we ask for in our own hearers.

J. RUDDLE.
Chorlton-cum-Hardy.

V.

It is as a Sunday-school teacher of over thirty-five years of active experience that I venture to join in the discussion of Mr. Dendy's thoughtful and enthusiastic address, and I feel the more inclined to do so lest the methods and ideals therein advocated should be stumbling-blocks of discouragement in the way of the average Sunday-school and Sunday-school teacher—the school that has small classes and few elder scholars; the teacher who can lay no claim to the knowledge and experience necessary to the Social Reformer.

It seems out of order that it should be so; yet it is to the Social Reformer, and not to the pulpit preacher, that we can with hope look for the combating with active sins and the abating of such of the grosser evils as impurity, gambling, and commercial dishonesty. Outspeaking on such subjects from the pulpit is rare and difficult—nay, owing to the attitude of the hearers, in many cases, quite impossible. The Social Reformer is not so dependent upon the tolerance of those who sit at his feet.

With the present material which is available for the supply of our Sunday-school teachers, even of the higher classes—and excellent material it is—it is unreasonable to expect that the terms Sunday-school teacher and Social Reformer can be synonymous. Few of us have the ability or the experience sufficient to do the reformer's work effectively. This difficulty is met with in the more advanced schools and teachers; and, of course, that difficulty would be more keenly felt were Mr. Dendy's methods attempted in our ordinary schools.

It should be noticed, too, that Mr. Dendy's address applies almost entirely to the teaching of classes of elder boys and girls. He would probably admit that the rational dealing with such subjects as personal impurity could not with hope or success, or even without disaster, form part of the curriculum of classes of younger children, and yet it is essential for success in that direction in after life that in some way or other the foundations of the principles on which the fight for a virtuous life should be laid even in the earliest years.

For the carrying out of the ideals towards which Mr. Dendy would have all strive, let our demand be not so much that the Sunday-school teacher here, there, and everywhere, shall pose as a Social Reformer, as that the Social Reformer shall join the ranks of Sunday-school teachers and take advantage of that best field for the sowing of seeds of right living—the rich fruitful ground of young lives.

But all this must not be allowed to discourage us—the ordinary Sunday-school teachers—in our work. We, too, may join in co-operation with the Social Reformer, and his ideals may be our ideals, and we may help him in his work. What can the Sunday-school teacher do among young children? He or she can do this—after all, the most important task—he or she can remove bad habits, and form good habits. With habits of cleanliness of thought and speech, habits of contentment, habits of unselfishness, the ground of the child's nature is made and kept ready for the sweet reasonableness which is perceived in the teaching of after life, and the teacher of right living has his task lightened and its success assured by firm, kindly influence which every teacher can and ought to exert on the little ones under his or her charge.

How is this to be done, and can every one do it? It is to be done by leading the child, by example and word, in daily intercourse towards the footsteps of Christ, under the influence of the touch of his spirit, and for this task every one, more or less, is fitted. One human heart seeking goodness, striving itself for a better life, can always lead a companion, even a short distance, on the way, and the footsteps trodden by young and tender feet become landmarks on the highroad of later life.

INCLUSION OR DISESTABLISHMENT?

We print below a letter on this subject, which we have received from the Editor of the Church Gazette, and which merits careful attention. There are some we know, and there may be many, to whom proposals for an inclusive National Church do not seem like a forlorn hope, in spite of the years that have elapsed since it was first ardently advanced. The brief discussion that arose in connection with Mr. Grosvenor Lee's paper at the recent Conference at Essex Hall indicated the existence of this optimist feeling in quarters which command hearty respect. It will, doubtless, be interesting to both sides to learn from the authority quoted, how our Broad Church friends look at the matter. The letter is as follows:—

18-20, Temple House,
Temple-avenue, E.C.

Dear Sir.—I desire, in a brotherly spirit, to call your attention, and that of your readers, to a change of feeling with regard to Disestablishment, looked on in the light of Church inclusiveness, which I think is coming largely into favour, both from within our Anglican body, and also from such as are at present without it.

From within, the organ of Church opinion, which I have the honour to represent—the Church Gazette—has from the outset advocated the nationalising of the National Church, and the rendering of its limits practically co-extensive with those of the religious thought of England, so far as the various existing bodies should desire or consent to inclusion. Of such bodies, the Romanists, by virtue of their exclusive claims, can never form one. The aim proposed is, of course, a final, not an immediate one, and the steps towards realising it do not as yet profess to be fully revealed. Still, the object is clear.

I may here remark that to this comprehensive view of Churchmanship many of the most influential organs of the secular Press have already given in their adhesion.

Among the Free Churches it has seemed to me and others that the same idea is beginning to be widely entertained, and to supersede the purely destructive alternative of Disestablishment. To them, too—especially the more thoughtful of their members—it has occurred that the Church is a national trust and belongs to no special section, and that it would be a grievous blunder to abdicate their rights, or fail to press them home, just at the moment when they have an opportunity of success; and a more grievous one to destroy what they are invited to share, or very soon may be, if they will work to that end. All this becomes to some of them specially convincing—if you will allow me to presume to say so—in view of the existing crisis occasioned by sacerdotal doctrines and practices in our body. For it happens that a large number, perhaps the majority of the extreme Romanisers in our Church, are throwing their influence on the side of Disestablishment, and that, not at all because they are eager to do justice to the abstract claims of equality, but because they see thus an opportunity both of throwing off restraints, and withal of securing a good share of the loaves and fishes from the general scramble, and so gaining their point all round.

Now I do not imagine that Nonconformists favour these men very much, therefore it is reasonable to suppose that they will hesitate to join hands with them, especially in pulling down an inheritance in which they soon may claim an interest.

For this view of the case I should, perhaps, supply some authority, and for this I may appeal confidently to such well-known names as Mr. Stead (vide last number of the Review of Reviews), the Rev. Price Hughes (there also mentioned), Mr. John Page Hopps, and many more equally prominent names.

It comes then, Sir, to this. May we not, all round, take breathing-time to reconsider the situation? May it not be well that the anti-Church position, equally with the anti-Dissent position, should be abandoned in favour of a policy of general inclusion and union on mutual terms—the formation of a National Church, which is really National? Of course, the how and the when cannot be even discussed in a first overture like this.—I am, Sir, yours, &c.

THE EDITOR of the Church Gazette.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT.

WHIT-WEEK has been an exciting time with us, just as it has been with our friends in London. Whit-week arrangements have to be commenced a long time beforehand, and they involve a considerable amount of anxiety and labour. Our scholars festival in the Free Trade Hall on Whit-Sunday is the actual beginning of our festivities. This year about 2,000 scholars assembled in the body of the hall and about 2,000 parents and friends in the galleries, and you can imagine what hearty singing we had. As usual, the hymns included original tunes by our own Unitarian musicians; and both the organist and conductor answered to the name of Heyes, a fact that is sufficient to prove to anyone in this district that they are Sunday-school enthusiasts. The Rev. J. J. Wright delivered an address on "Sincerity," the matter of which was exceptionally good: but its length, over forty minutes, seriously over-taxed the patience and attention of the scholars. It would be well for the Chairman on those occasions to ring a bell after the speaker has had fifteen minutes, and allow absolutely no one to address the scholars longer than that.

The Whit-week trips have, as usual, been a serious matter for some of us. They commenced on Wednesday and ended on Saturday—or in some cases on Sunday morning. The adults at one school were taking a trip to London on Whit-Saturday, and did not expect to reach Manchester on the return journey before six o'clock Sunday morning. The minister went with them, and afterwards had a full day's work in chapel and school. The weather was very unfavourable for us on Wednesday; it was excessively cold and very wet. In my own case, fortunately, we were able to spend a fairly pleasant afternoon and evening in our own school, instead of playing like drowned rats in a half-deluged meadow. Thursday was fine although cold, and Friday and Saturday were glorious days indeed. They began a spell of perfect June weather, which has lasted even until now. All this festivity makes it impossible for a considerable number of Manchester District ministers to be present at the London meetings in Whit-week. We feel our loss keenly; but I suppose we must remain content with the reports of the proceedings, which appear in our periodicals; though, of course, we miss the inspiration that waits upon personal attendance. The feeling amongst us, however, is that you had strong meat served you at your meetings, and that the occasion will be worthily deemed a memorable one.

We are naturally watching with considerable interest the progress of the arrangements for the London Bazaar; and we heartily congratulate our metropolitan friends upon the grand beginning they have made. Our Manchester District churches are not unmindful of the welcome help which London rendered them a year and a-half ago; and they are bent upon returning the compliment by providing a stall at the London Bazaar next May.

I suppose we really ought to feel thankful that there are continual demands in this district upon our generosity and enthusiasm; for it means that there is opportunity for work. Yet there are so many who pretend that they want a rest after every big effort. Though for the present we are opening up no new ground here, the young churches which we are organising and consolidating want all the generous enthusiasm we are capable of, just the same; and if any turn lukewarm and seek repose, it means that they wilfully shift the burden of work and responsibility upon the shoulders of their brethren. Our Forward Movement special subscription list comes to an end in this its sixth year, and some there are who think that the special effort they made at our recent bazaar relieves them from annual subscriptions for the future. If there were logic in this, then special efforts would scarcely be worth having. It has been surprising to some of us how little we can accomplish with £10,000. We are erecting buildings with it for new causes, and enabling some old causes to increase their facilities and strengthen their position; but when these things are completed in a few months' time, the demands made upon us for maintenance will for a period be almost as heavy as ever they were. Nor do we despair of their being met. Who can think of reducing his subscriptions towards the support of any good work in our midst, when all around us our neighbours are talking of twentieth-century funds, and, in response to earnest appeals, are raising almost fabulous sums for the purposes of religious efforts? Are we less generous than they? or afraid of spending a little more about our religion and a little less about our amusements? This is the time when the staunch and true amongst us, who are at the same time prosperous in worldly estate, will think of reassessing themselves on a higher scale, and thus give impetus and encouragement to many a languishing cause.

Our Manchester Domestic Missions are doing an admirable work—religiously and morally uplifting, and undenominational. For several years past, however, they have been allowed to get into low water financially, and about a year ago the Committee were startled by a revelation of the unsatisfactory state of the business aspect of their institution. The income was about £200 less than its ordinary expenditure. It shows that the heart of our people is right when it is said that last year about £150 additional annual subscriptions was secured; and at the end of this present year an anonymous friend has promised to give the sum of £200 if the income can be raised to cover the ordinary expenses. What an incentive for any treasurer to work for new and increased subscriptions! And what more favourable time than the present for putting such grand institutions as Domestic Missions upon a sound financial basis that shall guarantee efficient resource for years to come! The work at both Missions could be considerably extended if only the necessary money were forthcoming. It is hoped and believed that many friends in this district will respond to the appeal which will shortly be made to them.

Some time ago I wrote about Ye Cosie Nook in connection with the Renshaw-street Mission, and as I know there are many interested in the development of this novel venture, I should like to say that I hear it is still flourishing, and that its trade is being maintained during the summer days. A piano is still badly needed. Several little efforts have been made by means of smoking concerts and so on to raise the wind, and two or three pounds are already in hand. There is also a little debt remaining on the furnishing account, towards the liquidation of which the Rev. S. H. Street would be glad to receive donations. I am desirous to say that if any friend has already forwarded a donation to the Cosie Nook funds, without having received an official acknowledgment of the same, he or she is requested to communicate with Miss Mellor or Mr. Street who alone are authorised to appeal for money in connection with this laudable piece of work.

Our District Sunday School Association is always finding it desirable to extend its sphere of operations. For a provincial organisation its activities are unusually varied. It is now thinking of establishing a Holiday Home for its teachers and scholars; and in order to gain some practical data it has rented the Old Hall, Great Hucklow, for these current summer months. A generous friend has offered to pay for a number of camp bedsteads, &c., and it is estimated that the very large rooms of this farm-house will easily accommodate twenty or twenty-five young people. Should the party exceed this number—and one party at least will number about seventy—the villagers lay themselves out to cater for the surplus.

Several schools have already made fixtures, and a healthier situation cannot well be conceived. Great Hucklow is a thousand feet above the level of the sea, and though it cannot boast of much beauty of its own, it is within easy walking distance of very many picturesque spots. For some years past the Rev. C. Peach has been in the habit of taking scholars to Great Hucklow for a summer holiday; and recently the Rev. Lawrence Scott has offered to give a site free of cost, if the Association will erect a holiday home thereon. Last August I spent seven or eight days in this village, and can therefore speak from experience of its bracing air and generally healthy situation; and, moreover, I do not know a better centre in Derbyshire for most delightful walks. Besides, we have a chapel there and a schoolroom attached, which are willingly placed at the disposal of visitors from our own churches and Sunday-schools.

We are looking forward to our Provincial Assembly Meetings at Warrington next week. It is the annual gathering of the clans with us, and from past experience we know that our Warrington friends will not leave a stone unturned to make our visit to their town enjoyable and interesting.

AUSTRALIAN NOTES.

“By the long wash of Australasian seas Far off, they turn their heads to other stars,
And breathe in April-autumns.”—
(Apologies to the Shade of Tennyson).

Nor being a prophet nor a prophet's son, I yet ventured to assume that rôle in the few notes I last sent to THE INQUIRER, and the first item in these must be the statement that my prophecy has been fulfilled. “Spiritual Law thro' the Natural World” has produced a charge of heresy against its author, the Rev. H. Ferguson. The official machinery was set in motion early in March and had nearly completed its stated revolutions when the cause of all the commotion withdrew from the ring and resigned his ministry in the Presbyterian Church. This ought to have been done at first, and we should have been spared a great deal of angry controversy and one or two disgraceful scenes which were quite worthy, in temper and bitterness, of the Council of Nicæa, but jar a good deal on the modern mind where they do but make sport for the Philistines. Expulsion from a Church for opinion's sake is a mistake, but it must inevitably be committed whilst subscription to a definite formula is exacted; and Mr. Ferguson would have been well advised if he had quietly and honourably withdrawn after he had discovered his inability to comply with his ordination vow. He has taken most of his congregation with him, and they are worshipping in the Northcote Town Hall for the present. His book shows that he is really a Swedenborgian, but whether he will gravitate to that Church remains to be seen. Meanwhile the Presbyterian Church itself shows some disposition to move not in the direction of the abolition of subscription, but towards a “shorter creed.” The Federal Council, at its recent meeting in N.S.W., has decided “to shorten the creed,” but, it is said, it will not be altered in any essential point. It will be interesting to learn what the Presbyterians consider to be essential in the Westminster confession.

Within these last few weeks Australia has gained distinction by the creation of another sect. “The Australian Churches,” four in number, have issued a “basis of union.” The basis is broad and fairly tolerant. “The aim has been to frame a basis on which Churches at different stages of theological thought, and with varieties in ritual, might work together.” I believe the official title is to be, “The Australian Christian Church.” “General” Booth has just completed a successful mission in this city, and is now on his way to Tasmania. Coming across from Sydney the “General” made a frank confession which it is impossible not to regret. “He acknowledged having been a great rake in his young days, but reflection had caused him to reform, and he urged on those young men of Australia given to folly to sow their wild oats as quickly as possible.” This is an ill-judged utterance that may work mischief. It seems to encourage the belief that young men have “wild oats” to sow, and so incites to vice. But is it true? Is there any necessary, human or divine, for such a proceeding? I wish the “General” had told the young men of Australia, that sowing wild oats was sowing the wind to reap the whirlwind—was, in short, sin, for which they must suffer, even though they repent in sackcloth and ashes. Young men have no wild oats to sow, but strength to garner and to keep for a successful struggle with the world.

As to our own churches and work out here, I have not very much to communicate. From Sydney comes the cheering news that there are indications of success all round. The Sunday evening services have grown in interest and attendance. "A class of hard-thinking men, and advanced members of other denominations, are amongst the regular Sunday evening attendants. If the present rate of progress is kept up, a splendid record will be made at no distant date." "Auckland's first anniversary was marred by a tremendous deluge of rain, but the meeting arranged for the following Monday was a great success in every way. We hope when the next anniversary comes round the church there will be under the guidance of a competent minister and well on its way towards a great future." Hobart is going quietly on its way and well maintaining its ground, but I hear of no very great progress. Adelaide has suffered somewhat of late from the loss, by death, of some of its more influential members who have left no representatives, but is otherwise in a fairly satisfactory condition. Its minister, the Rev. A. Wilson, is out of health, and now on his way to England on a six months' leave of absence. At Melbourne we are settling down for our winter's work which we hope will bear some good results. We are only a small body, but we have various agencies in active work which, if we have patience and faint not, must in the end tell. In spite of the many difficulties which beset our work in the south, I look to the future with hope and confidence if we can only stir ourselves to be more loyal and faithful in the present. R. H. LAMBLEY.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEALS.

Blackfriars Mission and Stamford-street Chapel Summer Cottage.—Kindly allow me to make an appeal to your readers on behalf of the families whom we are sending this year to our summer cottage, Raynes Park, Surrey, to which, I may add, the benefit afforded to those sent for a week or fortnight into the country is great, both to parents and children. Last year we were able to give this change of scene and air, with, in many cases, a much-needed rest to about 200 persons in all. To do this requires financial aid, which will be very gladly received from any friends desirous of helping so desirable an institution by Mrs. David Martineau, South-road, Clapham Park, S.W., who so kindly acts, as for years past, as Hon. Treasurer to this department of our work at Stamford-street.—FREDERIC ALLEN.

London: Stratford.—The teachers of the Sunday-school earnestly solicit the assistance of friends to enable them to take the scholars for their annual excursion early in July. Donations will be thankfully received by Mr. W. J. Noel, Grove-hill, Woodford, Essex, Treasurer, or by the Secretary, Mr. George Shute, 53A, Romford-road, Stratford, Essex.

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—Our annual meeting has just been held, under the presidency of Mr. James Davidson. Mr. Henry Napier read the financial statement of the church, which went to prove that there was a small debit balance. Mr. Napier attributed this deficit to the fact that for some months of the year 1898 the congregation was very considerably incommenced by the enlargement operations, and also to the strenuous exertions made by one and all to wipe off the debt on the new building, and since the opening of the new church the attendance and the finances of the church had considerably improved. Dr. Munn, the Treasurer of the Building Fund, stated that, although over £800 had been spent on their church since Nov. 1, at the present time only £50 (since reduced to £35) remained unpaid. The B. and F.U.A. had contributed £50. The church officers are in treaty about the site for the school buildings. On Sunday, June 4, the first grand musical service was held in the new church, which was literally packed. The service was a Messiah and Elijah night. Miss Gordon and Mrs. Dr. Munn (soprano), Miss McKisack (contralto), Mr. Haughey (tenor), and Mr. Christopher Gordon (baritone) rendered solos and quartettes, while an increased choir, under the conductorship of the Rev. W. J. Davies, rendered "Cast thy Burden" (Elijah) and the "Hallelujah Chorus" (Messiah). Mr. Haughey presided at the organ. Mr. Davies elucidated the design of one of the three gift windows presented by Mrs. T. Hay Ritchie, of London, and representing the triumph of Christianity over the powers of heathendom. The church has still hard work in store to raise funds for the Mountpottinger Hall. Any help will be thankfully received by Dr. Munn or the Rev. W. J. Davies.

Birkenhead.—The difficulties raised by the Corporation, which have delayed the erection of the new schools in Bessborough-road, have now been successfully overcome, the Corporation having given way. On Sunday, May 28, after the morning service, a specially-summoned congregational meeting was held, the chairman, Mr. Frederick Moons, presiding, at which the following resolution was unanimously passed:—"That this meeting of the congregation of the Birkenhead Unitarian Church, duly summoned for the purpose, hereby authorises the committee to sell the site on which the present church building stands, and to make the necessary arrangements for the erection of a new church building in Bessborough-road." The resolution was supported by Mr. George Harvey Willmer, one of the trustees of the church, and by Messrs. James Samuelson and Charles Hibbert.

Burton-on-Trent.—Under the auspices of the Committee of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association a series of Unitarian services on Sunday afternoons, with addresses on "Doctrine and Practice," have been held in the Masonic Hall, conducted by the Rev. J. Birks, F.G.S., of Derby. On each occasion Mr. Birks was accompanied by members of the Derby choir and congregation, who cordially co-operated with him in the movement, which may result in the formation of a congregation in that town, which has a population of over 50,000 inhabitants.

Darlington.—A conversation for the purpose of extending a hearty welcome to the new minister, the Rev. H. Bodell Smith, was held in the Darlington Unitarian Church on Monday evening, there being an excellent attendance. Mr. and Mrs. E. Cox-Walker performed the duties of host and hostess. A capital musical programme was rendered, and in the course of the evening Mr. E. Cox-Walker offered a very hearty welcome to the new minister, the Rev. H. Bodell-Smith and Mrs. Smith. Unlike their late pastor, the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, B.A., the Rev. H. Bodell-Smith was not a new minister, but had previous to his arrival in Darlington ministered to several congregations. Mr. Smith (a church member), Mr. Crowther and Mr. Abrahams also spoke. The Rev. H. Bodell-Smith expressed his appreciation of the kindness of the members of the church in extending such a cordial welcome to himself and his wife. He had every faith in the desire of the congregation to do everything they could to help him as minister, and the progress of their cause in Darlington. Alluding to the position of the Unitarian faith the speaker quoted from an article written some years ago by Mr. Gladstone in one of the leading reviews in which the great statesman, referring to the Unitarian movement, said that their influence was far out of proportion to their numbers, and great Churchman as he was he went on to say that they were teachers of the teachers. They had evidence in every town where their movement was represented that their influence and work were much greater than the number of the members. The rev. gentleman then proceeded to give his views as to how the Unitarian faith might best be spread in Darlington. Refreshments were provided at intervals. Votes of thanks concluded a pleasant evening's entertainment.

Harrogate.—A series of six Sunday morning services has just been concluded here, the B. and F.U.A. and the Yorkshire Unitarian Union having generously supported the movement. The following ministers officiated—the Rev. C. H. Well-beloved, J. H. Weatherall, Mr. B. Chandra Pal, the Revs. E. W. Lummis, E. Ceredig Jones, and E. L. H. Thomas—the attendance being 19, 20, 36, 20, 35, and 22 respectively. It is believed that further efforts would at some future time be welcomed by those who have appreciated and enjoyed the services.

Liverpool: Hope-street Church.—Mr. Armstrong has benefited considerably from his stay at Blackpool, and shortly hopes to make a voyage to Newfoundland. The Rev. A. Cobden Smith, late of Burnley, has been appointed assistant minister for six months, and commenced his duties last Sunday.

London: Peckham.—The annual Sunday-school and Flower Services were held on Sunday last, when addresses were given by the minister (the Rev. G. Carter), on "The Supreme Law," "The Garden of Eden" (children's service), and "Sinning against the Child." In the evening, Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was admirably rendered by the choir, Miss Louie Carter sustaining the solos. Although the congregations were smaller than has been usual on special occasions, liberal contributions were made to the Sunday-school fund.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—The annual business meeting of the congregation was held in the Church of the Divine Unity, New Bridge-street, on Wednesday evening, May 31. The annual reports show that the position of the membership is slightly on the increase, and that the finances are on a very good basis. The income amounts to £766 odd, the expenditure being somewhat less leaves a small balance in hand. The ladies of the congregation are getting ready for the biennial bazaar, which is to be held at the end of the year. Mr. Otto Levin has undertaken the duties of secretary.

Richmond.—Before commencing morning service last Sunday, June 4, Mr. Farrington reminded his congregation that on the first Sunday of June, 1889, he preached for the first time in Richmond. That day, ten years ago, was bright and beautiful as this. June is ever a delightful month, and Richmond ever a delightful place. That first June Sunday offered only a hope for a liberal church in Richmond. This day promised, he trusted, the entire extinction of the debt upon the church. Opened in April, 1896, the church cost £5,516 11s. 1d. At its opening £839 of this was still unpaid. Gradually this amount has been reduced, until on May 1, some £215 was owing to the Bank. Collections were taken morning and evening with the result that, with donations from friends previously received, the entire sum is now provided for.

Sheffield: Upper Chapel.—On Sunday morning, the Rev. J. E. Manning preached a sermon on "A hopeful outlook—the Peace Conference," in which he expressed a fervent hope that good results would come from the deliberations proceeding at The Hague. He said there was a chance now open to the nations of Europe to mitigate the evils of war, such as had never occurred before, and, if it failed, such as might not occur again, and he exhorted all who love peace to pray to God that the chance might not prove abortive. At the close of the service the following message was signed on behalf of the congregation, to be forwarded at once to Sir Henry Howard at The Hague:—"A message of the members of Upper Chapel, Sheffield, to the Delegates to the Peace Congress, now sitting at The Hague. We, the members of the congregation worshipping in Upper Chapel (Unitarian), Norfolk-street, Sheffield, view with heartfelt gratification the assembling of the Peace Congress at The Hague, and we wish the representatives God-speed in their work. In the name of our Heavenly Father, we pray that their deliberations may be crowned with success, and result in the maintenance henceforth of peace among the nations.—Signed, on behalf of the congregation—J. E. Manning, M.A., minister; John G. Lowood, Alfred Beckett, trustees; Richard Fisher, George H. Hunt, members of committee; Edward Bramley, M.A., hon. sec. Sheffield, Sunday, June 4, 1899."

Stannington.—On Whit-Sunday the children of the Underbank Chapel Sunday-school met as usual, but owing to the state of the weather it was not possible for them to parade the village. A suitable religious service was held in the chapel at three o'clock, after which the children had tea in the school, and were succeeded by a large number of teachers and friends. A very pleasant evening was spent in social converse and various games. On the following Sunday the anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. Hugon S. Taylor, M.A., of Dukinfield. There was a large congregation in the afternoon, and in the evening the chapel was filled to overflowing, numbers not being able to get in. Between the services about 150 took tea in the school.

Whitchurch.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on Sunday last the Rev. Lawrence Scott, of Denton, being the preacher, assisted by our minister, the Rev. W. F. Turland. The congregations were very good, especially in the evening, when the church was full, and the collections exceeded those of last year.

Yorkshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—On Saturday afternoon last, in place of the usual quarterly Conference, a number of teachers, elder scholars, and friends from schools included in the above Union had a ramble in the woods and valleys surrounding this delightful district, under the leadership of Mr. H. Dyson, of Halifax. After enjoying the marvellously picturesque scenery to the full, the party made a circuitous track to the schoolroom at Elland, where a substantial tea had been provided by the ladies of the Elland congregation. At a subsequent meeting held in the chapel, the President of the Union (the Rev. J. G. Slater, Pudsey) took the chair. After short and interesting addresses by the Chairman, Messrs. F. Clayton, H. Dyson, Hill, Lodge, and the Rev. J. Taylor, a resolution was unanimously passed congratulating Mr. C. H. Boyle, one of the secretaries of the Union, on the occasion of his marriage, and trusting that he and his bride may be blest with good health and true happiness, the motion being proposed by Mr. Fred. Clayton, and seconded by Mr. Dyson. Thanks to the Elland friends for their hospitality and devotional exercises brought a happy meeting to a close.

COUNTRY AIR FOR WEAK AND AILING CHILDREN.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—Mrs. Talbot, 10s.; Wood Green Congregation collected by Mr. Sudbery, £2 10s.; Mrs. Griffiths, £2 2s.; Mrs. Frank Jolly, 10s.; Miss Preston, £1 1s.; Mrs. Smithells, £2; John Warren, Esq., £1 1s.; Miss Warren, £1 1s.; Miss E. Taylor, £1. Correction from previous week, R. Hibbert, Esq., £1 1s., should be R. Harris, Esq., £1 1s.

MATTHEW HENRY'S CHAPEL, CHESTER.

BI-CENTENARY RESTORATION FUND.

The roof and ceiling of the Ancient Chapel (1700) are now dangerous. The architects recommend entirely new ones. Much dilapidated in other respects, renovation is urgently needed. The cost of these restorations will be £750, or more. Towards this sum the congregation and trustees, with some old members and friends, have subscribed £320, which may be increased. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has given £50.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

It is a matter of the deepest regret that the protracted disputes concerning one of our ancient chapels should apparently be doomed to be thrashed out in the Law Courts. It would be highly improper, of course, for us to express any opinion on the matters sub judice, and the Editor is in no way responsible for the statements which are made in the advertisement which appears in our issue this week.

THE afternoon of next Sunday week, July 25, is fixed for the aggregate service, at Essex Hall, of elder scholars in connection with our London Sunday-schools. Last year's service was a great success in point of attendance and every other way, and there is no reason to fear any falling off this year. The experiment is being tried of joining in a special liturgical form of service, suitable to children; and the address will be given by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, the new minister of our Hackney congregation.

THE educational status of our industrial population ought to be much benefited by the passing of Mr. Robson's Bill to raise the age of "half-timers" from eleven to twelve. The House of Lords is capable of much, but it will hardly dare to destroy a Bill which has passed its third reading in the Commons without a division. Besides, it may consider that sufficient injury has been done to the measure already by the insertion of provisions exempting the agricultural districts from its control during the busy season. The consensus of opinion in favour of the principle of the Bill has been very cheering.

THE "annual proceedings," at Manchester College on Thursday and Friday next will be very noteworthy for many past students and friends of the College, on account of the termination of Professor Carpenter's work on the regular teaching staff. No doubt the attendance of visitors and trustees will be larger on this account, but, however this may be, there will be but one feeling of grateful appreciation of labours so long and so faithfully rendered to the College, and one wish that Professor Carpenter may fully enjoy the comparative release from pressure which his resignation of regular professional duties will secure, and that for many years to come he may still bring forth the ripe fruit of his studies.

WE hail with much pleasure the achievement of Mr. Birtwistle, of Burnley, and Mr. Paranjpye, of Bombay, in getting bracketed as Senior Wranglers this year. Mr. Birtwistle is a son of the people, and his course from a Wesleyan day-school to the Senior Wranglership has been marked by steady and consistent effort of a most successful kind. Mr. Paranjpye is of gentle birth, but the accident of race would in other days have been against him. To-day it only adds to the general interest in his success. We believe he is the third Indian Wrangler. The first was Mr. A. M. Bose, the present President of the Sadharan Brahmo Samaj. He was generally expected to top the list in his year, and doubtless would have done so, but for domestic trouble befalling him at the time of the examination. Mr. D. N. Das, the next successful Indian, was a Bengali like Mr. Bose. It is now Bombay's turn to be proud of her son, while England is proud of them all.

An egregious example was afforded at the close of last week by the breaking out of a newspaper tempest in consequence of the failure of Sir A. Milner to arrange an agreement with President Kruger. Of course, this was a troublesome incident, and equally, of course, we all expect and demand that our Government shall maintain unimpaired the dignity of the Empire and the rights of its citizens. But to read the heated paragraphs, to say nothing of the placards of certain journals, one would have thought that nothing but war, and war of a particularly odious kind, must follow the breakdown of the negotiations with the ruler of the Transvaal. Happily, things are not going towards any such goal in a hurry, and we venture to say it would be a great disgrace to diplomacy and statecraft if ever they reached it. Granted that the Boers are stubborn, is there so much need to us of this "Naboth's vineyard" of a state that we have not patience enough to wear down an unintelligent opposition in a better way than by breaking heads? To tell the truth, also, as to certain things on the other side, have they not been a little trying to the patience of the Boers? We should have despaired of British common-sense if the Government had shown itself as truculent as some of our ultra-patriotic patriots seemed to take for granted. But two or three days of cool reflection have changed the tone of these people wonderfully, and it appears pretty certain that we are not going at present to impress the Conference at The Hague with so capital an instance of how not to do it as would be afforded by a war of this kind.

THE Guardian draws attention to a "Marked Testament," copies of which, it says, have been plentifully and gratuitously distributed among the clergy by means of the post. "The marking" consists, it appears, of strongly-drawn black and red lines under or around certain isolated passages. Our contemporary very properly points out that this method of treating the Bible is injurious and misleading; it adds a remark with which we are only so far in agreement as it appeals from the "tinkering" method of study to one worthier of the subject. It says the persons responsible for this latest piece of propagandism "are an apparently self-appointed committee of laymen," at the head of them being a successful manufacturer recently raised to the peerage. There is nothing that we know of in the act of one's receiving a title or succeeding in business, to prevent one from being a serious and really helpful guide in Biblical study; and, of course, the Guardian's antipathy to lay instructors of the clergy is a feeling which rather suggests a certain amusement than commands our unreserved assent. But when anyone, lay or clergy, deals with the Bible as these misguided and misleading persons have done, severing passages from their context and setting specially-approved doctrines in startling relief, while whole chapters of loftiest Scripture are passed by as unimportant, there is good ground for complaint. Our contemporary misses, as is natural, the emphasis which it would itself lay upon passages in support of the sacramental theory; but it also says that the whole of the Sermon on the Mount is left unmarked, and it describes this as a "really shocking feature." With which remark we emphatically agree; but, alas! the omission is but too characteristic of a certain type of doctrinal evangelisation.

IF the Archbishop of Canterbury is correctly reported as declaring that to try and "teach the Bible" without Creeds is like trying to teach arithmetic without the use of the multiplication table, the remark only illustrates the baneful effect of that non-natural spiritual atmosphere in which it has been his misfortune to live. His remark is, we grant, in full accord with the traditional claim of "the Church"—namely, that the Bible needs an interpreter, and that "the Church" is that interpreter which God himself has supplied to an ignorant and perishing world. Moreover, it must be granted that a truly intelligent exposition of the Scriptures does demand that the expounder shall have arrived at certain clear principles of criticism, not only as to the text and its historical and geographical implications, but also as to its spiritual significance. But that is a very different thing from the position to which Dr. Temple's remark points as the correct one. He would have us believe that, once for all, the Creeds have settled what principles alone can be adopted, and that to set them aside is to depart from the one teacher of scriptural truth. It is this notion that has led to such deplorably erroneous interpretation of the Bible as render it for many readers the least intelligible of literatures. The Creeds say, for instance, that Jesus was God; therefore any Scripture that seems to say the opposite must be twisted about till it no longer contradicts the Creeds. Heterodoxy, it must be confessed, has had its experiments of the same kind. It has had its foot-rule of a Creed and insisted that Old and New Testament must alike accommodate to its measure. Happily that stage is past or passing; still more happily there are hundreds of teachers and parents who have found a way to educate and inspire their children from the pages of the Bible without the conscious use of any Creed, save that God is good and loves goodness. If an illustration be needed, may we not find an admirable one in Miss Gertrude Martineau's "Children's Column" in our issue this week?

ON Saturday, July 8, Milton's Comus is to be performed with appropriate costumes, &c., on behalf of the Permanent Building Fund for which the Grand Bazaar is to be held next year. If, as may be reasonably expected, the summer will know its own mind by that date and will leave off playing at winter, we may accept the scenes amidst which this classical play-poem is to be given as about the most appropriate possible. The performance is to take place at Upper Heath, Hampstead, the beautiful grounds there being lent by Mr. J. S. Lister and the Misses Lister. It was in these very grounds, then the bowling-green of the "Old Upper Flask," that Richardson saw with the mind's eye, and duly pictured for his readers, an interesting episode in the career of "Clarissa Harlowe." We suggest that no good friend of the Fund will consider himself to have done his duty until he at least takes a ticket for so interesting an occasion.

EVERY life may be made beautiful by the way it is lived, and the more trying the circumstances the greater the victory may become. Whether we have a poor inheritance or a good one makes less difference than our attitude towards it. If it be good, one must learn how to deserve and keep it. If it be poor, here is an opportunity for self-development. To him that overcometh, more shall be given. It is not what our parents have done for us, but what we meet and master that gives us power.—Horatio W. Dresser.

LITERATURE.

WAS CHRIST BORN IN BETHLEHEM?*

A book so learned and able as this of Professor Ramsay's cannot possibly be reviewed adequately in the columns of a weekly newspaper. Its arguments cannot even be fully stated, much less criticised within the limits of an article in THE INQUIRER. What such a book demands is careful and detailed consideration in a theological review. Here only the most general sketch can be attempted.

Professor Ramsay is a specialist in the antiquities of Asia Minor. He has travelled extensively in that country, and has investigated on the spot monuments, inscriptions, and manuscripts which throw light upon early Christian history. The result of that study was to make him believe that the writer of the Acts of the Apostles was a much more accurate historian than modern biblical critics had imagined him to be. In a former book, called "St. Paul the Traveller," he says: "Great historians are the rarest of writers. By general consent the typical example of the highest class of historians is Thucydides. But while recognising the risk of the probable condemnation that awaits the rash attempt, I will venture to add one to the number of the critics by stating in the following chapters reasons for placing the author of Acts among the historians of the first rank." To claim this is to claim a great deal more than most students of Acts are prepared to admit. It is, however, impossible to discuss here Professor Ramsay's reasons for his statement. It must be sufficient to note that he comes to his study of Luke's Gospel convinced that its author is one of the first of historians, who may be compared not unfitly with Thucydides himself for impartiality and recognition of the value of evidence. We all admit, of course, that the author or compiler of the Acts of the Apostles is identical with the author or compiler of the third Gospel, so that if a critic comes to the conclusion that the author of the Acts can make no mistakes, it naturally leads him to the belief that the author of Luke's Gospel is equally impeccable. This explains Professor Ramsay's somewhat irritating attitude in the book before us. He evidently starts with a strong preconception in favour of Luke's absolute trustworthiness, and the book makes the impression of a piece of special pleading. The ordinary reader would be more open to the force of Professor Ramsay's arguments if he felt more of the judge and less of the barrister in his exposition.

Our confidence in Professor Ramsay's judgment is shaken before we arrive at his main contention. He is quite certain that the first two chapters of Luke's Gospel were narrated to Luke by the Virgin Mary herself, or by some intimate friend of hers, probably a woman, "because he had a marked sympathy with women." "We can argue," he says, "with perfect confidence that Luke did not take the narrative of the birth and childhood of Christ from mere current talk and general belief: he had it in a form for which Mary herself was, in his opinion, the responsible authority." "It is plain that the historian either believed his statements to be based on the authority of the Virgin Mary herself, or has deliberately tried to create a false impression that such was the case."

That is practically the old and, we had thought, the exploded argument of ignorant orthodoxy, and is unworthy of a scholar like Professor Ramsay. It is not fair criticism to say that the Gospels must have been either impudent fabrications, or that they must be absolutely true. Luke tells us, in his introduction, that his authorities were "eye-witnesses and ministers of the Word." If he had claimed that he had drawn all his information from eye-witnesses, it would be difficult to avoid Professor Ramsay's dilemma. But "ministers of the Word" point to authorities of a much more questionable kind. It means that Luke incorporated in his narrative statements which he heard from travelling preachers forty or fifty years after the death of Jesus. He would do this in perfectly good faith: the stories were beautiful, they were well known, and having been created by the Christian consciousness, their poetry was in harmony with the prose of Christ's life. The bare facts of the life of Jesus was set to music in the popular imagination, and the first two chapters of Luke's Gospel give us the best known and most beautiful of what may be called these musical accompaniments. This theory finds legendary stories in the Gospel derived from these whom Luke calls "the ministers of the Word," and casts no discredit upon Luke for the fact. "Ministers of the Word" are sometimes taken to mean the original disciples alone. If so, they were all eye-witnesses, and Luke would have no reason for stating that he had derived his information "from eye-witnesses and ministers of the Word." Professor Ramsay lays much stress on the literary power of Luke; but if "ministers of the Word" are all included under eye-witnesses, he is convicted of a clumsy tautology. The fact that "ministers of the Word" came second point to Luke's feeling that they have less authority than the eye-witnesses.

This theory of legendary sources adopted in good faith by Luke may or may not be true, but, at any rate, Professor Ramsay fills us with distrust when he ignores it altogether, and affirms that Luke must either have received his information from the Virgin Mother, or be branded as an impostor. The chief aim of the book, however, is to prove Luke's accuracy upon one point, and it is with these arguments that we must now deal, and not with the unfortunate manner in which they are expressed. This point is concerned with the first two verses of the second chapter of Luke's Gospel: "Now it came to pass in those days that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus that all the world should be enrolled. This was the first enrolment made when Quirinius was Governor of Syria." Three points are generally admitted:—

- 1.—There was a general enrolment of the Roman Empire made in A.D. 6.
- 2.—Quirinius was Governor of Syria in A.D. 6, and the enrolment then was made by him.
- 3.—Jesus was born between the year B.C. 8 and B.C. 3—that is, from ten to fourteen years before the enrolment, which was made when Quirinius was Governor of Syria.

The natural conclusion from these admissions is that Luke or his authority has made a mistake. It is a similar error to that in Acts v. 36, when Gamaliel is made to refer to the rebellion of a certain Theudas. The only Theudas known to history caused a rebellion in Palestine after Gamaliel delivered his speech. Professor Ramsay treats both these apparent mistakes in the same way. He asserts there must have been another Theudas who lived some years earlier, and who also caused a rebellion. He admits that this hypothetical Theudas is absolutely unknown to history, but he asserts that he must have existed, because otherwise Luke would have been proved to have made a historical blunder, which is unthinkable. In the same way he asserts that there must have been an earlier enrolment of some kind, taken, as Luke says, about B.C. 6, and that Quirinius must have been an official in Syria at that time as well as in A.D. 6.

He does not, however, ask us to accept this as he does in the case of Theudas, merely because Luke would otherwise be found to have made a mistake. There is, indeed, no record of such an enrolment in B.C. 6, but he adduces facts which point to the possibility, or even the likelihood, of such an event having taken place. He also brings forward evidence to show that Quirinius was twice Governor of Syria, and that the famous governorship in A.D. 6 was the second. These are the two chief difficulties, although, even if they are overcome, we must still wonder why Joseph should be compelled to go up from Nazareth to Bethlehem, and still more why he should be obliged to take his wife with him. Professor Ramsay's arguments cannot be fully dealt with here. His whole theory depends on the discovery that enrolments were made in Egypt in the years A.D. 90, 104, 118, 132, and so on till 230. When was this system of fourteen-yearly enrolments inaugurated? No one supposes it began in A.D. 90. "Every one who has studied the history of Roman provincial administration will reply that Augustus was, in all probability, the originator of the Roman system in Egypt." His first year was dated from B.C. 23, when he received the tribunician power. There is some evidence from Egyptian papyri to show that no periodic enrolment began in that year. If not, and if a principle of an enrolment every fourteen years was introduced, the first enrolment would be in B.C. 9. Professor Ramsay then believes that "in all probability Augustus inaugurated a series of enrolments in Egypt." If he did so in Egypt, why should he not have done so also in Palestine? An enrolment ordered in B.C. 9 would be taken in B.C. 8, and that would bring it within the range of the birth-year of Jesus. The second enrolment would be in A.D. 6, and would be the well-known one taken when Quirinius was Governor of Syria for the second time. There is no evidence of any enrolment anywhere in A.D. 20, but in A.D. 34, and again in A.D. 48, mention is made of a census of Roman citizens. In A.D. 62 no census is mentioned, but in A.D. 73-74 a census was taken by Vespasian, thus anticipating the proper period by three years. Professor Ramsay regards this as an indication that a system of enrolment every fourteen years was common throughout the empire, and that it began in B.C. 9. Indeed, he speaks much more strongly:—"Any rational and scholarly criticism must accept the conclusion," he says: "There was a system of periodic enrolment in the province of Syria according to a fourteen years' cycle, and the first enrolment was made in the spring of B.C. 8." And yet the evidence for this belief, without accepting which we cannot be either rational or scholarly, is very little more than has been stated. It depends on the discovery that enrolments took place in Egypt towards the end of the first century at intervals of fourteen years, and that there are traces of enrolments in the Roman Empire at earlier periods which agree with the fourteen years' cycle principle. From this it is concluded that an enrolment took place in Syria in B.C. 8. The only person who mentions an enrolment in B.C. 8 is Tertullian, who declares that an enrolment was made by Sentius Saturninus, who was Governor of Syria from B.C. 9-7. This apparently contradicts Luke's statement that the census was taken when Quirinius was governor, but is regarded by Professor Ramsay as independent testimony to the fact that an enrolment did take place. He explains the difference about the governors by arguing that the census was ordered in B.C. 9, when Saturninus was governor; but that owing to wars and domestic troubles it could not be taken until B.C. 6, when Quirinius was officially present in Syria, and when Jesus was probably born.

These arguments may be well worth considering, and they are certainly presented with great skill by Professor Ramsay; but it is almost inconceivable that a man should be so much in love with his own theory as to maintain "that any fair and scholarly criticism" must accept a conclusion based on arguments like this.

No jury, not even a French one, would convict upon such evidence.

The second difficulty with regard to Quirinius' governorship of Syria can only be mentioned very briefly. Apologists for Luke maintain that Quirinius was Governor in B.C. 6 as well as in A.D. 6. Professor Ramsay's argument is founded on an inscription which records the career and honour of a Roman official who lived in the reign of Augustus. It is stated of this nameless official that he twice governed Syria. This man, it is believed on general grounds, was Quirinius. Mommsen's authority is quoted for this opinion. If Mommsen is to be quoted at all, it should be remembered that while he thinks this inscription may refer to Quirinius, he is totally unconvinced by Professor Ramsay's enrolment argument, and that he is therefore neither a fair nor a scholarly critic.

Even if, however, it be admitted that Quirinius was twice Governor of Syria, we must ask what was the date of the first governorship. Mommsen considers the most probable date was about B.C. 3-1. If so, nothing whatever is gained towards proving the truth of Luke's story. Professor Ramsay then shifts his ground and argues that Quirinius was not Governor of Syria, but on a special mission for pacifying warlike tribes in B.C. 6, and that it was in that capacity the census was held by him. "The conclusion of the whole matter is this," he says. "The first periodic enrolment of Syria was made by Saturninus in B.C. 8-7. The enrolment of Palestine was delayed by the causes described until B.C. 6. At that time Varus was controlling the internal affairs of Syria, while Quirinius was commanding its armies." Luke is, therefore, correct in saying that the census was taken while Quirinius was acting as leader in Syria. The cogency of this argument depends entirely upon whether Quirinius really was in Syria at all in B.C. 6, and this is entirely unproved. Professor Ramsay's method of argument is provoking, to say the least. "The probability is that in B.C. 7, when Varus came to govern Syria, Augustus perceived that the internal affairs of the province would require all the energy of the regular Governor, and sent a special officer to administer the military resources of the province and conduct the war." An experienced officer was needed. Thus Quirinius conducted the war pretty certainly in B.C. 6, perhaps in 7 and 6, perhaps in 6 and 5; and then from these probabilities and pretty certainties he goes on to speak as if the presence of Quirinius in Syria in B.C. 6 were definitely proved. This is a general outline of the argument. Sidelights and small indications which Professor Ramsay regards as in his favour cannot possibly be dealt with here. The conclusion seems to us that we are presented with a clever and interesting example of special pleading, but that the case is not proved. Luke, or his authorities, must still be held to have made a mistake. If so, the journey to Bethlehem is without any explanation. It will be regarded as a legendary creation in response to the popular belief that the Christ must have been in Bethlehem, and we are left with the conclusion that the historic Jesus was, in all probability, born in Nazareth. Those of us who care only for what Jesus was will not be in the least disturbed by the result.

NOTES FROM ASSAM.—II.

Jowai, in the Khasi Hills,
Assam, India, May 4, 1899.

THE Khasis undoubtedly belong to the Mongolian type of the human family. The women, on the average, are fairer and more handsome than the men. In disposition they are affable, gentle, and cheerful; rather industrious, but devoid of ingenuity and mechanical skill. This is probably owing to ages of isolation. In the industrial arts, such as masonry, carpentry, and cultivation, they respond to training; and what they can achieve in this line has of late years risen to a considerable level of excellence. The males are courageous. Both sexes evince great powers of endurance to fatigue. The people appreciate music, and have a good ear for European tunes. The females have sweet, womanly voices, and those taught by the missionaries sing hymns very well. The standard of morality has not been high, but under the influences of education and religion it has gradually risen, and will go on slowly rising. The people, I am told, have lost something of the simplicity that used to characterise them, and have caught some of the trickeries of the Hindus of the plains with whom they have come into contact. The dress is not so scanty as I have seen on thousands of natives in Madras and Calcutta. It is sufficient to cover them without being irksome in moving about their mountainous country. They are fond of show; and on festive occasions both sexes at their dances and ceremonies wear handsome and expensive silk dresses, with gold and silver ornaments, earrings and necklaces. Coral necklaces are much prized by both men and women. In the men's apparel they are frequently made to hang down to the waist. The more costly necklaces are made of large-size coral beads, arranged alternately with gold beads, and sometimes of coral alone, and they are valued as high as 1,200 to 1,500 rupees.

Opium, ganja, and such like drugs, are not used by the hill people. The men are fond of liquor, which is brewed from rice and millet. Spirits are also distilled from the same ingredients. The women, however, rarely touch liquor of any kind. Both sexes are inveterate betel-nut and pan-chewers. They begin this practice at a very early age, and may be said to live and die with pan in their mouths. The practice is said to be beneficial to their health, as it aids digestion. An adult will chew as many as five or six mouthfuls of pan and betel-nut a day. The demand for these products is very large, and an enormous export trade is done in betel and pan.

The religion of the Khasis is demon-worship or a jumble of enchantments muttered by priests who are sorcerers. They invoke evil spirits as the deputies of God, and the instruments of His pleasure or displeasure. They believe in metempsychosis, or the transmigration of souls. After death, human beings are transformed into monkeys, crabs, tortoises, frogs, &c.

Though the ideas of the attributes of a Godhead are not clearly grasped, yet a Supreme Creator is acknowledged. The following is the tradition relating to the creation of man:—"God, in the beginning, having created man, placed him on the earth; but, on returning to look at him, found he had been destroyed by the evil spirit. This happened a second time, whereupon the Deity created a dog, then a man; and the dog, who kept watch, prevented the Devil from destroying the man, and the work of the Deity was thus preserved." For this reason the Khasis regard the dog as a sacred animal, and will not touch its flesh as food.

From the sacrificial formulæ and the style of invocation used by soothsayers who perform sacrifices, the Khasi religion may be briefly defined as forms used to cure diseases and to avert misfortunes by ascertaining the name of the demon as the author of the evil, and the kind of sacrifice necessary to appease it. In connection with the cremation of their dead, the Khasis have a curious custom. Before the burning takes place, the arrows are shot, one to the east and another to the west; a cock is then sacrificed. The arrows are intended for the protection of the dead on his way to another world. The cock is to show the dead the way to the other world, and to wake him at dawn, so that he may pursue his journey.

A remarkable feature in the scenery of the Khasi Hills consists of groups of upright stones of various sizes. These are erected in honour of the dead. They are usually seen in the neighbourhood of villages, and near frequented roads—the idea being that the spirits of the dead will be gratified by memorials of them being placed where they will be noticed by passers-by. The memorial stones are sometimes of great weight and size, and the wonder is how they were brought to the spot. The stones are placed in a line, the highest in the centre, and the smaller ones on each side. The centre monument is sometimes covered with a round flat stone. The number of erections are from three to five or seven, but many larger groups are to be seen; but in these cases stones have been added in honour of other members of the family, or sometimes by people of other families. The rule is that, in the first instance, the stones should be put up by the maternal relatives of the deceased—the one in the centre being in honour of the maternal uncle, and one on each side in honour of the deceased and of deceased's father. Others are then added in honour of ancestors; to the spirits of whom prayer is made.

The Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Mission has been labouring amongst the Khasis and Syntengs for fifty-eight or sixty years. Long ago the whole of the Old and New Testaments were published in Khasi, besides other religious books, and, in addition, several works on the language have been published by the Welsh Mission. There are now some 300 Mission stations of this denomination in the hills, with about eighty European ministers, and a large body of travelling evangelists. Education is entrusted to the missionaries of the Welsh Calvinistic Foreign Missionary Society, who are assisted by Government by a grant-in-aid; and the schools are found all over the hills. There can be no doubt that steady progress has been, and is being, made, and that the Welsh Methodist Mission exercises a civilising and beneficial influence. I am informed that the congregation at Jowai numbers about 400, and that the Day School contains about 150 pupils. But though this Mission has existed here for more than half-a-century, there are still some 1,200 people in Jowai untouched by it. The mass of the people in the Khasi Hills are still in a low state of civilisation. Although they acknowledge one Supreme Being, their religious practices, as we have seen, consist chiefly in offering sacrifices to demons and spirits for the sole purpose of gaining worldly prosperity, and not for the purpose of advancing their moral and spiritual welfare. Experience has proved that the prevailing form of Christianity—Calvinistic Methodism—notwithstanding all the good it has unquestionably accomplished, is adapted only for a certain stage of progress. The Liberal Faith, as preached by Unitarians and Brahmos, is the only form of religion suited to the monotheistic ideas of the Khasi people, and calculated to raise their spiritual life.

The Unitarian movement in these hills was begun by Mr. Hajom Kissor Singh in September, 1887. He was induced to start it by reading a stray volume of Dr. Channing's Works, and some Tracts sent out by the late Rev. C. H. A. Dall, Missionary to the American Unitarian Association in Calcutta. Under these influences he held religious services every now and then in his house at Jowai. After a time he was joined by the late U. Heh Pohlong, of Nongtalang. Both of them worked hard to disseminate the Liberal faith, and soon a small congregation was formed at Nongtalang. Mrs. Tomkins, who was in charge of the Unitarian Mission in Calcutta after the death of Mr.

Dall, sent copies of the Unitarian magazine, U.S.A., to Mr. Kissor Singh. This led him to write to its Editor, the Rev. J. T. Sunderland, for help. Mr. Sunderland gave Mr. Kissor Singh great encouragement, and supplied him with Unitarian literature for distribution. Being desirous to have a regular agency for preaching and propagating the Unitarian faith, but having no means of raising sufficient funds for the services of a preacher, he applied to Mr. Sunderland. Through Mr. Sunderland's efforts the National Alliance of Unitarian Women, U.S.A., supplied funds for the support of a preacher, who began work in May, 1892. Through the generosity of Miss Helen N. Bates and her friends of Waterville, Me., U.S.A., an edition of 500 copies of Khasi Hymn-book was printed by the Rev. J. T. Sunderland in America.

In August, 1893, a Unitarian congregation and day-school were formed in Jowai. In November, 1893, the care and support of the Mission was transferred to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Several Khasi Tracts were printed with funds contributed by Miss Emily Sharpe, of London. In consequence of the visit of the Rev. J. T. Sunderland to the Khasi Hills in 1896, a Unitarian Union was formally organised, with a Board of Management and an Executive Committee to carry out Mission work. Mr. David Edwards, then a lay-worker, was formally ordained a Unitarian minister and appointed as Marriage Registrar.

There are now three churches—at Jowai, Nongtalang, and Raliang—with a Mission at Shillong and Laitbyngkot. I shall speak of these institutions in a little detail in another letter. Meanwhile, it may be mentioned that the Mission Establishment consists of four paid preachers or lay-workers supported by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, a day-school at Jowai with two paid teachers, and a small daily morning school at Shillong, opened a few months ago by Mr. Mar Singh. The statistics of the movement on May 1, 1899, may be of interest. Jowai has a membership of 86, with an average attendance on Sunday of 70, and in 1898 it subscribed for ordinary purposes, 120 rupees. Nongtalang has a membership of 32, with an average attendance of 28, and it is now raising funds for the repair of its meeting-house. Raliang has a membership of 27, average attendance 15, and in 1898 it raised 4½ rupees. Laitbyngkot has a membership of 20, and in 1898 it raised 19 rupees. At Shillong Mission Station there is an average attendance of 25, and since July, 1898, it has raised 8 rupees. In six other small villages, where there is no regular meeting, there are 28 Unitarians, making a total membership in the Khasi Hills of 209. The sums mentioned for ordinary purposes do not exhaust the amounts raised by the people, as will be seen in my next.

GOD takes a thousand times more pains with us than the artist with his picture, by many touches of sorrow, and by many colours of circumstance, to bring man into the form which is the highest and noblest in His sight, if only we receive His gifts and myrrh in the right spirit, for no heart can conceive in what surpassing love God giveth us this myrrh.—John Tauler.

HENRY VAUGHAN, SILURIST.

I.

It is probable that a good many readers of the present day have their attention turned for the first time to Henry Vaughan, by the fine verses of Sir Lewis Morris inscribed "To an Unknown Poet" ("Songs of Two Worlds," ii., 1874), which begin thus:—

Dear friend, who, two long centuries ago,
Didst tread where since my grandsires trod,
Along thy devious Usk's untroubled flow,
Breathing thy soul to God.

I seek, I, born in these our later days,
Using the measure thou didst love,
With halting tribute of too tardy praise,
A poet throned above.

I in the selfsame venerable halls
And grey quadrangles made my home,
Which heard, new-built, within their recent walls,
Thy youthful footsteps come.

A little greyer now and stiller grown,
The tranquil refuge now, as then,
Where our dear country glories in her own,
Apart from alien men.

But Jesus College, Oxford, possesses no memorial of Henry Vaughan—and indeed, his connection with the College was, I believe, much briefer than is commonly supposed. Henry and his elder brother Thomas were twin sons of Thomas Vaughan, of Llansanfrid, co. Brecon. They were born in 1621, at Newton, now a farm-house on the road from Crickhowel to Brecon, close to the Usk which was to be celebrated in song by both of them. Their early instruction was received from a neighbouring clergyman, Matthew Herbert; and at the age of sixteen both were matriculated at Jesus College. From this point, in the absence of information, fancy begins to play around the two young Royalists, for undoubtedly such they were. It represents them as probably staying at Oxford during all the time of its being the headquarters of the King, his army, and his court, and only quitting it when Rupert went out, and the Parliament men came in, in June, 1646; and as abandoning, as many more did, the tutor for the drill-sergeant, and burning to serve the King in the field. Sir Lewis Morris takes the mythus through another stage of development.

Constrained by promptings of thy ancient race,

Thy gown and books thou flung'st away,
To meet the sturdy Roundhead face to face,
On many a hard-fought day.

What is known about the Oxford life of the two brothers is merely this: that both wrote verses to the Bodleian Library, Thomas in Latin, Henry in English; and both found the subject very uninspiring. In 1641 Henry contributed an even poorer copy of verses to a volume of congratulatory poems addressed to Charles I. on his return from Scotland. In the following February Thomas took his degree; Henry never graduated, and had by that time probably left the University, for Anthony à Wood preserves the statement that he was taken from Oxford after two years, and sent to London to obtain some knowledge of municipal law; and at the outbreak of the Civil War he was sent for home. This hardly gives time for Henry to have learned to "trail the puissant pike" in a college quadrangle: against the notion that he took an active part in warfare, his own words appear conclusive

Me nullam in tanta strage fuisse scias, where the context makes reference to the Civil War, I believe, unmistakable. Of Henry Vaughan's London life we have some slight traces in his first little volume, "Poems, with the Tenth Satire of Juvenal Englished" (1646). They amount to little more than this—that Vaughan and his "ingenuous friend R. W." occasionally "heard the chimes at midnight"; that they piously sought out the taverns which had been the resorts of wits and poets of the shining age, then closed, the last sparkles of which gleam on us in Herrick—where, however, the memory of "Great Ben" still lingered; that such piety involved copious libations and long scores; and that the labours expended by our author upon the municipal law were probably slight compared with those which he devoted to the celebration in verse of a certain "Amoret," with whom, he is quite sure, he has a "predestined sympathie." The poems to, and about, Amoret are highly spiritual, stilted, and superfine; as such they received the praise of no less a person than the Matchless Orinda, thus:— First shines thy Amoret, twice crowned by thee:

Once by thy love, next by thy poetrie,
Where thou the best of unions dost dispense,
Truth clothed in wit, and love in innocence.
So that the muddie lover may learn here,
No fountains can be sweet that are not clear.

But the modern reader would be apt to surmise that Amoret had no existence except on paper.

The early "Poems" belong to an episode that had quite closed before they appeared in print. Before 1646 Vaughan was in the old home at Newton, and was beginning to find himself sad and lonely. His "ingenuous friend R. W." had been killed in the engagement at Rowton Heath. "Orinda" and her husband, James Philips, of the Priory, Cardigan, were kind to him, and he made the Priory Grove "his usuall rettyrement," but they were some fifty miles away. "That famous and best of men," Dr. Thomas Powell, of Cantreff, a canon of St. David's, was near enough to be called a neighbour. But there was little close around him that was congenial, save the aspects of Nature. The people, in the first reaction against the old Church establishment, were in a state which we should characterise as Revivalism rather than as Puritanism, and poured contempt on the forms and ordinances which were dear to Vaughan. His brother Thomas, then Fellow of Jesus, received from a relative, Sir George Vaughan, presentation to the rectory of their native parish. How sweet would have been the communion of these twin brothers, if they could have spent their lives, so united by common tastes and studies, as well as by unclouded affection, together, amid the scenes they loved so deeply! But Thomas could not stay. "The unsettledness of the times hindering him a quiet possession" of his rectory, he left it, "retired to Oxon, and in a sedate repose prosecuted his medicinal geny, and at length became eminent in the chymical part thereof." He became, in fact, an alchemist and a Rosicrucian; was attacked for his theories of Proto-chemistry and the magical soul by no less a person than Henry More, the Cambridge Platonist, with whom he waged a controversy which involved the shedding of a great deal of academical bad language; and met his death, in 1665, by an accident which occurred in the course of one of his experiments.

"The unsettledness of the times" meant not merely that the people would not go to church; for Thomas Vaughan was formally deprived by Parliamentary Commissioners. And Henry seems to have suffered, even to the extent of imprisonment, as a "malignant." But he says hardly a word of any persecution. It is only that he is lonely, and self-centred, and turns longingly to the old forms of worship, and cannot get on with the "saints." Almost the only note of bitterness is to be found in the Preface to his beautiful prose-devotions, "The Mount of Olives" (1652), where, remarking that he lives in an age when men no longer need a book of prayers, he adds: "I envie not their frequent ecstasies and raptures to the third heaven, I only wish them real, and that their actions did not tell the world, they are rapt into some other place. Nor should they who assume to themselves the title of Saints be uncharitably moved, if we that are yet in the body, and carry our treasures in earthen vessels, have need of these helps." But it does not surprise us to learn that there were those who thought our poet "proud and humorous."

THE ATONEMENT.

SIR,—It is a pity that Mr. Drummond weights his valuable analysis of the different conceptions of the Atonement in its relation to the Incarnation by the really hopeless attempt to maintain a contrast between the Western doctrine which he condemns, and the teaching of Gregory of Nyssa, as to the nature of the redemptive act itself. "Augustine's doctrine of ransom is the product of a society based on slavery," he says. Well, but what of Gregory? In chapter xxii. of the Great Catechism he says: "For as they who have sold their liberty for money become slaves of their purchasers, as having bartered themselves away, and as neither they nor any one else can proclaim their freedom, however well born they may be who have hurried themselves into this disaster, and if any one in concern for him who is sold should proceed with violence against the purchaser, he will seem unrighteous, in that he arbitrarily rends away a legal possession; but if he desire to buy him back, there is no law to prohibit such doings, so &c." Gregory proceeds to show that this was the exact position in which man stood as the possession of the devil, that it was necessary to induce the devil to accept something which he regarded as an equivalent, and in virtue of it to relinquish his claim, and that God succeeded in deluding him into a bargain by which he lost man whom he possessed, and gained nothing in exchange. This is no obiter dictum or incidental by-product of Gregory's teaching on the subject, but an integral, nay, central, portion of it, running through chapter after chapter of a not very long treatise. I am quite at a loss to understand how Mr. Drummond can still "greatly doubt" whether we find in Gregory of Nyssa the doctrine that there was a "legally binding formula" which had to be dealt with before man could justly be rescued from the power of the devil.

With regard to Anselm there is fair ground for debate, and I am satisfied that many students would side with Mr. Drummond against me, if not in the relative estimate of Anselm's doctrine compared with that of other teachers, at least in the positive contention that Anselm represents man as "a debtor in the presence of a judge." I have always thought, however, that Anselm received hard measure from some of the most renowned historians of dogma. Baur, for instance, seems seriously to misrepresent him, and it is curious to note how far Harnack's interpolated comments go beyond the passages cited by him. The truth is that Anselm's language not only lends itself to misconception, but almost challenges it. The controlling clauses in the light of which his phrases should be interpreted, are perfectly explicit and emphatic, but they do not seem generally to stamp themselves effectively upon the reader's mind. In Book I., chap. xv., he explains that such terms as "dishonouring God" are purely relative to man, and indicate a subjective state which needs rectification, not an objective injury for which God demands compensation. I admit, however, that he himself pushes the language he regards as improper to great lengths.

But if I may venture to interpret Mr. Drummond's position, I believe that his real grievance against Anselm rests upon something much more solid than a questionable interpretation of his views as to the nature of the fallen state from which man had to be redeemed, and of the act by which he fell into it. Anselm's most ardent admirers must feel tantalised and disappointed by the entire absence, in the Cur Deus Homo, of any attempt to throw light on the nature of the union between God and man (a subject of which Gregory of Nyssa deals with at some length), or of any apparent consciousness that such a union was in itself supremely significant. He treats the Incarnation merely as a kind of expedient struck out in order to make the act of redemption possible. I believe Anselm conceives that act in an ethical and not a legal manner; but Mr. Drummond, both in his article and in his letter, implies, if I understand him rightly, that to subordinate the Incarnation to the redemptive act is, ipso facto, to take a "transactional" view of the Atonement, and so to degrade it. And from this point of view it is easy to understand why he finds Anselm so profoundly unsatisfactory.

I feel grateful to Mr. Drummond both for the emphasis which he has laid upon a vitally interesting point of doctrine, and for the courtesy with which he has replied to my questions; and if I have quarrelled with some of his historical statements, I am very sensible of the advantage I have derived from the clarifying insight manifested in his general treatment of the subject.

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

THE WHIT-WEEK MEETINGS.

SIR,—Now that most of the ministers who were present at these meetings have freely expressed their opinions on the subjects introduced and the papers read, it would be greatly helpful and suggestive as to our future guidance, if from the experience they gained you would kindly give us, in a leader, your summing-up of the week's results, and sound a clear bugle note of the route along which church and Sunday-school may advance.

The value of the reports read at these annual gatherings, and the papers and speeches bearing on them, is, I presume, that they should show us where we stood last year, where we stand now, and what should be our aim for the future; what advance we have made, if any, whether we shall continue on the same lines, or whether from the last year's experience any new departure is desirable. Consideration of practical matters of this kind ought surely be enough to occupy the best thoughts of the people met to hear them, without further diversion.

Starting from this basis, what shall be said, for instance, of the Tuesday afternoon gathering of the Sunday School Association? Can any zealous teacher then present pretend to be satisfied with the programme provided, or at its results? The remarks one heard on every hand were—"Where are the young teachers and crowds of bright faces that used to appear round the tables at the former breakfasts." "How can such vital interests as the Sunday-school have to deal with be adequately considered in two or three hours' meeting mainly taken up with reading a paper and passing business resolutions, the movers and seconders being strictly limited to five minutes each?" It was the pained, and even indignant, remark of many teachers that the Sunday School Association is being crowded out of the position it has held for so many years by other more aggressive and persistent interests. If this be so, it behoves the Committee to see to it, and that very speedily and decisively.

With regard to the paper read by Mr. Dendy, it would seem that all the ministers agree that the terrible subjects which he dwelt upon with such force are too delicate or too difficult to be dealt with in the pulpit, and therefore have to be relegated to the Sunday-school whose teachers consist mostly of young people, with not too much of the varied experiences of life, and children of from six to fourteen years of age. Is this the assembly upon which to shift the consideration of such matters as the pulpit declines to touch? I was upon one occasion standing at the superintendent's desk, when gasping sobs and shrieks from one of the classes suddenly startled all the school. A teacher had incidentally touched upon the wrongs which drink had brought upon a family she knew. One of the girls before her whose father had come home drunk the night before, and had cruelly beaten his wife and children, had the incident so brought thus home to her, that we had much difficulty in keeping her from fainting when led out.

Instead of directly attacking these evils in classes consisting mainly of young children—the adult classes can take care of themselves, perhaps—had we not better try with redoubled energy, ministers and laymen alike, to "train up in the way they should go," the young people under our care, that mind, heart, and soul should be so nourished with the knowledge of truth and righteousness as to instinctively shrink from even the appearance of evil when it presents itself? We better guard them, I believe, by sympathetic and affectionate treatment, by instilling into them the love of the good, the beautiful, the pure, and the holy, than by dealing directly with the wickedness and wretchedness with which we adults are unhappily forced to be only too familiar with.

How many of our schools or congregations have "Bands of Hope" or "Christian Endeavour" societies attached to them? How many of them are cared for and fostered as they ought to be by the congregations? I. M. WADE.

MINISTERS' STIPEND AUGMENTATION FUND.

At the annual meeting of the Committee of Management of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund, held in Liverpool on Wednesday, June 7, two new members of the Committee of Management—Mr. A. W. Worthington, of Stourbridge, and Mr. George Highfield Leigh, of Swinton—were, on the nomination of Mr. Harry Rawson, unanimously elected, to fill the vacancies on the Committee caused by the retirement of Mr. J. A. Kenrick, and the death of Mr. James Thornely.

Among other resolutions passed were the following:—

That the best thanks of the Committee of Management of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund be accorded to Miss Mary Anne Booth for her generous donation of £300 to the fund. That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Miss Booth.

That the members of the Committee of Management of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund desire to express their deep regret at the serious loss they have sustained by the death of their honoured colleague, James Thornely, Esq., the secretary of this fund from its formation in 1856 until 1897, on the resignation of which office he was appointed a member of the Committee of Management. His colleagues would place on record their high appreciation of the zeal and devotion with which he discharged his duties, coupled with a rare dignity and graciousness of spirit which endeared him to them. That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Mrs. Thornely and family.

That the members of the Committee of Management of the Ministers' Stipend Augmentation Fund desire to express their profound sympathy with the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., and James R. Beard, Esq., J.P., in their prolonged illness, and the sincere hope that they may speedily be restored to their wonted health and vigour, so that their colleagues may have the pleasure and advantage of their valued advice and co-operation. That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, B.A., and James R. Beard, Esq., J.P.

Let every dawn of morning be to you as the beginning of life, and every setting sun be to you as its close; then let every one of these short lives leave its sure record of some kindly thing done for others, some goodly strength or knowledge gained for yourselves; so from day to day and strength to strength you shall build up indeed, by Art, by Thought, and by Just Will an Ecclesia of England of which it shall not be said: "See what manner of stones are here," but "See what manner of men."—Ruskin.

THE INWARD LIFE.

Uncovenanted Mercies,

THE "uncovenanted mercies of God,"—we desire no less; we hope for no better. Those are the mercies beyond our height, beyond our depth, beyond our reach. We know in whom we have believed, and we look for that which it hath not entered into the heart of man to conceive. Shall God's thought be surpassed by man's thoughts? God's giving by man's asking? God's creation by man's imagination? No. Let us climb to the height of our Alpine desires; let us leave them behind us and ascend the spear-pointed Himalayas of our aspirations; still shall we find the depth of God's sapphire above us; still shall we find the heavens higher than the earth, and His thoughts and His ways higher than our thoughts and our ways.

Ah, Lord! be Thou in all our being; as not in the Sundays of our time alone, so not in the chambers of our hearts alone. We dare not think that Thou canst not, carest not; that some things are not for Thy beholding, some questions not to be asked of Thee. For are we not all Thine—utterly Thine? That which a man speaks not to his fellow, we speak to Thee. Our very passions we hold up to Thee, and say, "Behold, Lord! Think about us." We would not escape from our history by fleeing into the wilderness, by hiding our heads in the sands of forgetfulness, or the repentance that comes of pain, or the lethargy of hopelessness. We take it, as our very life, in our hand, and flee with it unto Thee. Triumphant is the answer which thou holdest for every doubt. It may be we could not understand it yet, even if Thou didst speak it "with most miraculous organ." But Thou shalt at least find faith in the earth, O Lord, if Thou comest to look for it now,—the faith of ignorant but hoping children, who know that they do not know, and believe that Thou knowest. GEORGE MACDONALD.

Children and Parents.

"Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of the old man, and fear thy God."—Exodus xix. 32.

"My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother."—Proverbs i. 8.

"A fool despiseth his father's instruction."—Proverbs xv. 5.

"He that wasteth his father and chaseth away his mother is a son that causeth shame and bringeth reproach."—Proverbs xix. 26.

"Hearken unto thy father, and despise not thy mother when she is old."—Proverbs xxiii. 22.

"But if any widow have children or nephews, let them learn first to show piety at home, and to requite their parents; for that is good and acceptable before God."—1 Timothy v. 4.

"Ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder."—1 Peter v. 5.

"Children, obey your parents."—Ephesians vi. 1., Coloss. iii. 20.

"Honour thy father and mother."—Exodus xx. 12, Ephesians vi. 2.

You will find these sentences, about the parents and elders who have brought us up, and many others of the same sort, in the Bible. They are all plain and easy to understand, and there is no doubt about their meaning. The Jews have always been remarkable, and are still, for their strong and reverent feeling to their parents; and it would be well if we all felt it as strongly. But it is sad to see how often even good and well-meaning children do not either "honour" their father and mother, or "obey" their parents; neither "learn first to show piety at home" nor "to requite their parents." This sounds badly. How then can they be "good children"?

I mean that they do not intentionally hurt or grieve their parents. They have no intention to be otherwise than good. But they are thoughtless, and do not consider. They are eager, and want to do something; they ask leave to do it, and the leave is refused. Then they are vexed, and try to get leave, nevertheless; they tease their parents about it, and do not "obey" their wishes promptly and trustfully. Perhaps in the end they do what they have been told not to do: perhaps they do not ask at all for fear of being refused, because they believe they would be refused. "My son, hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother. A fool despiseth his father's instruction."

It is not always easy to obey, when we want something very much and cannot see why we should not do it or have it. But obedience is none the less due to those who are so much older and know so much more than the children, and who see so much further than they can do. They have been with the children since they were born, and have led them and taught them and cared for them. What have they not done for the children? Think of the helpless little babies; of the care and constant attention they need; the patience and tender love with which the mother watches over each little child: every hour is given to care of them; the mother does not even think of pleasing herself; she nurses them, she feeds them and dresses them; and though she is often tired-out, still all her care is for them. They wake her out of her sleep; they call her off from what she is doing; they upset her newly tidied rooms; they tear and dirty their clothes, and she has to mend and wash them; but she does not grumble, because she loves the little things too well. And the children do not do these things because they are naughty, but because they have not yet learnt to do better; and the mother tries to teach them. It is only if they do not try to learn that they are naughty; and then they give pain to their parents. Think how the father goes day after day to his work. Why does not he stay at home and sit by the fire? Sometimes he is so tired; and sometimes he feels ill. Why should he go to work always? Because he wants to earn money for his wife and children: food and clothes and school books all cost money. The children are his children, and the wife is his wife, and it is his duty to keep them; and he obeys. Should not his children obey him and their mother? That is their duty; he teaches them by his example to do their duty; and if they become selfish and wilful, he and their mother are grieved. The least they can do to their parents in return for all that they have gladly sacrificed for the children's sakes is to "honour" and "obey" them. This is "to show piety at home" and to "requite" their parents.

And the honour which children should show to their parents, and which springs up deep within their hearts when they are loving and respectful children, will lead them to do all sorts of little services for their parents, and not leave them to do all the work. What a difference it makes to a mother if a child sees that she is working hard and tries to help her, or to do some little thing to please her. It lifts off all the weight, and makes even drudgery light and easy. There are many little things that all can do for their parents, if they look out; and how nice it is to do things for them before they ask us! Children have little idea how much they can do if they are awake and watchful to make home happy and be a comfort to their parents. Even if you fail to do what you meant, your parents see what was meant and are pleased. There was a little boy whose mother went out on a cold, wet day, and he knew she would be cold and wet when she came in. He fetched her shoes, and put them very near the fire to make them nice and warm for her. When she came in he ran to fetch the shoes, but he found them all burnt to a cinder! He had put them too near in his eagerness to get them warm. The poor little man began to cry—he was so disappointed; but his mother comforted and thanked him, and understood what he had wanted to do; and after a little while they both laughed over the funny old shrivelled shoes. Don't you think that, even though the shoes were burnt, the mother felt much happier and more cared for because of what her little boy had done?

Open your eyes and watch, and you will find ever so many things every day that you can do for your parents. And when you can see nothing else to do, you can promptly and cheerfully obey what they tell you to do, and give them no sorrow and anxiety. Then you will "requite" them, as far as that is possible at all, and will save them from the bitter disappointment of finding that after all the years of love and care their children are not what they hoped they would be.

There are many poor children who have parents who are neither good nor kind; and then it is much more difficult to know how much they are to obey them, and often impossible for them to honour or reverence them. But that is not so with any of you; and there is no doubt as to what you should do and be. Only for want of thought, for want of unselfishness, for want of respect, children often give pain and sorrow to their parents instead of being the joy and comfort that God means them to be.

And so, children, you whose father and mother are with you still, look at their faces, and remember that you have them now, and can be to them what no one else can be. What a happy time is now present to you: try and make your parents as happy as they make you: and whilst you thank God that they are still with you, you may be sure that they also thank God that you are with them.

"Honour thy father and thy mother."

LONDON, JUNE 17, 1899.

WILL IT SUCCEED?

THE question concerns London especially, but it has a wider scope also. The Metropolitan congregations are with evident zeal applying themselves to the effort of raising a large sum of money for the maintenance and increase of churches in the district. It is a really large sum, and considering the many regular and inevitable claims upon the generosity of our people, we cannot expect that it will be raised without some sacrifice. But it will be raised. There will be hours of anxiety, perhaps of despondency, on the part of the more impressionable of the promoters; but the money will come, there can be no doubt of it. Whether by the bazaar, or by subscriptions apart from that toilsome enterprise, the effort will so far succeed. It will be a great thing done, when it is done. It may, however, be a less thing than it ought to be.

We are not afraid of questions of money, although we could point to movements which have languished for years in circumstances wholly inadequate to the demands. The real matter is a question of life, not of money. What will it profit us to gain the whole world and have no soul at last? It is difficult to write on these things without falling into strains that seem exaggerated and unreal. It is difficult, also, to avoid expressions that seem to imply censorship, one over another. Let us quietly but firmly set aside things of that kind, and deliberately ask ourselves whether there is really to be any religion in this great movement of ours. Will the diligent workers and the liberal givers really perceive that it is all worth while, honestly if not also gloriously so? What about our services this year—will they be thoroughly well attended? Will there be any increase of faith and hope and charity amongst us? Will those who have hitherto but languidly and at intervals taken their part in our philanthropies come to see that it has been a sad mistake, grievous to earnest souls around them, but infinitely sadder for their own lives? Will the young men and women glow with a fresh passion for the service of God, for the good and the true and the beautiful? If some acute observer shall come amongst us at intervals in this period of financial effort, will he get favourable results from such tests as these—are there more lives being helped, are they more helped, is worship heartier and preaching more inspiring, are the children sensible of something specially happy and specially wise and strong in all that goes on in the schools and classes and meetings of all kinds?

Let us take that last test, and look well at it. There cannot be a more important one. For, admirable as a permanent building fund may be, these who are growing up with us are to be the builders; nay, they are to be the veritable church, without which the visible structures are so many "follies"—Unitarian, Free Christian, or whatever else may be their title. It will be in vain that we shall build, except the Lord build up these lives with us and for us. Here, as we said, the question that cries out to us in London, louder (if we have ears to hear) than all the appeals of worthy committees, is a question of widest application. Our good friends in and about Manchester made their great financial effort a short time ago; but, as Mr. ROPER said last week in his letter to us, they cannot afford to be slack now, as if all were done. Here and there, in truly remarkable abundance, "special efforts" are being, or have been, made throughout the land. Good; for the tiniest "special effort" grows out of, or is aided by, somebody's faith and love—notwithstanding the admixture of other motives that may at times be at work. Wherever they are made, may they succeed with the success that is not in cash alone; no, nor even in numbers alone. For what we long to see is not the mere crowd—a thing which often testifies to the ingenuity of advertising more than to anything better. The hearts of all who have felt the truths of religion as the touch of God upon their lives desire that this above all should prove itself to be the feeling predominant in our midst. It would be alien to our ways to proclaim a "great revival"—though we confess we should very much like the thing without its dangerous and usually disappointing heats and fervours. Call it what we will, cannot this thing, the re-birth of a devout and consecrated life, be sought by us, above all the rest? Cannot we pray for it with one another and in our own chambers, believing that there is ONE who does answer such prayers beyond all that we can ask or think? This is a matter that lies at the centre of our life as a people.

What our churches in London and elsewhere will be in the next century must greatly depend on their spirit, the life-blood pulsing in them now and here. If this be poor and mean, spite of all the worldly "successes" we may attain, shame and only shame can await them. But the life of our churches shall not be poor and mean, for God is with us. He has given us the faith to cherish which is the most beautiful, the most glorious in the history of religion.

THE CONGREGATION OF RENSHAW-STREET CHAPEL, LIVERPOOL.

THE congregation that for eighty-eight years has worshipped in Renshaw-street Chapel, Liverpool, gathered for the last time on Sunday last for the accustomed services in the old house of prayer, and to-morrow will enter into possession of the beautiful new church which has been built in Sefton Park. The migration from a place of meeting, rich in sacred memories to many who throughout their lives have known no other religious home, cannot be made without inevitable regrets, but the gains have been judged by the congregation to be far greater than the loss. In future there will be not two city churches of our fellowship within five minutes' walk of one another, but Hope-street Church remaining in the city, and the new church in Sefton Park within much easier access of the out-lying suburban districts, from which for many years the congregation has been largely drawn.

The history of the congregation is by no means confined to the past eighty-eight years, but looks back upon more than two centuries from which are drawn its honourable traditions of earnest religious life. At the beginning of the seventeenth century the Puritans of Toxteth Park gathered together for worship, and for them was built the little chapel, which has now long been known as the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, of which in 1618 RICHARD MATHER became the first minister. He and the ARCHBISHOP of York were not of one mind, and being put to silence in this country, he became the father of the MATHERS of New England. In 1662 the congregation, with a Nonconforming minister, was for some reason left undisturbed, and the chapel became, what it still is, a dissenting place of worship. In 1688 CHRISTOPHER RICHARDSON was one of its ministers, and about that time became also the first minister of a new congregation of Nonconformists in Liverpool itself, preaching on alternate Sundays in the Park and in the near neighbourhood of the old church of St. Nicholas. Three chapels in succession have been occupied by this congregation, which, on RICHARDSON'S death in 1698, arranged with the Toxteth congregation for a separation of their ministries and entered on an independent career. The first chapel in Castle-Hey was succeeded in 1727, during the ministry of Dr. HENRY WINDER, by the more commodious Benn's Garden Chapel, to which, in its turn, succeeded Renshaw-street Chapel, opened in 1811, which now again gives place to the new Sefton Park Church. Thus in the immense growth of the city the first congregation of Liverpool Nonconformists has returned to the neighbourhood of its ancient rural ally, but will not on that account forget or neglect its duties to the crowded quarters of the city, in which it remains, together with Hope-street Church, represented by two active Domestic Missions, and by the personal service of many of its members in those missions and in other works of beneficence and public usefulness.

Of the ministers in the last century one of the most notable was Dr. WILLIAM ENFIELD, who was at Benn's Garden from 1763 until 1770, when he succeeded Dr. AIKIN, the father of Mrs. BARBAULD, in the chair of divinity at Warrington Academy. The author of "Enfield's Speaker," he was also known as the accomplished editor of more than one hymn-book, while his own best known hymn—

"Behold, where in a mortal form Appears each grace Divine"— retained in the new hymn-book of the congregation, is typical, no less than the published volumes of his sermons, of the piety and broad humanity of his nature. He is one of the worthiest representatives of liberal nonconformity, during the period of transition, through the older Arianism to modern Unitarianism.

But after all, as we look down the roll of the ministers of this congregation, we do not think that it is because they are nearer our own time that two names stand out with peculiar lustre. JOHN HAMILTON THOM became minister of Renshaw-street Chapel in 1831, and concluded his stated ministry in 1866. CHARLES BEARD succeeded him in the following year, and remained until his death in 1888. From such teachers the congregation inherits a great tradition of catholic and spiritual faith, of Christian discipleship rich in personal graces and unwearied in well-doing, both in secret charities and in efforts of public beneficence. And the roll of the laymen of the congregation is no less significant than that of its ministers. The names of ROSCOE, RATHBONE, HOLT, GAIR, MELLY, BOOTH, each in several generations, are but the chief among many who have illustrated in many traits of honourable manhood—as good citizens, as merchants without reproach, as reformers, as philanthropists, as men of letters, as teachers and helpers of their brethren—the ideal of Christian discipleship and of the present Kingdom of God, to which their members have borne a constant witness.

The congregation which is about to enter into its new house of prayer is pledged to Truth, to Liberty, and to Religion. Under new conditions of life, with new aspects of thought pressing upon the mind, new problems of righteousness and humanity pressing upon the conscience, it is called to maintain the same loyalty to truth, in the freedom of the Spirit, with the same lowly surrender of an earnest religious life, as the fathers of the generations that are past. The inheritors of the open future enter upon a great privilege and a sacred trust; they will not fear to accept them, in the spirit of their fathers' faithfulness, in the joy of consecrated service, and in the strength of the living God.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

THE annual meeting was held at Hull on Wednesday last, and considering the distance from the chief centres of the district, was fairly attended. Service was held in the Park-street Church at 11.45, conducted by the Rev. E. W. LUMMIS, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. J. C. STREET, of Shrewsbury.

Taking his text from Hosea x. 12, "Break up your fallow ground," Mr. Street said that at no time had there been a more urgent call to them to gird on the armour of their faith and do battle with error and sin. They were living in the midst of unparalleled activities, and of the peaceful triumphs of labour. The material advancement of late years had been immense. But there was danger that everything should give place to the pursuit of wealth, and the interests of religion, though not forgotten, had suffered. The earnestness of former days seemed to be gone; self-renunciation was regarded as an old-fashioned virtue. That severance of life from religion he regarded as largely chargeable on the Churches themselves. They had preached a dogmatic religion alien to the world, and had denounced the things of the world as hostile to religion. Then there had been unseemly jarring between the Churches themselves, in the conflicts of doctrine and ritual, which had alienated the sympathies of practical men. In obedience to the requirements of trade and commerce, large populations were drawn together in new districts, and were largely left without religious ministrations. There was the fallow ground calling for their efforts. They need not go to foreign lands to find the heathen needing their help. It was a great opportunity and a solemn duty laid upon them, and the day was theirs, for he felt that they were more fitted than their brethren of other Churches to meet the need. For first, they rejoiced in the commercial activity about them, and believed labour to be a blessing, not a curse; there was no natural hostility between religion and the world. Both were from God and were divine; only the work must be honourably done. Then they had no part in the disputes of the Churches. They did not seek to make sectarians, but people that loved God and man, suspicious of nothing but evil. And in that fallow ground were many who had grown up without dogmatic fetters or sectarian prepossession, virgin soil ready to receive the impressions of religion they could give. They must not rest in the enjoyment of the truth they possessed, but must make it known to as many as possible, regardless of misrepresentation and opposition. Men were hungry for the bread they could give. Unitarianism was the vanguard of the great Church of humanity which was yet to be. As leaders they must go onward. The work of destruction had been accomplished; now the work of reconstruction was waiting to be done. They must build for the future and for God. The present was theirs, given them by God; to-morrow was in His hand. The preacher ended with a fervent appeal for renewed faithfulness in the service.

The collection in aid of the funds of the Union amounted to £7 11s. 6d., to which, however, some further additions were made.

The service was followed by lunch at the Grosvenor Hotel, at which the toast of "The Queen," given by the Rev. A. Chalmers, who presided, was duly honoured.

At the business meeting held in the church at three o'clock, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot was voted into the chair, as the President desired to be left free for his other duties.

On the motion of the CHAIRMAN, the annual report, which had been printed and previously circulated, was taken as read.

THE REPORT.

The report opened with a word of congratulation to the Dewsbury congregation on the spirit with which they had taken up their new position as an independent church. The recent bazaar, opened by Lady O'Hagan, had been very successful. At Huddersfield a successful bazaar had also been held. The Rev. W. Mellor has been welcomed as minister, and the congregation was in a better position than for some years past. The Rev. James Taylor's joint charge of Elland and Pepperhill had been terminated; the Elland congregation had appointed him their minister, and Pepperhill was supplied by ministers and lay-preachers on alternate Sundays. Lydgate Chapel and parsonage needing repairs and alterations, a bazaar was announced for July. A new effort had been made at Harrogate, where three week-evening lectures had been given in the People's Hotel by the Revs. C. Hargrove, F. Walters and C. J. Street; these were followed by a series of six Sunday morning services, with moderate attendances. The great loss sustained in the death of Mr. W. T. Marriott, of Wakefield, was regretfully recorded, also the death of the Rev. Thomas Hincks, Mr. Michael Hunter, of Sheffield, and Mr. Thomas Kershaw, of Huddersfield.

The accounts showed that the year had opened with an adverse balance of £44 11s. 5d., which had been increased to £55 2s. 6d., and would have amounted to £100, had it not been for a welcome donation of £45 from Mr. H. J. Morton, of Scarborough. Congregational collections in support of the work of the Union amounted to £69 9s. 2d., annual subscriptions to £136 6s. 6d.; grants amounting to £57 10s. were received from B. and F.U.A. The total receipts of £390 7s. 2d. included £40, proceeds from the sale of Selby Chapel which remained in hand. A total of £330 14s. 2d. was paid in various grants and for supplies to the aided congregations at Pudsey, Elland and Pepperhill, Doncaster, Lydgate, Selby, Malton, and Huddersfield, and £10 towards the new effort at Harrogate. The total with adverse balance was £445 9s. 8d.

Miss ALICE LUCAS then read the report of the Yorkshire Postal Mission, which showed that as a result of advertisements in various papers, 131 new applications for literature, chiefly from men, had been received; from a few of the applicants' repeated requests for books and most interesting correspondence had followed,

The report gave extracts from several letters from various parts of the world, showing how real was the service of the Mission in ministering to religious needs.

The CHAIRMAN moved the adoption of the reports and the election of the officers, the Rev. A. Chalmers being re-elected president, and Mr. J. S. Mathers and the Rev. E. C. Jones vice-presidents, Mr. F. R. Pesel, treasurer, Mr. E. Basil Lupton, secretary, and the Rev. J. Ellis, supply secretary. In doing so, he pointed out the significance of the fact that scholastic journals proved good organs for the Postal Mission advertisements, and dwelt upon the value of the work accomplished. The operations of the Union could be greatly extended and strengthened, if only more means were placed at their disposal. They asked a great deal of their ministers, and ought to see that they were worthily supported. They were often told that Unitarianism was not extending. But numbers did not govern any great movement, and certainly their modes of thought were being greatly extended. As they believed in Unitarianism, they must work in faith for its success.

Mr. J. S. MATHERS, in seconding, referred to the pleasure with which the Committee of the Union had received the invitation to hold that meeting at Hull, where the annual meeting had not previously been held. He then spoke of the financial weakness of the Union, and of the pain it was to the Committee, in attempting to carry on their work among the aided churches to be constantly checked by the lack of funds. It was with a feeling akin to shame that he came to such meetings where their ministers were expected to be present, often at real sacrifice because of the scanty measure of support they received. It was impossible to break any new ground while the funds remained as they were; yet there were large districts and centres of population in Yorkshire where the message of their faith ought to be heard.

The Rev. E. W. LUMMIS supported the resolution, and expressed the pleasure of the Hull congregation in receiving the Union.

Mr. HAINSWORTH, of Leeds, regretted that it was impossible to make any forward movement.

Mr. E. B. LUPTON pointed out that a new effort was being made at Harrogate, but so long as the Union did not receive more support, it could not help as they would wish.

The resolution having been adopted, Mr. H. J. MORTON moved, "That the Rev. J. C. Street be thanked for his able and eloquent sermon." The Rev. F. H. WILLIAMS seconded the resolution, which was also supported by Mr. Counsellor HANGER, Mr. W. B. HOLMES, who added the thanks of the Hull congregation for the school sermons preached by Mr. Street on Sunday last, and by Mr. DONALD WILSON. All the speakers expressed themselves in warm terms of appreciation and thankfulness to the preacher for his encouraging words.

The Rev. J. C. STREET, in acknowledging the vote, confessed that he was an optimist and that his optimism was based on experience, and not least, on experience of the life of their own group of churches, in which he had been labouring for nearly forty years. During those years eighty new churches had been added to their fellowship, and he refused to be discouraged. They were, it is true, pioneers, but still they made progress, and a large group of pioneers could do better work than a small group. They did not expect to convert all the Churches to their own way of thinking; they did not aim at a sectarian triumph, but represented a method, and showed the way of progress in religion. They were not satisfied themselves, but still pressed forward, and trusted that others would do the same. They were God's advanced guard, and on would come the people after them.

The President then gave an address on

"YORKSHIRE UNITARIANISM."

The story of Yorkshire Unitarianism, he said, was of absorbing interest, especially its earlier episodes, but few cared to trace the older churches to their remote foundation. Indeed, ecclesiastical history to many of those who filled their pews seemed like a survival from a sunken world. Of the noble band of the 2,000 ejected ministers of 1662, at least 123 were Yorkshire incumbents—a large proportion when the extent of the parishes and the number of the people were considered. Indeed there was nothing in the annals of the county of which its sons and daughters had greater reason to be proud; but the stirring tale was unknown. The rough competitions of athletic champions were more to modern taste than the moral victories of the fathers. Nevertheless, they stood in the line of that succession, and in spite of changed beliefs, they could claim to be of the same flesh and blood as their Puritan forbears. About half of their churches were born out of that struggle, or sprang later from the impetus which it gave. And these had all a strong infusion of democratic blood, although, in some cases, the lesser gentry formed their inner circle. There was not one of those congregations whose history was not well worth writing, and many a tale of steadfastness in danger and difficulty remained to be recorded. Each from the first had its own distinctive character and worked out its own salvation in its special way. It would be a pious task to resuscitate that now-forgotten life, and to treasure it as a sacred memorial.

He could not in that address give even an outline of the history of what might be called the "heroic age," which, like the traditional wanderings in the wilderness, covered a space of forty years from 1662 to the death of Oliver Heywood in May, 1702. A second period of about seventy years brought them to the close of Priestley's ministry at Mill Hill, and this may be described as a quiescent era. The churches, now guarded against the severer forms of persecution, kept along "the even tenor of their way," the limits of belief quietly broadening, but the preaching being, for the most part, of a moral and didactic nature. There were many lost causes during those threescore years and ten, and, as was said of Israel in the age into which Samuel was born, "the Word of the Lord was precious in those days, there was no open vision." A little more than forty years brought them to the founding of the West Riding Tract Society, in 1815, which marked the first organised form of doctrinal propaganda. It was difficult to give the epoch that had thus thus passed any other name than that of the "drift period," its main feature being that of a gradual transition from the Arian to the Unitarian standpoint. From 1816 to 1883, a period of 67 years, they had a gradual enlargement of the scope and work of that mildly aggressive society which originated ten days before Waterloo, two fresh titles being successively adopted. In 1851 it became the West Riding Tract and Village Mission Society; in 1864 it was baptised afresh as the West Riding Unitarian Mission Society. At last, on June 6, 1883, a resolution was passed "that the Society be henceforth known as the Yorkshire Unitarian Union," embracing Unitarian, Presbyterian, and other kindred Churches, and under that flag they were still fighting.

Out of those 237 years of varied history had come twenty-seven congregations, but one of them, in spite of its geographical position, had always linked its fortunes with their neighbour Association farther North. The speaker then proceeded to classify the churches according to their origin and history, and added humorously that if they had not lately increased the number they could at all events claim that for many years there had been no tribe lacking in Israel. Even Selby that had so long sat solitary by the side of the Ouse, with a lotus-eating complacency, had been kept awake and had the prospect of better days. And Malton, with its memories of Manchester College, York, where Dr. Martineau and other notable divines had first tried their wings as preachers, had received aid and comfort out of the Union's modest resources. Owing to the lack of time Mr. Chalmers was not able to develop his address as fully as he had intended, but he referred to some of the characteristics of the Yorkshire churches, and concluded with the expression of a strong wish that a manual might be published, giving the history of their churches, for the instruction of their young people.

EVENING MEETING.

At the conclusion of the meeting tea was served in the schoolroom, and at a quarter-past six an evening meeting was held in the church, the President, the Rev. A. CHALMERS, in the chair.

After the singing of an opening hymn, the PRESIDENT expressed the great regret of the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones at his enforced absence from the meeting, and urged upon his hearers the need of closer union, the loyal support, of all Yorkshire Unitarians in their common work. That was one reason why they were specially glad to hold that meeting in Hull. He then moved a resolution of welcome to the Rev. V. D. DAVIS, the representative of the B. and F.U.A., and thanks to the Association for the help rendered by them to the Union. It was a common work in which they were engaged, and though they had difficulties in Yorkshire, they might say on the whole that their work was being faithfully done. They had not only to help the younger churches, but to guard the interests of the older and weaker churches, which deserved to be carefully watched and encouraged.

The Rev. E. W. LUMMIS seconded the resolution, which was cordially adopted.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS said that he felt it an honour to be asked to represent the Central Association at the meeting of that Union. It was the privilege of the Association to receive contributions from those who believed in their common cause in all parts of the country, and to administer the funds entrusted to them wherever they felt the need to be greatest. The executive, though naturally composed largely of members resident in London, included representatives of the Provinces; and others now resident in London had exercised the greater part of their ministry in the Provinces; while other members by such meetings as that were brought into close contact with the work that was going on. But he did not feel that there was any need to prove to them that the Association was not merely metropolitan in character, but national; he showed from the contributions received from Yorkshire in subscriptions and congregational collections that the fact was acknowledged, and they had faith in the work. He spoke of the character of the Mission work, and the value of the discriminating use of the tracts and pamphlets issued by the Association, and of the services of the Rev. Stopford Brook, in which Yorkshire also had shared. Their work was a religious work, and the interest of the Association was not in theological controversy as an end; their interest was that truth should prevail to open the way for truer religious life. They had, as Unitarians, stood and worked together because so they were obliged to think of God, and they had two great aims—to bear their witness to Truth as it was revealed to them, and to demonstrate that the truth they held as Unitarians availed for all the needs of life to feed the hunger of the soul, to deliver from sin, to strengthen men and women for true life in this present world, and to give their confidence in the life beyond the shadows. In all the varied operations of the Association, the ultimate aim was the strengthening of that true life with God.

The Rev. JOHN ELLIS then moved a vote of thanks to the lay-preachers of the Union. There were, he said, some eighteen of them, busy men, hard workers, some at the bench, some at the loom, some in offices, who felt they had a call to spread the gospel in every way open to them. They rendered invaluable service, and it was an encouragement to feel they had such men among them.

The Rev. J. H. GREEN seconded, and as a country minister, expressed his indebtedness to the lay-preachers.

Mr. CHARLES STAINER, of Leeds, responded, and said that as lay-preachers they often went out with fear, and yet they remembered that the first pioneers of Christianity were all laymen. He made a strong appeal to their educated laymen to take part in that work. He did not think it ought to be left to the artisan class. If they, with their scanty equipment, were able to do some good, educated men might do far more.

Mr. GROSVENOR TALBOT then moved:—"That this meeting of Yorkshire Unitarians affirms its faith in the Being of one God the universal Father, in the teachings of Jesus Christ the great founder of our religion, and in the full right and liberty of every intelligent being to worship after the dictates of his own heart and reason." That resolution, he said, affirmed the great faith of their Unitarianism. They were never fearful of throwing into the refining fire their knowledge and ideas, sure that the true metal would come out in its purity, and that whatever was false would be driven off by the fierce heat it encountered. They desired no tests in their congregations and no creed, nor that their religion should be confined by the law. The result of that they saw in the present state of the Church of England and the efforts of the Archbishops. They desired to be governed by the teaching and law which Christ had propounded to them, which was sufficient for their guidance. The Lord's Prayer and the Christian Commandments would suffice. While they were true to them, they might be sure Unitarianism would remain a great fact in religion. They were the true Catholics who simply held to the gospel preached by the immediate followers of Christ.

The Rev. C. HARGROVE seconded the resolution, and pointed out that it was entirely positive in its statement. They were much injured by the popular confusion between their Unitarianism as a positive faith and what was merely anti-Trinitarianism. Mere disbelief ensured no fervour of devotion or loyalty to a Church; and even within their churches there were too many whose religion was in great part a disbelief. It was faith that worked by love; unfaith did not work at all. Only by asserting great truths could they unite people. Referring to their actual work, he spoke of the humiliation of their constant need of money; but in estimating what Yorkshire did for the cause, they must not look merely at the list of contributions to the Union and to the Central Association. His own church of Mill Hill, for instance, supported independently two other churches in the town, and he estimated that his congregation gave annually as much for Unitarianism outside their borders as for their own needs. Even if it were possible to raise the funds necessary for the establishment of ten new churches in districts as yet unoccupied by them, he did not think it would be right to do so, and to hand down to their successors the responsibility of the maintenance or the abandonment of those churches, so long as the actual work to which they were already pledged was not more adequately done. They had twenty-seven churches in the county, all independent, and rightly independent, except in so far as they needed financial assistance; but they were too little conscious of their union; he pleaded that they should strengthen one another's hands by closer fellowship, all sharing in the common work, so that they might have the encouragement of feeling that they belonged to a larger body.

The Rev. J. McDOWELL supported the resolution and dwelt on the spiritual and practical importance of the principles enunciated. The intellectual form of faith was of little consequence compared with the consciousness of the presence of the Infinite in the heart.

Mr. J. S. MATHERS then moved, and Mr. DONALD WILSON seconded, a resolution expressing cordial approval of the aims of the Peace Conference, and a resolution of thanks to the Hull Congregation and to the President, moved by Mr. T. MANNING, seconded by the Rev. J. B. GARDINER, brought the meeting to a close.

EPPS'S COCOA ESSENCE.—A THIN COCOA.—The choicest roasted nibs of the natural Cocoa, on being subjected to powerful hydraulic pressure, give forth their excess of oil, leaving for use a finely flavoured powder—a product which, when prepared with boiling water, has the consistence of tea, of which it is now with many, beneficially taking the place. Its active principle being a gentle nerve stimulant, supplies the needed energy without unduly exciting the system. Sold only in labelled tins. If unable to obtain it of your tradesman, a tin will be sent post free for 9 stamps.—James Epps and Co., Ltd., Homoeopathic Chemists, London.

PROVINCIAL LETTER.

NORTH AND EAST LANCASHIRE.

THE congregations in this district have not been asleep during the past winter. Some of them, perhaps, may feel that they have been kept awake more than they would wish. In several places there has been consultation, and forming of plans which will, it is to be hoped, bear fruit in the next few years, and which will affect, directly or indirectly, most of the congregations of which I am writing. The North and East Lancashire Mission, whose Committee with parental or neighbourly care watch over the land from Stand and Ainsworth up to Preston, is popularly supposed to be enormously rich, and not unproportionately generous. It makes grants in support of the ministry in seven centres, in two of which it has built and now owns the chapel and school. It has been able to do this owing to several large legacies in the past, left by staunch upholders of the cause, whose example, let us hope, will be imitated by others. The Mission Committee, however, being prudent, took stock of their funds, and reckoned their rate of expenditure, with the result that they found it necessary to retrench. The word went forth to reduce the grants; but in order not to discourage those who were receiving them, a further scheme was devised by which each aided congregation should be invited and helped to make an effort on its own behalf. Hence the consultations referred to above. Every one of the aided congregations has thrown itself into the scheme, and has set on foot some project for either raising what is called an Independence Fund, or taking over a larger proportion of the local expenditure, or in some other way relieving the drain on the Mission funds. The idea is to make a sustained effort during, say, five years, the Mission contributing a percentage on the amount raised. The congregations who are undertaking this will no doubt ask their friends in other places to help them; so that probably all will be more or less affected. They will have the satisfaction of knowing that they are helping on good work in several places, and also that they are enabling the Mission Committee to extend their usefulness, where at present they dare not take on further financial responsibility.

The present season of the year in this part of the country is the time of "Sermons." The reader who does not know how great an occasion the Sunday-school anniversary is in these parts, might suppose that there was very little preaching in the chapels, when people date the events of the year from "Sermons." They mean the anniversary sermons, or, as they are sometimes called, the charity sermons. And it is a curious fact that it is the anniversary of the Sunday-school, not of the chapel, which is the great event of the year. There are chapel "Sermons," of course, and they are described as such. "Sermons" almost always mean school sermons. On these occasions (I explain for those of your readers who may not be aware of the importance locally attached to "Sermons"), it is generally the custom to invite some more or less distinguished preacher, to have usually two and sometimes three services, with special music, and a collection at each, in aid of the school funds.

However it may be in the towns, the country chapels are often crowded at "Sermons" by friends from the neighbouring congregations, who will sometimes close their own chapels in the evening for the purpose. These things are done in most of the Dissenting chapels in this district, and probably in many other places, at all events in the North of England. The cynic, who is not unknown amongst us, says that the one only thing about which people care at "Sermons" is the collection; and that what they care about is that it shall be larger than at such and such a chapel in the immediate neighbourhood. I do not think this is true; certainly it is not true of all who go to "Sermons." But I admit that there are practices often found in connection with such anniversaries which make it hard to rebut the charge. That those whose Sunday-school depends for nearly all its income upon the collection should take a deep interest in the amount is natural enough. I feel such interest myself every year, and always like to know that there has been a good collection. And having preached anniversary sermons fairly often, I do not think it is true that the congregations care nothing about the service as a service, and are only waiting to know how much the collection is. But I know that the amount stated to have been collected sometimes includes much more than has been taken on that day, and that there is sometimes severe pressure put on the Sunday scholars to contribute during weeks beforehand, and that these previous contributions are all put in to swell the total at "Sermons," without any explanation. I do not know this of any of our schools, but I do of others. There is, however, a custom often followed at "sermons" in our chapels as well as in others, which certainly does give colour to the cynical charge already mentioned. At the conclusion of the service, sometimes during the last hymn sometimes later, a paper is handed up to the pulpit, from which the preacher announces the amount of the day's collection. This is sometimes done just before the Benediction, and I have known the concluding voluntary to be stopped in order to make the announcement. I mention this matter in my letter, because it is a good opportunity to call attention to, and perhaps provoke a discussion on, a practice which seems to me most objectionable and out of all keeping with a religious service. The cynic may well say that the collection is the only thing people care about, when the devotional influence which the service might have had is rudely dispelled by a notice about money. I know many people who have been shocked at it, and have felt that a religious service is degraded and insulted by such unseemly interruption or conclusion. Whenever I have been asked to make such an announcement I have done it under protest. Not being in my own pulpit, I have not felt free to refuse altogether; but I have said why I disliked it, and thought it improper. And in every case I found afterwards that there were those who felt as I did about it. I am glad to be able to say that there are several of our chapels where no announcement whatever is made of the collection within the chapel. Those who want to know can find a notice posted up outside. By this simple means, the service is left undisturbed; the vulgar curiosity of those who come merely to gratify that is silently rebuked; and those to whom a religious service is religious are allowed to worship in peace. I think the ministers who preach on these occasions have a good deal of responsibility in the matter; and if they do not guard the devotional character of the worship which they lead, it is not likely that their hearers will. There are those amongst the congregation in all our chapels at "Sermons," who will be thankful to see an end of this practice, as there will doubtless be others who will grumble and say that it is nonsense to be so particular. If the mere mercenary motive be indeed the chief one amongst the crowd who fill a chapel at "Sermons," then is it not something of a blasphemy to make a show of holding a service, to sing hymns and say prayers for a pretence? And if a service is held, shall it not be a worship of God and not of mammon?

I do not know, sir, whether you will print all this, but I have had it on my mind to say this for a long time, and now I have said it.

UNITARIAN MOVEMENT IN THE KHASI HILLS, INDIA.

THE first part of the visit of the Rev. S. F. Williams up to April 23 will be found reported in the accounts of the anniversary meetings of the Khasi Hills Unitarian Union.*

On April 25 Mr. Williams inspected the Unitarian day-school at Jowai, and made the following remarks in the Visitors' Book:—

[COPY.]

I visited the Jowai Unitarian School this day, April 25, 1899, and was much gratified with all that I saw and heard. The school was extremely clean. The attendance numbered thirty, the number on the roll is forty-four. The first-class read intelligently in English, answered a few questions in geography fairly well, and wrote a dictation lesson in well-formed letters, and with good spelling. The second and third classes also read simple lessons from an English reader in an intelligent manner. The fourth-class read a hymn in Khasi with brightness and what seemed to me to be accuracy, and they sang in excellent tone. The physical drill was remarkably well done, and struck me as a valuable feature. The whole school went through the tonic-solfà scale with remarkable and accurate intonation. The discipline of the school appeared to be excellent; and both the teaching and the order reflect great credit on the teachers. Some sewing and knitting done by the fourth-class was very neat, and I should recommend that the boys also should be taught simple sewing. On the whole, the evidence is clear that the school is doing very good work, and is preparing those who come under its influence for a life of intelligence and morality.

(Sd.) S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS, London.

N.B.—Sewing and knitting were made part of the instructions of girls in the school in consequence of the suggestions made by Mr. S. E. Rita, S.D.O., in September, 1898, on the occasion of the anniversary of the school.

(Sd.) HAJOM KISSOR SINGH, Manager.

On the 27th Mr. Williams delivered a lecture on "Does Modern Knowledge Banish God from the World?" The subject was very ably handled with simplicity but with much force and enthusiasm. I have read and heard it said that the

* Mr. Williams's report of these proceedings will appear in our next issue.

English Unitarians lack energy and enthusiasm, as evidenced by their having no Foreign Missions, and their not giving freely to support their societies. Was Mr. Williams an exception? On the 28th he left Jowai for Nongtalang, accompanied by Mr. Mār Singh, Mr. Kissor Singh, Mr. Maha Syiem and others, and arrived there on the 29th. The jungle on the approach to Nongtalang was then on fire, but the party managed to pass through safely. In the evening there was a meeting in the Unitarian Church, and a hearty welcome was accorded to Mr. Williams and the party.

On Sunday, April 30, two young men and a lady were formally received into Church membership. Mr. Williams baptised three children, and then preached a sermon, which was rendered into Khasi. He left Nongtalang on Monday, accompanied by a number of the Nongtalang Unitarians to some distance, and he came back to Jowai on Tuesday. While at Jowai he attended Wednesday members' meetings, and Friday, home prayer meetings, and took much interest in the various activities of the Unitarian Church.

On Sunday, May 7, he delivered a very instructive sermon on "The Existence of God." At the close of the sermon, he said he was very glad to find that there was so much activity and enthusiasm, and that he hoped his visit would strengthen the good-will and sympathy of the English Unitarians, and result in more generous helpfulness to the cause of the Mission. He left Jowai on May 8, accompanied by the school children and a number of Unitarians to some distance from Jowai. Mr. Williams made himself well acquainted with the state and prospects of the Unitarian movement in the Khasi Hills, and was much impressed with the necessity of sending out a European missionary to these hills. He left a very favourable impression on our minds. We found him to have a very wide religious experience, deep piety, a broad and sympathetic heart, a business-like and quick perceptive mind. He went to the very root of every question that came before him. His mode of life was very simple. He was affable, lively and polite, so much so, that even little children liked him, and he was repeatedly asked to remain for six months in the Khasi Hills.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—Letters, &c., received from the following:—V. A. B.; F. T.; E. R. H.; J. R.; A. H.; R. D. D.; G. V. S.; E. I. F.; W. E. A. A.

COUNTRY AIR FOR WEAK AND AILING CHILDREN.—Miss A. Lawrence, 23, Campden House Chambers, Campden-hill, London, W., begs to acknowledge, with many thanks, receipt for this fund of the following sums:—M. M. V. 10s.; Mr. Tarring, 5s.; Mr. W. Colfox, £10; Mrs. Francis Martin, 10s.; from the girls of Mrs. Marks Thomas's School, Aberystwith, £1 17s.; Mrs. Bayle Bernard, £1; Lady Durning Lawrence, £1; Dora, 5s.; A. K. and friends, £1 12s. 6d.; Miss Cooper, 10s. Some few articles of clothing are earnestly requested for the children now going away. Parcels should be forwarded as soon as possible to Miss Toye, 156, Stepney-green, London, E.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

Bessell's Green.—The Rev. R. C. Dendy was placed third on the poll out of seven successful candidates at the Sevenoaks School Board election on Monday. Not the least pleasing feature of the contest was the cordial support afforded Mr. Dendy by the Nonconformists generally in the town, and notably by the Rev. Clarence Lankester, Congregationalist.

Chelmsford.—The annual flower service was held on Sunday. The decorations were by Miss G. Wray and Miss R. Evans, assisted by Rev. E. J. Harry, minister, who gave appropriate sermons morning and evening. On a previous Sunday we were cheered by a visit from Miss E. Sharpe.

Denton: Ministerial Appointment.—The Rev. Charles Edward Oliver, B.A., has accepted the very hearty and unanimous invitation of the East Cheshire Christian Union to become one of their ministers at Wilton-street Chapel, Denton.

Dowlais.—Anniversary services were held here last Saturday evening and Sunday all day, June 10 and 11, when the officiating ministers were the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, Trebanos, and the Rev. David Rees, Pentre Ystrad. Large and appreciative congregations assembled at all the services, especially on Sunday afternoon and evening, when the chapel was quite filled. There was also a clear sign of the times—that a day of more unity and brotherhood is dawning—to be seen in the service of Saturday evening, inasmuch as ministers of other denominations were present. Very impressive sermons were preached by both the ministers, and the collections made were considerably above the average.

Dundee.—In accordance with a fraternal request made by the Rev. Walter Walsh, the Rev. Alexander C. Henderson, M.A., B.D., of the Free Christian Church, Paisley, occupied, last Sunday, the pulpit of the Gilfillan Memorial Church, Dundee, where he was formerly assistant-minister to the Rev. David Macrae. There were large attendances at both services, about 1,500 persons being present at the morning service alone. At the close of the evening service the office-bearers of the church came to the vestry, in a body, to express their pleasure at seeing Mr. Henderson again, and to give him a hearty invitation to pay them another visit soon. The Rev. A. Lazenby, of Glasgow, kindly officiated for Mr. Henderson in the Clark Town Hall, Paisley, and gave a most interesting lecture on "In His Steps, and its Critics."

Elland.—On Sunday services were held, and collections were taken on behalf of the choir funds. The Rev. James Taylor, pastor of the church, conducted the services both morning and evening. The choir was augmented by two lady friends from Halifax, Miss Sugden and Miss Collinge, and Mr. W. Shaw, of Elland. At the evening service, which was well attended, the Rev. James Taylor preached the fourth of a series of sermons on Mr. Sheldon's book, "In His Steps," the subject being "Christianity and the Slum Question."

Evesham.—On June 7 a bazaar, opened by the Mayoress (Mrs. Geoffrey New), was held in the Town Hall, to raise a fund for the improvement of the organ in the Oat-street Chapel, and other alterations. Thanks to the united work of the various committees and the members of the congregation generally, and to the support of members of all religious communities in the town, the bazaar was very successful, producing, including donations, upwards of £150.

Kilmarnock: Presentation.—On Wednesday evening last a deputation from the Bible Class of the Clerk's Lane Free Christian Church, waited on the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, at his residence, Cross-bush, for the purpose of making a presentation to him on the occasion of his leaving the Kilmarnock Church to take up his new work at Ainsworth, Lancashire. The presentation took the form of valuable sets of books by Kant, Lotze, Professor Edward Caird, Principal John Caird, Professor Henry Jones, George Meredith, Henry Hallam, and a rare set of Lockhart's Scott. In making the presentation, Mr. Miller expressed, on behalf of the Bible Class, their deep regret at parting with Mr. Scott, and their keen appreciation of the splendid services rendered by him to the class during the period of his pastorate in Kilmarnock.

London: College Chapel, Stepney-green, E.—At the usual monthly religious conference in connection with the Postal Mission, Mr. C. E. Maurice delivered an interesting address on "Peace and Arbitration," on Sunday afternoon, June 3. Miss Florence Hill occupied the chair. Mr. Maurice addressed himself to the consideration of the reasons usually urged in justification of the settlement of international disputes by an appeal to arms. The first dealt with was that war made an "open door" for trade. The lecturer quoted Richard Cobden (who was the greatest authority on free trade) in support of the thought that it was not wise to open up trade in another country by means of violence. Mr. Maurice said that there were two ways of getting a door opened. One was by knocking and asking for admission, as we do at the houses of our friends; and the other was by breaking into it, as a burglar does for us. Then the question was dealt with as to whether civilisation is helped by means of war. Whatever trade or art can do for improvement must be good; and when a civilised nation introduces one or the other into a country, the people of which are behind in conditions of life, it can only be for their benefit. But the modern mode of "knocking down" with the sword is not the best way. It is not easy to see how we can make savages into good citizens by selling to them under conditions they do not understand; or how introducing to them spirits and gunpowder can at all tend to improve them. These, however, are some of the methods we adopt when we civilise by war. The question of extending empire was next discussed. It was the Imperial idea of converting by the sword, and it was shown that when Rome and Spain sought to extend their empires by trampling on the liberties of other countries—they came, in turn, to be trampled on, and crushed by the sword. It was true that those who used the sword perished by the sword. The address was concluded by an examination of the suggestion that war brought out a fine spirit of heroism in the country which engaged in it; but Mr. Maurice urged that it was not the highest form of heroism; that a greater was seen when a person was brave enough to stand alone against public opinion. An interesting discussion followed the paper, which was engaged in by Mr. Evans, Mr. Chambers, Mr. Seely, and Mr. Lucking Tavenor.

London: Wandsworth.—In connection with the Cycle Club lately formed here, an arrangement has been made to house the bicycles of visitors from a distance during the hours of service, and delegates have been chosen to give a personal welcome to such friends.

North and East Lancs. Sunday-school Union.—Beautiful weather favoured us last Sunday, so that there was a large gathering in the afternoon at the Trafalgar-street Church, Burnley, on the occasion of the second annual united service. The Rev. J. H. Wicksteed, of Padiham, conducted the devotional part of the service, and the Rev. J. J. Wright delivered the address. The Padiham choir led the singing of the special hymns, and Mrs. Alfred Webster sang "The Promise of Life." Tea was afterwards served in the school-room.

Swansea.—The annual singing festival in connection with the Unitarian Churches of Glamorgan-shire was held at the above place on Monday, June 5, in the English Congregational Church, Castle-street, kindly lent for the occasion. The President of the morning meeting was the Rev. R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare, and Mr. C. H. Perkins, Sketty, presided over the afternoon gathering. The conductor was Mr. W. Hevin Williams, Lampeter, Cardiganshire. The weather being so favourable as to draw the various choirs together by the excursions run from Rhondda, Merthyr, and Aberdare Valleys, the festival was a complete success, and great praise is due to Mr. Williams for the able way in which he had conducted, and also to Miss S. George, Aberdare, and four gentlemen from Trebanos, who played the organ and other instrument accompaniments. Addresses were given by the Rev. W. T. Jones, Swansea, Mr. Lewis Hopkins, Trebanos, and others during the day, and the solo, "Lead Kindly Light," was very ably rendered by Mr. D. R. Griffiths, Aberdare, in the morning meeting.

ATTORNEY GENERAL

v.
The Trustees and Committee of
St. Saviourgate Chapel,
York, England.

The Presbyterian cause in York dates from about 1663, and the Meetinghouse was built in 1692. It was conveyed by the Subscribers to certain Trustees to the end that it "shall be used and employed as a meeting place for religious worship or what other use or uses the said.....(Trustees),..... their heirs or successors, shall think most convenient."

The original Congregation and Ministers were, of course, Trinitarian.

The Rev. Newcome Cappe, who was appointed in 1755, is recorded to have been the first preacher of Unitarian Doctrines in the Chapel, and the subsequent ministers, the Revs. Charles Wellbeloved, G. Vance Smith, Charles H. Wellbeloved, F. Sydney Morris, and William Mellor, were all ministers of the Unitarian Body. There has never been any creed formulated on behalf of the congregation, but from time to time, occupying ministers have published statements of their views. The Trustees have never interfered nor been asked to interfere with any minister nor with the occupying congregation, on the ground that he or they were not fulfilling the conditions of the Trust.

Nevertheless, in May, 1897, an action in the Court of Chancery was commenced, the expenses of which are being borne by a London lady, who has no connection with the congregation. It is brought against the Trustees of the Chapel and the then Members of its Committee at the instigation, it is understood, of the late Rev. Robert Spears, Editor of the Christian Life, and claims

1. "An injunction to restrain the Defendants, the Fabric Trustees, from permitting the said Meeting house to be used for the propagation of Agnostic or Secularist or Atheistic Principles, Opinions or Doctrines, or otherwise than as a Meeting place for religious and well-disposed Christian people called Protestant Dissenters."

3. "That such of the Fabric Trustees as hold opinions inconsistent with the trusts and purposes expressed in the indentures of 1692 and 1719 may be removed from the Trusteeship and fit and proper persons appointed Trustees in their stead."

3. "An injunction to restrain the Defendants, the members of the said Committee from appointing or permitting any person to preach or conduct service in the said Meetinghouse who holds opinions or views antagonistic to those expressed in the indentures of 1692 and 1719."

4. "That the Defendants or some of them may be ordered to pay the cost of this action."

It must be noted that this action does not include the Trustees of the various endowments which the chapel enjoys, who would have had money with which to resist the interference, but is only brought against those Trustees who hold the Chapel Fabric, who have not at their command even sufficient funds to maintain that fabric, and who are known to be persons whom an expensive lawsuit would certainly ruin.

It is impossible to enter here fully into the various statements made in support of the above claims, it is sufficient to state shortly that the object of the action is to prevent the use of the Chapel for the purposes of teaching the doctrines of Unitarianism as held by the majority of the Trustees and Congregation. Copies of the statement of

Claim and Defence are deposited with Messrs. Munby and Scott, Solicitors, 3, Blake Street, York; their London Agents, Messrs. Leesmith and Munby, 12, Great Swan Alley, Moorgate Street, London, E.C.; the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the American Unitarian Association, and may be inspected; also copies of the final reply of the Plaintiffs which includes their submission "that particular religious doctrines or opinions or a particular mode of regulating worship are on the face of the deeds and instruments declaring the trusts of the said Meeting-house required to be taught or observed therein."

Generally the position of the Defendants is—that the congregation for over 100 years have been on terms of fellowship with and affiliated to the other Congregations of the Unitarian body—that the views at present held by them are those of the broader or more extreme members of that body, and are the logical outcome of the spirit of progressive thought, which is the basis of Unitarianism—they are convinced that the success of the Plaintiffs would involve the definition by a court of law of the terms "Worship," "Religious," "Christian," "Unitarian doctrines," and others, and that such definitions would establish for all time a creed, enjoined by law on the one Dissenting Body which has always refused to formulate a creed—they see that if the open trust of the York Chapel is held to contain "particular religious doctrines" so also will the other open Presbyterian, Baptist and Independent Trusts in England, and in such cases that the Dissenters' Chapels Act will be no protection, and all these Chapels that are now Unitarian, or Free, or Free Christian, will be liable to be reclaimed by Trinitarian Dissenters.

For these reasons, as well as for those more immediate to themselves, the Defendants are prepared to defend the action brought against them, leaving to their opponents the onus of engaging in a persecution for opinion's sake, but they hold that this matter concerns every Unitarian and other lover of progressive religious thought all over the world, and they confidently appeal for contributions, both large and small, towards the expenses.

An account, entitled—York Saint Saviourgate Chapel Defence Account, has been opened at the York Branch of the National Provincial Bank of England, and contributions to the Defence Fund can either be paid direct to that account or remitted by cheque to the undersigned, E. F. Lewin, Castlegate, York.

We, the undersigned Defendants, undertake that all contributions so made shall be applied to secure a fair trial of the points at issue, and if by reason of the action being dismissed, with costs or otherwise, the amount subscribed shall be more than sufficient or not required, to return the contributions pro rata.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association have been applied to and a deputation from their Executive Committee was sent to York to meet the Congregation and report. As a result of that report the Plaintiffs have been approached by the Association Committee with a view to secure a peaceable settlement, but without producing the smallest effect.

The action, commenced as stated in 1897, has been postponed for some time owing to the endeavours of T. Grosvenor Lee, Esq. (President of the B. and F.U.A. 1897-98), but his mediation has now been finally rejected by the Plaintiffs and the case will probably come on for hearing in the Trinity term, before which time the Defendants should be put into a position to meet the considerable expense of preparing for trial and briefing Counsel. Having regard to the eminent Counsel retained by the Plaintiffs it is thought expedient for the Defendants to attain the services of equally eminent Counsel which will involve large outlays for Counsel's fees alone.

DEPTFORD CHAPEL, Church Street.

FOUNDED 1600.

AN URGENT APPEAL FOR £250.
£39 STILL REQUIRED.

It is absolutely compulsory that the roof of the above Chapel be entirely and immediately reconstructed. The Vestries adjoining the building are also beyond repair, and it is proposed to replace these by erecting an Iron room which would afford much needed accommodation for Sunday-school and other purposes.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Provincial Assembly of London and South-Eastern Counties, and the General Baptist Assembly, have made grants in response to this Appeal.

Donations or promises will be thankfully received by the Treasurer to the Fund, G. W. CHITTY, Esq., Mildura, Park Avenue, Dover; or by the Minister, the Rev. A. J. MARCHANT, 37, Clifton-road, Peckham, London, S.E., by whom they will be acknowledged.

BI-CENTENARY RESTORATION FUND.

The roof and ceiling of the Ancient Chapel (1700) are now dangerous. The architects recommend entirely new ones. Much dilapidated in other respects, renovation is urgently needed. The cost of these restorations will be £750, or more. Towards this sum the congregation and trustees, with some old members and friends, have subscribed £320, which may be increased. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has given £50.

Through Nature to God.

By JOHN FISKE.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 208 pp. 3s. 6d.

"A single purpose runs throughout this book, though different aspects of it are treated in the three several parts. The first part, 'The Mystery of Evil,' written soon after 'The Idea of God,' was designed to supply some considerations which for the sake of conciseness had been omitted from that book. Its close kinship with the second part, 'The Cosmic Roots of Love and Self-Sacrifice,' will be at once apparent to the reader. In the third part, 'The Everlasting Reality of Religion,' my aim is to show that 'that other influence,' that inward conviction, the craving for a final cause, the theistic assumption, is itself one of the master facts of the universe, and as such entitled to respect as any fact in physical nature can possibly be."—AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Rev. R. A. Armstrong, who, as already announced, will shortly start for a trip to Newfoundland with the hope of recruiting his strength, has in the press a short essay calling the attention of orthodox readers to the implications of the movement "back to Jesus," of which so much is said just now. Undoubtedly, such a strong brotherly word is needed, and no one can say it better than Mr. Armstrong, who is already well known and respected by many of those whom he will address in his latest book.

SOME Birmingham leaders, including, as might be expected, a large number of prominent Unitarians, are endeavouring to get a crematorium established for that city. A most encouraging meeting was held last week, Mr. G. J. Johnson, ex-Mayor, in the chair, and among the speakers was the Bishop of Coventry, who made a capital address on the subject. In particular he dealt with the "religious" question. He thought the tenacity of sentiment with regard to the burial of the body was based upon ancient Egyptian notions respecting the resurrection of the material body. If they adopted cremation, they would not be wanting in reverence, or in a belief in what St. Paul taught as to the resurrection of the body. Did any one doubt that the martyrs who perished by burning would have no resurrection? Our friend, Mr. Charles Harding, is chairman of the Executive Committee charged with the duty of carrying out the scheme.

ANOTHER note from the Midlands reminds us of what Dr. Herford has often said as to marching abreast as a phalanx, instead of solitarily. On Sunday last sermons were preached by our ministers—sixteen in number—in Birmingham and district, to enforce the claims of "the Birmingham University" upon public attention. Collections were not taken, but names of subscribers were enrolled in the vestries after service. It is hoped that the £250,000 already raised (in addition to the buildings and endowment of Mason College, probably equal in value) will be increased to £300,000 before the summer is out.

It is amazing to us that there should seem to exist a considerable body of feeling in favour of warlike measures in South Africa. Anything less politic would be difficult to imagine. It is not only that, as most people are saying, there is something specially odious in a Great Power like ours taking such a step against a small one for such a cause; the political evil that must be created, or at any rate vastly increased if it must be said to exist already, would be so serious as to outweigh entirely any immediate gains to the parties who complain. Lord Salisbury once advised people to use large scale maps; he might usefully tell them now to take large scale views of history, and to remember that nothing so hinders the drawing together of a mixed population as the tradition of ancient hostilities, with a sense of smart on one side and of vulgar pride on the other. It is bad enough as it is; surely we can avoid making it worse. We say nothing of mere peace—but it used to be considered a good cause, too.

REPORTS are now to hand of the American Unitarian anniversaries. The ways of the journals over there seem familiar. There was an incident occupy—"about thirty seconds," according to the Christian Register, which was promptly magnified out of all proportion by sundry reporters. The Rev. C. G. Ames gave notice of two resolutions, one of greeting to the Peace Conference at The Hague, the other appealing to the United States Government to withdraw from the Philippines. The Business Committee recommended the adoption of the first, and it was unanimously passed. The second resolution was not brought forward, the committee anticipating a protracted discussion on it. Mr. Ames's notice was applauded, not without "no, no!" from the other side. A number of speakers claimed to speak for or against the motion. The papers said there were "cheers and hisses," but the half-minute's breeze appears to have been a very little one.

With regard to the meetings as a whole, the editor of the Register writes :—

At it has reported itself to the writer in the voices and the faces of the delegates, and in the general tone of the Unitarian meetings last week in Boston, the spirit of our people was never more cheerful, hearty, and courageous than it is to-day. There were undercurrents of doubt and fear, not so much for ourselves as for the country and the world; but little of it came to the surface. There never has been a time when we were nearly so unanimous in our beliefs, and never a time when we cared less for uniformity of opinion. We have come to a time when we can dissent from each other's opinions without bitterness, criticise one another without rancour, and cheerfully help each other on the way to better things by pointing out that which is defective and erroneous.

WHAT Unity calls "the sensation and the experiment" of the week took place at the afternoon meeting of the Free Religious Association. This was an address by Colonel Robt. G. Ingersoll; and it appears rather to have missed fire. Our Western brother says :—

We were glad that there was a religious platform that was willing to give Robert Ingersoll a chance to be heard. We were sorry that the gifted orator proved so inadequate to the occasion. Perhaps the manuscript which he used would excuse his failure to understand the audience and the situation, but it was none the less deplorable that for an hour and a half he wielded the weapons of sarcasm and assumed that he was talking to people incapable of courageous thinking, and unacquainted with the deep problems of faith and of doubt, while the truth was that he was talking to people who had long since obeyed his oft-repeated request, "Come, be honest now!"—people who had faced all the "facts" he arrayed and who still, by thought, through courage and through duty, had come to conclusions more hopeful and more complimentary to the Universe and to themselves, than the rather drastic pessimism in which he dealt. At least they were a people that called for and deserved serious handling of serious questions. The truth seemed painfully apparent that Colonel Ingersoll has become so habituated to the methods of sarcasm and to the habits of the humorist that it is hard for him to escape the debilitating temptation to provoke a laugh, even when dealing with men's serious convictions and their most sacred feelings.

THE Christian World says this week :—
"The programme of the International Council at Boston, U.S., illustrates a difference between the British and American point of view that deserves notice. Two Unitarians are set down for addresses—namely, President Eliot, of Harvard, on the 'Religious Motive in Education,' and Professor Peabody, of Harvard, on 'Interdenominational Fellowship.' Members of other denominations, of course, are also to speak on these topics. No such inclusiveness was apparent at the London Council in 1891, and perhaps would have been resented if proposed. In America it is not felt to be either compromising or weakening. It seems to be, and really is, an indication of conscious strength that feels no need of support by a quarantine."

MR. B. B. NAGARKAR INTERVIEWED.

"I HAVE just returned from the States," said Mr. Nagarkar, in answer to our greeting last week at Essex Hall. "My farthest west was Omaha, about five hundred miles beyond Chicago, and I have travelled about the mid-west and the eastern states a good deal since we met just a year ago."

"Well, what report do you bring?"

"I find there is a very remarkable liberal sentiment pervading so-called orthodox circles. I had an opportunity of addressing some orthodox congregations, and of conversing with their members. There is not the slightest doubt that the working force in their Christian thought is the humanity of Jesus and its implications. Of course, if you corner them and put the direct question, they will quote the old dogmatic phrases, but their practical teaching and prevailing sentiment are strongly humanitarian."

"You consider this important for us?"

"Its denominational importance cannot be missed. The Unitarian teachers find that much that used to be peculiar to themselves and their movement has been taken up by these liberal Christians of other denominations; people are able to remain 'orthodox' in name, and yet share the more enlightened thought of our time. This, while an excellent thing in itself, naturally tends to prevent any large migration into Unitarian churches."

"Yes; that is what we experience here, you know. But is there any peculiar feature in American religious life?"

"Distinctly so. I saw everywhere signs of religious unrest. In spite of the liberalising thoughts which are permeating the Churches generally, there are multitudes who seek something more. You see Christian science, and spiritualism, and theosophy, and such movements everywhere. I don't think they can be attributed wholly to cranks and eccentrics drawing the crowd after them. People want something more emotional, more dramatic than 'liberal principles'; the old doctrines have lost their power, a new spiritual atmosphere is being created."

"Did you find that the war had greatly affected the serious life of the people?"

"Yes; I was out at the time when the Cuban campaign was fought. The pulpit almost universally supported it. Religious minds considered the war was necessary as a measure of destroying an abominable state of things in Cuba. As to the Philippines, there are two decided opinions—one, chiefly in the west, is to go forward on Imperialist lines, the other to be as moderate as possible. All, however, seem agreed that the States must colonise; they can't avoid the job."

"And will they succeed?"

"Ah, that is a bigger question! We have to remember that there is a vast difference between the States now and England when she began her Indian Empire. She had had a century of commercial intercourse with India and knew the conditions better. The States are absolutely new to the problem; they have no class of officials experienced in this line. Besides, we speak of the 'American people'; it is really not a 'people' yet. It lacks homogeneity; the different elements are all in the melting-pot. Certainly, the States are very different from England."

We naturally asked Mr. Nagarkar his opinion on affairs in India. He regretted the excessive suspiciousness of certain Anglo-Indians; the natives, he said, were well persuaded that of all foreign sways that of England was the most beneficial, and fully 99 per cent. of the people were absolutely reconciled to its continuance. Where the mistake lay was in educating a class of natives and then treating them with the contempt and harshness which they were sure to feel most sensitively.

We mentioned the Senior Wrangler, who comes from Mr. Nagarkar's city. "I do not know him, personally," said he, "but I am very glad of his success. He comes of a Brahmin stock, and, while not a member of the Brahmo Samaj, he is, I believe, a 'reformed Hindu,' with very broad and enlightened sympathies."

We then fell to a chat about well-known persons. Mr. Nagarkar brings good news of Mr. Cuckson, Dr. Hale, Mr. Crothers—who is acquiring a great reputation at Cambridge (U.S.A.)—President Eliot, Mr. Jenkins Lloyd-Jones—as enthusiastic as ever—and a host of others. He has been much struck by the hearty and affectionate way in which people all through the east and mid-west inquired after Dr. Brooke-Herford. Finally, we asked him as to his plans. They are, briefly, to spend a few weeks here, preaching and addressing congregations, if invited; his postal address being Essex Hall. On his return to Bombay he means to revive his school.

OBITUARY.

MR. DAVID MAXWELL, HULL.

We have again to chronicle a loss from the congregation of Park-street Church, Hull. On Saturday, 17th inst., there passed away, after a long and weary illness, borne with wondrous patience and fortitude, one who by his unfailing urbanity and kindness had endeared himself to all with whom he had come in contact, and especially to the congregation to which he attached himself on coming to Hull, nearly forty years ago. Mr. Maxwell was a native of Dundee, which town he left nearly fifty-five years ago, going first to London, thence to Portsmouth, and he removed to Hull, to fulfil an engagement as managing engineer with a large firm of shipbuilders in 1862. Subsequently, for a short time, he returned to Dundee, but again took up his residence in Hull on his appointment as Waterworks' engineer for that town, in which position—to quote the Eastern Morning News—"he was able to carry out not a few useful reforms and improvements for the benefit of the town. He retired some years ago, and the closing years of his life were devoted chiefly to literary pursuits. He was the author of 'Bygone Scotland,' 'Stepping-stones to Socialism,' &c. He was a successful lecturer, and many are the institutions which have been instructed and interested by his able and clearly-expressed addresses. In the poetry of Burns he took great delight, and was for many years an active member of the Hull Burns Club, his speeches at the annual dinners being always eloquent and an important feature of the gatherings. He was a president of the club." He had also been president of the Hull Literary Club, of which he was one of the most active members, for some years he was a vice-president; and, finally, it being the greatest compliment the club could pay, he was elected one of their few honorary members.

Friends in Dundee and Portsmouth will remember how warmly Mr. Maxwell espoused the Unitarian cause (to which he became a convert in early manhood), whilst in Hull and other towns he frequently preached, always acceptably. He had often, too, been appointed the delegate of this congregation, always worthily representing Park-street Church. He took a great interest in the Sunday-school, and for many years was one of the superintendents of the old school in Bowalley-lane. But it was, perhaps, in his own home circle his virtues chiefly shone. He was the soul of hospitality. Many a sojourner in a strange land has found comfort and encouragement under his roof. He delighted particularly in the company of young people, and had the rare gift of bringing out the best that was in them. Deeply religious, highly intellectual, kindly, sociable and strictly upright, his memory will be cherished by all amongst whom he moved, and upon whom he had a strong influence for good.

The funeral service conducted by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, M.A., was largely attended, amongst those present being a number of the Corporation staff who were in the Waterworks Department under Mr. Maxwell. A few years ago a portrait of Mr. Maxwell, painted by Thelwall, of Bournemouth, was presented by the congregation to the church trustees, and hangs in the library of Park-street Church—a mark of the appreciation of his fellow-worshippers whose esteem and love he so long commanded.

MR. A. J. MOTT, F.G.S.

We regret to announce the death, at Gloucester, on the 13th inst., apparently by accident, of Mr. A. J. Mott, brother-in-law of Sydney Dobell, the poet, and himself a writer of distinction. He was for some years President of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Liverpool, and of the Literary and Scientific Society of Gloucester. His life was gentle, wise, and filled with a strong sweet religiousness. His funeral took place on Saturday last, the Rev. J. Fisher Jones officiating.

THE YORK CASE.

SIR,—In the advertisement contained in THE INQUIRER of June 17 a paragraph appeared that copies of the statement of claim and defence are deposited with the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. This is inaccurate and unauthorised, and Mr. Lewin has been requested to withdraw the statement from all Advertisements and Appeals. The Association, whilst endeavouring to bring about a peaceable settlement, has studiously avoided taking any side in the dispute.

W. COPELAND BOWIE.

Essex Hall, Essex street, Strand,
London, W.C., June 17.

As will be seen from our advertising columns this week, a goodly number of country friends have sent substantial tokens of sympathy to the Londoners in their effort to raise £12,000 by next May. The Treasurer of the Permanent Chapel-building Fund must be highly gratified by the result of his first appeal.

THE PULPIT.

THE TEMPLE OF GOD.*

BY THE REV. L. DE BEAUMONT KLEIN, D.D.

"The heaven is my throne, and the earth my footstool: what manner of house will ye build me? saith the Lord."—Acts vii. 49.

It is with these words that Stephen concluded the last portion of his defence before the Council, in answer to the charge that he had blasphemed the temple. And having made reference to the tabernacle of the testimony in the wilderness, to David's unfulfilled desire to raise a house for the God of Jacob, and to the building of the temple by his son Solomon, Stephen introduces a remark of deep spiritual import. He says: Solomon at last built God a house, but only in so far as man can do so, for "the most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands"—that is, the most High dwells not there in any exclusive sense, nor indeed in the highest and truest sense. And to this remark Stephen adds a confirmation from the Book of Isaiah, in words which—on this day, the day of opening of our own house of prayer—afford us a suggestive text: "The heaven is my throne, and the earth my footstool: what manner of house will ye build me? saith the Lord." What manner of house? Here, of course, we have no mere reference to size, situation, orientation or architectural style.

Nor is any rebuke intended by the Prophet for those who, in a dutiful and reverent spirit, raise a place of worship to the glory of the Most High God. But this he clearly means to say: in what attitude of mind do you undertake to build a house to Him whom the heavens cannot contain? What do you purpose by thus assigning a place for the worship of Him who has the heaven for His throne and the earth for his footstool? "What manner of house will ye build me? saith the Lord."

Surely, on the morning of the day when we are solemnly assembled to dedicate this house to the glory and worship of God, we may well ask ourselves this same question, and I may at once safely say that we have no intention of making these walls signify any limitation of God's holy presence and acceptable worship. We know how this has been done in the past. Men have thought it right and lawful to erect temples in which alone the glory of the Lord was supposed to dwell; in which alone sacrifices might be worthily and efficaciously offered; in which alone prayer was reputed powerful and acceptable.

We remember how the woman whom Jesus met at the well on his way through Samaria said to him, under the influence of such narrow ideas: "Our fathers worshipped in this mountain (Mount Gerizim), and ye say that in Jerusalem is the place where men ought to worship." And we know the answer she received: "Woman," Jesus said to her, "the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. . . . But the hour cometh and now is when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth."

But there is another way in which men have made their temples symbols of limitation and exclusiveness. Having gradually ceased to connect the legality and efficacy of worship with a particular spot, they transferred that legality and efficacy to a worship of a particular kind, performed in accordance with certain rigid rules and subtle definitions of belief. Such worship has been held to be alone acceptable to God and worthy of Him. Thus, in a sense, has God's holy Presence been narrowly confined, whose throne the heavens are and whose footstool is the earth!

"What manner of house will ye build me? saith the Lord." None certainly so narrow and so small, will be the answer of us all. This house which you have built for your own worship of our common Father is intended, not to contract the hearts and sympathies of His worshippers, but to expand them.

Your aim has not been to raise a monument of exclusiveness, but a sanctuary where the illimitable grace of divine love may be taught; where men's spiritual vision may be enlarged; where men's sense of universal brotherhood may be developed and strengthened. While worshipping in one place, according to the necessity of our local existence in space, you wish to be ever reminded here by the nature and spirit of your service, that the limitless heaven is God's throne and the wide earth is His footstool; that God is not the God of a Church, of a sect, of a school, or of any of those little systems that "have their day and cease to be," but the Lord of heaven and earth, unbounded by temples made with hands, who, however infinitely above all that we can see or think, yet "is not far from any one of us," for in Him all things live and move and have their being.

You wish the universal Lord to be witnessed to in your minds and hearts by a universal sympathy towards every earnest aspiration, every true thought, every faithful deed and every groaning of the spirit of man seeking after God!

Yet, in thus speaking, I must not be so understood as if this church stood for no definite principles, with only an uncertain worship and aimless religious aspirations. Such things are often said, but, in reality, the spirit of comprehensiveness and toleration, which is the noblest inheritance left to us by the earliest founders of this congregation, implies nothing of the kind. You stand where they stood, like them endeavouring to solve the supreme religious problem—namely, how to reconcile faith, reverence and practical Christian aims with spiritual freedom, the rights of the individual conscience and the claims of growing knowledge. Nor are you alone in trying to solve this mighty problem at the present day. All men of culture and enlightenment; all men who can perceive the spirit under the letter; all who are able to understand the tendencies of modern thought, are at least as fully conscious as any of us that reality in Religion is only to be secured by an honest acknowledgment of facts, and by a firm determination to give them their due place in their religious thought. Critics may say what they please; but between those men and ourselves, the difference is not one of kind. It is at most one of degree—and often not even that. There is, no doubt, much that seems essentially destructive in the intellectual movement of our times, but much also is undoubtedly constructive, inasmuch as men are earnestly seeking, even amid the ruins of belief, solid ground for a firmer foundation.

If we study closely our present religious controversies, and look for their sources, we shall find that all of them ultimately hang upon one great central question, often hidden from sight by irrelevant discussions, but never absent from the main argument—namely, the principle of external authority in religion. What is the evidence for that principle of authority, men anxiously ask, and their minds are so unsettled, their religious orientation appears so uncertain at the present time, mainly because, when authority has once become questioned, it is found so difficult to bring forward real evidence in support of it. What past ages cheerfully accepted seems to our age weak, poor, and even fantastic. With the most earnest desire to give fair play in our minds and hearts to those arguments which satisfied our forefathers, we are irresistibly perplexed by this very obvious fact—that the progress of knowledge has not really contributed any substantial help towards our reasonable acceptance of authority as presented to us by historical Christendom. This is so important that we may perhaps be excused if we delay here for one moment to make our meaning clear. Divines are constantly assuring us that between Revelation (by which must be understood their own theory of a Divine Revelation), and Human Science, there can never exist any real opposition. If this be so, it should naturally follow that the credibility of revealed truths ought to be, at least in part, increased in proportion to our advance in natural knowledge. Removal of ignorance ought to tend towards removal of apparent opposition. At any rate, if greater harmony is not in all cases clearly manifested, certainly greater opposition ought not to be the result of greater knowledge. The more we advance, the easier ought to become the task of showing the essential connection between science and traditional faith.

But such is not the case. Many of the dogmatic positions taken up by ecclesiastical authority, say, in the fourteenth, fifteenth, or sixteenth century, are in no way more credible to-day than they were then. Those who are in any degree familiar with the present state of human knowledge will know what I mean. For instance, a momentous change has taken place in our way of looking at the nature, origin, and antiquity of man, owing to the marvellous advances of geology, palæontology, and anthropology; in all, or nearly all, religious communions, views of inspiration are undergoing surprising modifications, under the influence of Biblical Criticism—not "higher" Criticism, if anyone objects to the epithet, but more exact and more searching criticism certainly—than was known to the past.

On the other hand, the comparative study of religions has greatly altered our ideas as to the ethical value of the doctrines of predestination, substitution, the everlasting punishment of the wicked, the fall of man, and certain ecclesiastical theories of Redemption.

What earlier ages thought worthy of God's wisdom and love now seems to us a painful libel upon that love and that wisdom.

Yet all those things which modern knowledge renders so difficult of belief have once been pressed on men's faith by Authority. Are we not therefore compelled to admit that the teachings of authority, under whatever form, have not been made generally more credible by the undoubted progress of human science?

* A sermon preached on Sunday morning, June 18, at the dedication service of the Ullet-road Church, Liverpool.

Some extreme minds will no doubt exclaim, "So much the worse for human science." But it is for them to persuade our generation of the validity of their position.

Meanwhile, in union with vast numbers of earnest religious men and women in and out of the Churches, we must strive to remain true to our clearest light while remaining also faithful to what is sure and imperishable in spiritual religion. Such spiritual religion we find in the pure and simple faith of Jesus, so unlike, we fear, the Christianity of historical Churches, but so obviously akin to all that is purest and highest in the moral nature of man.

Our own historical attitude, so strikingly confirmed by the tendencies of modern thought, makes us indeed Unitarians. We attach no essential importance to the name; it is enough that we deeply value the religious principles which it recalls; but we are all, I am sure, deeply anxious that our religious attitude should be distinctly Christian, not in a dogmatic, but in a living sense. For it is this Christian attitude which brings us into valued communion—none the less real because it must often remain unacknowledged, with some of the best and noblest souls in many of the Churches outside of our own.

By this attitude, also, can be explained our instinctive comprehensiveness, our fear of barren dogmatism, our distrust of mere assumptions; in this way will our faith be justified, that to wait where we cannot see is faith still, and faith acceptable to Him, who tenderly watches over His children, both through the darkness and the light.

"What house will ye build me? saith the Lord." We answer: a house resting upon a foundation as broad as God's love, as deep as God's truth; a house to which no one pretends to limit Him, to limit His presence, to limit the workings of His spirit; a house where freedom is only controlled by reverence and present light only suppressed by the entrance of greater light; a house to which all earnest seekers after God are welcome; a house in which we can find needed help for the great social work that awaits us all outside it; a house in which to learn the supreme lessons of justice, pity, gentleness and love, in which to forget enmities and to remember the poor; a house filled with the spirit of Jesus, a shelter for all men of good will. Such a house may this be, O Father, which to-day, with humble trust, Thy children dedicate unto Thy Name! Amen.

AMONG American Unitarian ministers who intend visiting England this summer, we find the names of the Rev. John Cuckson, who will sail from New York on July 4, and the Rev. C. W. Wendte, who will sail on July 8.

EPSS'S COCOA.—GRATEFUL AND COMFORTING.—"By a thorough knowledge of the natural laws which govern the operations of digestion and nutrition, and by a careful application of the fine properties of well-selected COCOA, Mr. Epss has provided for our breakfast and supper a delicately flavoured beverage which may save us many heavy doctors' bills. It is by the judicious use of such articles of diet that a constitution may be gradually built up until strong enough to resist every tendency to disease. We may escape many a fatal shaft by keeping ourselves well fortified with pure blood and a properly nourished frame."—Civil Service Gazette.—Made simply with boiling water or milk.—Sold only in packets and pound tins, by Grocers, labelled only—"JAMES EPSS and Co. Ltd., Homœopathic Chemists, London."

THE PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

THE annual meeting of the Provincial Assembly of Presbyterian and Unitarian ministers and congregations of Lancashire and Cheshire was held at Warrington on Thursday, June 15. Morning service was held in Cairo-street Chapel, conducted by the Rev. T. Leyland, of Colne, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. W. Harrison, of Stalybridge.

THE SERMON.

Taking for his text Matthew v. 14-16, Mr. HARRISON said that even a small city set on a hill could be a city of light, and could be a landmark to the people around; and of the churches represented in that Assembly it might be said that they had welcomed the light, and also to some extent diffused it. They were repeatedly told by prominent men and leading organs of other religious bodies that they were dying, but it was not always clear what was meant by that. It could not be a question merely of the name they bore, nor of the survival or non-survival of the "reverent theism" and "lofty ethics" which they were said to have upheld. But if they were to die, because a purer, more sustaining religion was to spring out of what they were, and because all they cared for had found its way into other Churches, that was a death they would welcome. It was truths and principles they cared for, not the forms and words in which they were clothed. When the Kingdom of God was come, a good many other things besides Unitarianism would be dead. Every sect, as a sect, would be dead, as they prayed to be. But meanwhile they had truths and principles committed to their charge, and those they must set forth, until that which was perfect was come.

Their protest in the past against doctrines of the orthodox theology had not been in vain, but they existed for a nobler purpose than destroying and protesting. They existed to build up and fulfil, and to that work they should devote themselves more than ever. They might still find reasons for protesting in the present retrograde movement in the Church of England, in the fact that the National Church had not yet abolished the Athanasian Creed, and that the Wesleyan Conference had not yet made the doctrine of eternal torments an open question for ministers. The new Evangelical Free Church Catechism also furnished matter for protest. But they might, perhaps, leave the remaining doctrines of orthodoxy to be modified out of all recognition, while they directed their strength to building up a Church absolutely free from them.

The preacher then referred to some points in which their position might be strengthened. As a militant Church they might not have the impulse derived from the doctrines of orthodoxy, but they must not fear to be true to their principles; the age had need of a Church without barriers of creed, where the Father was worshipped in spirit and truth, where Jesus was revered and loved, where purity of life and integrity of conduct were placed above creed, where sonship and brotherhood were maintained and immortal life was held forth as the heritage of all. Now more than ever they must have faith in their message. They must strengthen their churches by greater constancy of attendance at the services, and by devoting their whole capacity as laymen to the church in which they worshipped and to denominational affairs. They must see that the children were instructed in the faith they held, and clearly proclaim their convictions to the world. It might be that after all their efforts, in the Providence of God, they would remain a small Church, but even so they might glorify the task they had to do above all. They must let their light shine in good works for the healing of the woes of men, not for any glory it might bring to themselves or their Church, but for the glory of their Father in heaven.

BUSINESS MEETING.

In the afternoon the business meeting was held in the chapel, the chair being taken by Alderman H. Rawson, in the absence through illness of Mr. E. C. Harding, the President. In the course of the meeting Mr. Rawson read a letter from the President, expressing his great regret at being unable to be present, and earnest wishes for the success of the meeting and the increasing prosperity and faithfulness of the churches of the Province. The roll having been called by the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, the CHAIRMAN delivered an address.

ADDRESS FROM THE CHAIR.

Having referred with great regret to the absence of the President and of Mr. J. R. Beard, and to the death of one of the oldest members of the Assembly, the Rev. C. W. Robberds, Mr. Rawson offered a welcome to the new-comers among the ministers of the Province, and then proceeded to speak in the first instance of the present controversy in the Church of England. The question at issue was, whether a certain section of the clergy should succeed in restoring the authority of those ecclesiastical courts which had always been antagonistic to mental and spiritual liberty, whether the Church or the State should be "the predominant partner." It was a renewed struggle for the domination of the priest. Some sanction for this might be found in the Book of Common Prayer. It was, perhaps, to the limited and imperfect work of the Reformation, which was but a compromise, that the present agitation was due. But if the priestly party succeeded to any serious extent, Disestablishment would inevitably follow. It was sad to think that whilst enormous social evils abounded, whilst poverty, vice, and misery encompassed the walls of Lambeth, so much intellectual power and learning should be expended on the legality of the mixed chalice, the reserved communion, and the use of lights and incense. It was true that the importance of those things lay in the dogmas and principles they symbolised. A large section of the clergy, whilst retaining the emoluments and enjoying the social prestige of the National Church, were insisting on their personal interpretation of its rubrics. Having taken vows of allegiance, they demanded a liberty incompatible with their position. Lord Halifax had the audacity to declare that the authority of the Privy Council and of the courts subject to its jurisdiction was dead. But he surely forgot that bishops and archbishops were the nominees of the temporal power. A dean and chapter may solemnly invoke divine guidance in the selection of a new ordinary, but the Prime Minister might meantime appoint him. The clergy were, in fact, civil servants. The clergy were restive under these conditions, but shrank from the sacrifices which would yield them the liberty for which they pined. What a commentary these dissensions supplied on the supposed binding, uniting, and harmonising effect of creeds, articles, and confessions! He knew of no other religious body so torn and rent with schism. Yet certain of their Nonconformist friends might, in time, experience a similar fate unless they discarded the trust deeds which imposed on their ministers and members the acceptance of dogmas the hollowness of at least some of which had been demonstrated by a wider knowledge and an exacter criticism. Then they would be entitled to appropriate the honourable title of "the Free Churches," and might become less unwilling to extend the hand of Christian fellowship to those whose faith was justified by free inquiry and founded on the exercise of private judgment. The insistent presentation of priestly claims had its analogue in our school boards, and had seriously limited the scope and retarded the progress of public education. The Act of 1870 was by no means a sample of the wisest legislation. The spurious system of cumulative voting invested the boards and all their proceedings with a sectarian atmosphere, and led one-half the members to paralyse, in the interests of doctrinal teaching, the freer action of the undenominational party. He hoped that blunder would be avoided by the election of lay members only on the committees for that system of secondary education so long contemplated and so urgently required.

Mr. Rawson then went on to speak of some aspects of public social worship. He regretfully shared the widely spread opinion that the number of worshippers had of late years seriously diminished. In large towns it must be so, owing to the removal of former residents to the suburbs and yet more distant places. In the case of Manchester he could reckon about twenty churches and chapels which existed thirty years ago within about half a mile of the Exchange, every one of which had disappeared. If one could believe that people had maintained in their new localities their connection with religious services there would be small cause for complaint, but it was hardly open to doubt that a considerable leakage had taken place. The excessive addiction to amusement and what was called sport, so characteristic of the time, was largely responsible for this decadence. The rapid increase of cycling and lawn-tennis pleasures, among others—especially on the Sunday—carried off great numbers from their accustomed attendance. He was no Sabbatarian, but he earnestly wished that such engagements might be reserved for the ampler leisure nowadays available at other times and seasons. Sunday papers, innumerable periodicals, the gambling spirit were all disturbing causes, lowering the level of quiet and sober thought and interfering with the older and more profitable employments of Sunday rest and worship. Perhaps a little more familiarity with the literary treasures of the Bible would invest their services with additional interest. Offering a suggestion or two to the pulpit, he was of opinion that if the old form of philosophical essay and of technical theological discourse should further decline their disappearance would be borne with resignation and composure. Most laymen especially appreciated the occasional application of religious truths and principles to questions of practical life, to great movements of national thought and feeling, to such subjects as temperance, peace, and civic duties. He should welcome a more frequent presentation of the joyful aspects of religion, so often referred to in the sacred writings. In Mr. Barrie's "Little Minister" the question was put thus:—"Mr. Dishart, could you no pray cheerfully?" Words of courage and cheer could hardly be offered too frequently.

Unfortunately the word sermon had come to be popularly regarded as something not particularly attractive. It must certainly be one of the preacher's chief difficulties that he had always to speak, Sunday by Sunday, to the same people. John Wesley once said, that if such were his case, he should preach both himself and his hearers to sleep in one year! The expectation or demand for two new discourses a week was radically unreasonable and ought to be discountenanced. Originality was not too common a gift in any form of intellectual labour. Well or ill, the preacher had always to produce new matter. Why should it be attempted? Why seek to draw water when the well was exhausted? There was a perfectly honest use to be made of other gifts of thought and expression. Why not then, at least occasionally, with frank acknowledgment, make selections from the rich stores which lay disregarded on the shelves? Why not make some use of the eloquence and the uplifting thought of Martineau and John James Taylor, of Channing, of Robertson, of Brighton, and many besides of large mind, spiritual insight, and Catholic sympathies? Possibly, too, some deviation might advantageously be made from the rigid forms of pulpit composition, and the more familiar style of an address be employed, revolving the element of personal appeal to the hearer, so characteristic of the teaching of Christ. He desired also to put in a plea for the children. The ordinary sermon could hardly fail to be a weariness to their young minds. He commended the practice he had found in a Congregational chapel, where at a certain stage of the service the minister devoted about ten minutes to an address to the children, followed by a hymn specially suited to them. He was glad of the introduction of responses in which all could take a part. By such methods children and young people might be led to regard attendance at worship not as an irksome duty, but a delightful privilege. A check would also be put upon the tendency—but too observable—to drift away in late years from the religious experiences which would mould their characters to finer issues, and there would thus be transmitted to future generations the sanctifying influences and graces of public and social worship.

The minutes of the last meeting of the Assembly having been read and confirmed, the treasurer's statement, in the absence of Mr. John Dendy, was read by the Rev. W. H. DRUMMOND, showing a balance of £37 17s. 1d. in hand. Mr. Drummond craved the indulgence of the Assembly for the collection which had been made, contrary to all usage, at the morning service. It amounted to £12 0s. 2d., which would be handed over to the treasurer.

On the motion of the Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, a resolution was adopted ordering the reconsideration of the method of electing officers and committee.

The Rev. J. Edwin Odgers was elected president, and the Rev. R. Travers Herford supporter for 1900, and an invitation from the Renshaw-street congregation to hold the next meeting in Liverpool was accepted.

On the motion of the Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS, seconded by Mr. O. HEYS, the report of the Committee on Public Questions was received.

REPORT ON PUBLIC QUESTIONS.

The report stated that on the Nonconformist Marriage Act there was considerable divergence of opinion in regard to its merits and defects. The Committee were, however, unanimous in believing that the real reform would have been to secure that every marriage should take place in the presence of a trained and qualified lay official, responsible for its being duly performed and recorded, while leaving it optional to the parties to add, either at the same time or subsequently, such religious ceremony as they desired.

The Free Church Catechism was welcomed for its efforts of conciliation, but criticised on other grounds. This section of the report we hope to print in full next week.

The Committee seriously protested against the action of the Liverpool School Board, by a majority of one vote, in introducing portions of the Catechism into the religious teaching of the Board schools. They regarded this as a violation of the spirit, if not of the letter, of the Cowper-Temple clause of the Education Act of 1870, and, with pleasure, the Committee noted the protest of the local Evangelical Free Church Council and of leading Nonconformist divines against this unwarrantable action of the Liverpool School Board.

As to Temperance the delay of legislative action was regretted, and the danger from enormous vested interests was noted. The protection afforded to children by sympathetic magistrates was a welcome sign, but legislation must make that protection sure. The question of Sunday closing, on which there was great unanimity, ought to be pressed to a final issue.

The initiative of the Tsar in calling together the Peace Conference was warmly welcomed, and earnest hopes for the furtherance of the cause of arbitration were expressed.

As to the crisis in the Church there was not unanimity of opinion, and two statements would be made to the meeting.

THE NONCONFORMIST MARRIAGE ACT.

Mr. JOHN DENDY, who was to have made a statement in regard to the Nonconformist Marriage Act, sent his views in writing. The Act, he said, failed to satisfy the principal object of the demand that in relation to marriages Nonconformist ministers should be placed upon a footing of equality with the clergy of the Establishment. It was not the minister as such who was empowered by the Act to solemnise marriages without the assistance of a registrar, but "some person" to be authorised by the trustees or governing body of a chapel. The object of preventing the attendance of a registrar at a Nonconformist wedding was attained, but at the expense of forfeiting a very distinct advantage. Clergymen had not a high reputation as registrars, and there was no reason to think that Nonconformist ministers would excel them. The "authorised person" had to conform to rules and regulations the intricacy of which might be judged from the fact that thirty pages were required by the Registrar-

General to set them forth; and the "authorised person" was subject to heavy penalties for the contravention of them, besides running the risk of illegally solemnising marriages. The agitation which had resulted in this Act had been pursued on wrong lines. Instead of the matter being approached from the point of view of national importance, it had been taken up as a question of sectarian jealousy and privilege. In their desire to be on an equality with the Establishment some Nonconformists had been ready to saddle themselves with its disadvantages. The real reform required was indicated in the report on public questions. The one redeeming feature of the Act was that its operation was optional. It was to be hoped that there would be many cases of hesitation to become "authorised persons," and that before long the statute would be interpreted by the courts or amended by Parliament.

The Rev. C. J. STREET made a statement from the opposite point of view. He said that the Act, though extremely imperfect, and marred by amendments introduced in no friendly spirit, was a preliminary and, on the whole, an honest attempt to rectify a long-standing grievance. It removed the supervision of a State official for Dissenters only in the matter of marriages. The cost of Nonconformist marriages was to some extent reduced, and after ten years would be very much further diminished. The Act did not specifically name the minister as the "authorised person," although that was contemplated by the promoters, who found that, owing to differences in ministerial status and usage in the many Nonconformist bodies, a satisfactory definition of "minister" could not be found. There was nothing in the objection that Nonconformist ministers were unfitted to discharge the duties imposed by the Act. Quakers and Jews were already exempt from the supervision of the registrar; and in Ireland and Scotland all ministers did the work of registration. The penalties to which Mr. Dendy had alluded were only those already in force against the clergy of the Church of England. He thought the Act should be adopted by the congregations in the Assembly, so that their members who desired to dispense with the attendance of the registrar might do so.

The Rev. J. C. ODGERS said that he thought the Act should be adopted. Difficulties had been exaggerated, and the thirty pages of regulations were perfectly clear. The Act should be received as showing a real wish on the part of the Government to widen the sphere of Nonconformist liberty.

Mr. J. SHAW (Sale) said that Mr. Dendy had struck at the root of the matter. The Act was on wrong lines.

THE CRISIS IN THE CHURCH.

The Rev. C. W. WELLBELOVED made a statement as to the crisis in the Church. His position was very much like that of the Chairman. As this country is Protestant, he said, the National Church, established by the State, must be Protestant; and if the sacerdotal party prevailed, disestablishment must follow. And with that must go disendowment, for it would be intolerable that the ritualists should carry away with them the emoluments which now they wrongfully held. Sacerdotalism was a fearful evil, and there could be no truce with it. They must not be hindered in their opposition by any dream of a great comprehensive Church. The growth of broader sympathies and co-operation in good works must come by other means.

The Rev. P. M. HIGGINSON was unable to take the strong Protestant view of the question. He had no practical plan to submit, but certain great ideals had been cherished in that Assembly, in the light of which that matter should be judged. It was true they were Protestants of Protestants, and had carried the principle of private judgment to its extremest limits, but that enabled them the better to judge impartially an opposite principle. The opposite principle was that of authority, and that was what sacerdotalism embodied in outward forms. History testified that under the shadow of a great authoritative Church, and surrounded by its typical observances, there had been nourished a peculiarly sweet and beautiful piety, not seen in a similar degree in other religious communities. He was not prepared to say that sacerdotalism and the principle of authority were illegitimate things in the world, a degrading and debasing type of spiritual life. They must judge that principle by its best, not its worst, results, as they themselves would wish to be judged. There was matter for controversy, but it must not be reduced to a cry against popery. So long as there was a National Church, they should welcome the inclusion of all great and earnest streams of religious life. The safest way of dealing with the sacerdotal movement was to give it a recognised place in the Church, not to exclude it and turn it over to a Church governed from abroad. But the position of the clergy must be frankly recognised and made quite clear, for truthfulness and integrity in them were of the utmost importance. Very likely disestablishment might be the end of any attempt at inclusion, but it did not lie as a duty on them to try to forward it.

On the motion of the Rev. H. S. TAYLER, seconded by Mr. ALBERT NICHOLSON, the report of the District Missionary Societies was received. The report showed that £1,331 17s. 1d. had been raised for missionary purposes in the province during the year.

The Rev. R. T. HERFORD moved a vote of thanks to the preacher of the sermon, but this was met by the previous question, moved by the preacher himself, which was carried by a large majority.

The meeting then adjourned for tea.

EVENING MEETING.

The evening meeting was held in the Co-operative Hall, the chair being taken by Mr. F. MONKS, J.P.

The CHAIRMAN, in his opening address, spoke first on the question of ritualism, insisting that the clergy must obey the law, or disestablishment and partial disendowment must solve the difficulty. The priest had always been the enemy of freedom. The tendency of the clergy to materialise the spiritual life he believed struck at the root of liberty and true religion. As to their own churches he urged the importance of practical faithfulness in public and social life as a vital part of religion.

On the motion of the Rev. D. AGATE, seconded by Mr. JOHN HARWOOD, a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the Warrington congregation and their minister and to the chairman.

The Rev. C. J. STREET spoke of the privileges and penalties of free religion. The first penalty of which he spoke was the difficulty of independent thought, yet that was God's claim on the individual reason and conscience. They helped one another and learnt from the experience of others. The human spirit [was] receptive, but all that came from without must be judged by the inward test. The second penalty was their spiritual isolation; they not only stood as a small denomination, separated from others, but each one individually had his own spiritual experience. There was danger in too great reticence. If they had the courage to speak out what was in their heart, it often awakened a response and was helpful to others. Another penalty was their want of cohesion. There might be more union and co-operation without any forfeiting of freedom. Then they suffered from the risk of losing sight of the end in disproportioned struggle for the means. The fight for freedom had been noble, but it was that they might worship and serve God. These privileges were well known, and they all rejoiced in them—the sanctity of personal religion, the glory of knowing the truth however inadequately, the dignity of a free individuality, the realising of communion with God. Their position was indicated in the vision of Ezekiel, when out of the glory came to him the reply: "Son of man stand upon thy feet, and I will speak to thee."

They are slaves, who dare not be
In the right with two or three.

Mr. T. C. ABBOTT then addressed the meeting. He quoted Emerson's reply to one who asked if Unitarianism made any progress. "Oh, yes—by other Churches adopting our principles." Lord Beaconsfield had once said: "To be as good as our fathers we must be better"; and they with their privileges, if they were not capable of going further, in the same missionary spirit as their fathers, were not as good as they. There should be more aggressive work, not only through their preachers and teachers, but through their publications. They needed a better organ than they had at present to represent their section of the Christian Church. He believed in making some sacrifice for the views he held. Their people ought to come to the front more and show that they could guide, because they had the true conservative instinct.

The Rev. B. C. CONSTABLE spoke on the subject of "Allegiance to Truth." When, some fourteen years ago, he left the Congregational Body, what attracted him most to Unitarianism was its unfettered liberty of thought and its fearless search after truth. No one who had not passed through such a change could know the inexpressible delight of the new sense of freedom; but those who were so emancipated were filled with an enthusiastic desire to share with others the blessings of their new faith. There was nothing more noble than the unfettered search for truth. It would be a lamentable thing if they should be tempted to forsake their principles for the sake of popularity or inclusion, or should descend to the level of those who valued dogmas more than truth. As pioneers and sufferers for allegiance to truth it was not for them to beg for inclusion. There must be fearless acknowledgment of conviction in the pew, as well as the pulpit. If such loyalty to truth prevailed more, their religious community would be immeasurably strengthened.

The meeting closed with a hymn and the Benediction.

SPRING-TIME.

How glad the time when eager Nature breaks

Through Winter's dreary trance!
With magic touch the sleeping earth she wakes

And bids the brooklets dance.

No more the chill of slowly falling snow
Pales the fair landscape round;
In every secret nook the green things grow;

And flowers be-gem the ground.

The fresh-robed trees stretch forth in new delight

To clasp the balmy air;
And bending down to greet the waters bright

Themselves find mirrored there.

In mossy dells the happy sunbeams lurk,
And smile o'er hill and wood;
The Father looks upon his finished work,
And lo, 'tis very good!

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

A Swarm of Bees.

THE other day I saw a very wonderful and interesting sight—a swarm of bees. I had called at a house where there were some bee-hives in the garden, and was told that the bees from one of the hives had swarmed in a hedge. I was taken to the place and saw a thing very strange to see and to think about. Hanging on to a thick branch in the hedge there was a dark blackish-brown lump, something like a cocoon with the husk on, but longer, and thinner, and darker in colour. I should think it was about a foot long and five inches thick, but I did not measure it; for it was made up of thousands of bees; and bees have stings. Other bees were flying and buzzing about, so at first I looked at this strange lump from a respectable distance. I did not want to annoy the bees. I never like to annoy bees or wasps.

But as I found that they paid hardly any attention to me, I went close to them to see better. It certainly was a lump of bees hanging together. All over the outside they were crawling about; while some were boring their way into the mass, and others were pushing out of it. In one case I saw what seemed to be one poor bee struggling to get out of the crowd and three or four others pushing it back again; but very likely it was really something quite different. The whole thing looked like some desperate sort of a fight. One could not see what they could possibly be doing, except fighting. And, although I knew it was nothing of the sort, I almost expected to see a rain of dead bees dropping out of that fearful crowd.

It was a solid lump of bees, somewhere about 15,000, or 10,000 at least, as I learnt afterwards, all hanging on to each other. You would have thought hundreds of them must be crushed to death, or have their legs or delicate wings torn off.

But there were no signs of any of them being hurt. Think how good tempered and obliging they must have been not to get fighting. Fancy 10,000 boys hanging on in a lump in that way from a great piece of wood and all crawling about each other! . . . They could not possibly do it. Those at the top could not hold up the mass for a moment, and those in the middle would be crushed.

It was surprising to think of the strength of the little bees that kept hold of the branch with all the weight of the others dragging at them, all holding on by each others legs I was told. If they had been men they would all have wanted to be at the bottom, so as to have the easiest place.

And most wonderful it was to think of those many thousands of little insects all acting together in that strange way, without anyone to give them orders or to punish them if they did not obey. It was instinct. And what is instinct? Wise men can tell us something about it; but not very much after all. It is a wonderful work of God.

After I had watched them for some time the owner of the bees came home, and took them and put them into a hive that he had got ready for them. And this is how he did it.

He brought a bucket, or wooden pail, and pushed it into the hedge, so that the lump of bees was hanging down in the bucket, almost touching the bottom of it. The bees paid no attention to him. Then he gave a strong shake to the branch, and the swarm of bees tumbled down into the bucket, and he carried them off. Scores of them were buzzing about his head, but not one of them stung him; just as if they had known that, although he was treating them so roughly, he was taking them to a nice new hive.

They might all have flown out at once and stung him to death. A few did fly out, but the mass of them stopped in the bucket, crawling over each other.

He soon put a cover on the bucket. But it was a cover with holes in it large enough for the bees to crawl through, all except one, that was bigger than the rest—the queen bee. If that one had flown away they would all have followed.

Then he turned the bucket upside down, leaving a space under the edge for the bees that were flying about to join the swarm again, that was hanging on in a lump inside the bucket. After giving them a little time to settle themselves he carried them off in the bucket held upsidedown, with the cover underneath. So he brought them to a fixed wooden hive open at the top, and shook the lump of bees into it. They fell with a little thud. I am afraid some of them must have been hurt. They were there safe in their new home; and would then set about making honeycomb and filling it with honey, and all the regular work of the hive. That, I think, was a very wonderful and interesting sight.

And what did this strange conduct of the bees mean? It meant that there were too many bees in the old hive. So after getting ready for their new start, stuffing themselves full of honey, not from greediness, but to be able to make wax for the new honeycomb, they set off on their adventure one fine day with a queen bee or mother bee to lay eggs for them; not, of course, for them to eat on their journey, but to grow into young bees. Indeed, it was the mother bee that went first and the others after her.

She was somewhere in the middle of the lump. Very hot and stifling it must have been there. I saw one little bee fanning cool air into it. What made them do all this we cannot tell. They could not know much about what they were doing. But they felt they wanted to, and guided by that wonderful instinct of theirs, they made their preparations, more than I have time to tell you about, and carried out their object in the strange way that I have described, without disputing or quarrelling.

That peaceable unanimity all acting together as if there were only one mind working in them all at once, directing their movements like a drilled army, is one of the most wonderful parts of the affair. It was the same instinct acting in all the thousands at the same time. Yet each of them had its little bit of mind. They did not all act in exactly the same way. Some were flying about; some were holding to the branch bearing the weight of the rest, and I suppose changing places with others when they were tired; some were outside the lump and some in the middle; some pushing out and some in. I daresay they all wanted to be near to the queen bee in the middle. But although there was a good deal of pushing, it was all in a friendly way. They would push for a place, but they also gave way to each other, and never thought of fighting with jaws or stings. In all the confusion they did not lose their tempers with each other; and, indeed, bees belonging to the same hive never fight with each other. Instinct again do you say? Then I wish boys and men had more of the same instinct. As it is, boys often fight with each other about little or nothing, and policemen and law courts are wanted to make men keep the peace and not rob each other. There have to be prison cells for criminals; but I have never heard of any prison cells in a bee-hive. The bees all do their work and what they are wanted to do, because it comes natural to them. And we do a great deal in the same way. But very often we are lazy, or quarrelsome, or unfair to each other. If we are to be always as peaceable and reasonable in our actions as the bees, we must use our reason and control our tempers for ourselves. We shall not always do what we ought to do by instinct. But we have reason and conscience to guide us, and power over our own conduct and feelings, and Christ's teaching of love and peace. In all those ways we are better than the bees; yet we have in their order and unanimity a beautiful picture of the harmony and peace that ought to exist among men.

COLLEGES AND CHURCHES.

THE Churches are of great interest to the Colleges; we are not so sure that the Colleges are of equal interest to the Churches. It is easy to say the interest should be equally great on both sides, or that, if anything, the Churches, as composed of people of longer and wider experience, should be specially quick to discern the vital tie between themselves and the institutions which nurture their future teachers and leaders. Of course, the young men and their tutors look forward keenly to the next step when the College curriculum has been fully run. Where will be the spheres of work of these young lives who have been trained at such outlay of time, money, and strength? The question is more or less in view all through the student's course; it necessarily and properly affects the choice of studies and method of exercise. If it presses with peculiar force during the last few months, that is equally natural. There is very little like this peculiar pressure in the case of the Church, but now and then it comes. Circumstances arise in which the appointment of a young man fresh from College is most convenient, and, occasionally, most desirable, as things stand. Then, it is asked, "What are our Colleges doing for us? Where are the young men whom we want—strong, devout, attractive, cultured, ready to work hard and hopefully for our regrettably small pay?" Unhappily, it is not that class of congregation that could do very much by way of supporting the finances of the Colleges. The larger purses are usually in Churches where there is never any difficulty in finding men willing to occupy the pulpit; and it is rare indeed for such Churches to look towards the very youthful men who are just free from study. Nevertheless, it is very evident that, except for the assistance of able ministers who join our ranks later in their career, the ministerial supply of these leading congregations themselves must be derived from the Colleges, if not directly, then at one or two removes. This being the case, there ought surely to be a more living interest in these institutions. We are not now pleading for money on their behalf, though the Treasurers of Manchester College and the Home Missionary College would say such an appeal is always in order. That is so, and when they read the reports which we shall shortly give of the closing proceedings at our Colleges we should like our friends to search their hearts and see whether they would not go to their holidays with lighter hearts for having slightly yet substantially lightened their purses. But the greater interest still is the personal interest. The congregations must be held responsible in large measure for the supply of the candidates for admission to the College. We should be better satisfied if we thought that responsibility was more deeply felt. It ought to be pressed home upon them. There are lads growing up around us who in a few years must be our men, our true and wise men, leaders and prophets to their generation. Some of our congregations, and not always the largest, have done well in rendering this finest tribute to the Treasury. Would that all remembered its need! Questions arise, of course, as to incomes, "the unemployed," the "fit," and so forth. We will only say here that, taken all round, the income question stands easier now than at any previous time; and if the National Conference Committee can bring up a really working superannuation scheme, there ought to be little or no hesitation on that point—except, indeed, with those who want to "make money." As to the "fit," a word of caution is always timely. A number of well-meaning but quite hopeless youths might be found—some have been; but the result is disappointment and sorrow. This work requires the true and able worker; any other had better be kept out at once, and it is no kindness to think otherwise. We believe, however, that, even keeping the standard high, we have a good supply available of the right kind of youth; and what we press on the Churches is that for their own lives' sake, and for the cause of the truth of God, they should look out for and encourage the young men who show real promise.

SMALL kindnesses, small courtesies, small considerations, habitually practised in our social intercourse, give a greater charm to the character than the display of great talents and accomplishments.—M. A. Kelly.

ULLET ROAD CHURCH, LIVERPOOL.

OPENING SERVICES.

THE Ullet-road church, built by the congregation formerly worshipping in Renshaw-street chapel, Liverpool, was opened on Sunday last with services of dedication, the church being completely filled both morning and evening, and in the morning crowded beyond the doors.

In the western porch, leading to the spacious vestibule, a memorial tablet, in beaten copper, has been placed, bearing the following inscription:—

"To the glory of God, whose service is perfect freedom, this church is dedicated by the congregation, which, having been first established A.D. 1688, in Castle-hey, Liverpool, by the Rev. Christopher Richardson, one of the clergymen ejected by the Act of Uniformity in 1662, removed to Benn's Garden, South Castle-street, in the year 1727, during the pastorate of the Rev. Henry Winder, D.D., and again in the year 1811 to Renshaw-street, where, during 88 years, it met for divine worship. . . . In this place the same congregation has raised this sacred edifice, ever mindful that 'the hour cometh and now is when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth.'—A.D. MDCCCXCIX."

This tablet was unveiled on Sunday before the morning service, by Sir John T. Brunner, Bart., M.P., a member of the council of the congregation. Having been briefly introduced by Mr. Robert D. Holt, chairman of the Building Committee, in the absence of Mr. Henry Jevons, chairman of the Council, Sir JOHN BRUNNER said that the first to be asked to perform that ceremony had been Dr. Martineau, their beloved and venerated leader, and the second, Sir Henry Tate, their great exemplar in the art of wise and generous giving. When he himself was invited, he did not stay to question the action of the Council, but was there in obedience to their behest. His first note in addressing them was of regret at the absence of Mr. William Rathbone, who, however, had been kind enough to write a letter, which he would read, with the suggestion that it should be entered on the minutes of their proceedings:—

Greenbank, Liverpool, E.,

June 11, 1899.

Dear Sir John,—I am very sorry that, owing to important engagements in London, I shall not be able to be present at the opening of the beautiful new chapel next Sunday. As I think you know, my associations and affections have centred in the old one, but as it has been decided to leave it I should have wished to be with you all, especially at the first Communion, which I trust may signify the new birth of our Christian life and progress—that, having to part with old associations of worship and work, we shall also leave behind us habits and attitudes of thought and feeling which prevent many, who once shunned us but now agree with our religious opinions, from joining the few of us who remain to help in making the congregation again that powerful centre of worship and good work which it was for the greater part of the closing century, and before it. With hearty wishes for a successful and happy opening, I remain, yours faithfully, W. RATHBONE.

To Sir John Brunner, Bart., M.P.

His second note was of congratulation that they were there among pure physical surroundings, which he hoped might be typical of their spiritual life hereafter. It was not to be expected that he should say more at that time, than that he was heartily in sympathy with the beautiful ideas in the letter from Mr. Rathbone, and to those pious hopes he said with all his heart, "Amen and Amen." He asked them to share with him in the joyful hopes that filled his breast as he unveiled that tablet, and to enter with him into that beautiful temple, which they owed mainly to the loving care of their lost friend, Mr. George Holt, and his brother, Mr. Robert Durning Holt. He would only add in the opening words of the memorial tablet, that the building was dedicated "to the glory of God, whose service is perfect freedom." He asked them to enter the church in the spirit indicated in the closing words of the inscription, "ever mindful that 'the hour cometh and now is when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth.'"

Sir John then unveiled the tablet, and with the friends who had been present at the simple ceremony, entered the church to join in the service of dedication.

The order of the services for the day had been specially printed. The morning service opened with Pierpoint's hymn, "O Thou, to whom in ancient time," and included also the Rev. J. P. Hopps's hymn for the dedication of a church, "God of our fathers, hear our prayer." The evening service concluded with the Rev. A. Chalmers's stirring hymn—

"Spirit of Truth! our fathers reared Thy temple, stone by stone."

The surpliced choir entered the church in procession, followed by the ministers taking part in the service. The fine organ from Renshaw-street Chapel, rebuilt in the new church, and the choir, which had been admirably trained by Mr. Lee Lloyd, the choir-master, greatly enriched the solemnity and devotion of the services. The singing of Sterndale Bennett's anthem, "God is a Spirit," at the evening service, was in itself a beautiful dedication of the church.

The morning service was conducted by the Revs. T. Lloyd Jones and V. D. Davis, the Rev. Dr. Klein preaching the sermon on "The Temple of God," which will be found printed in full in another column. He also conducted the concluding portion of the service and the subsequent Communion Service, assisted by Mr. Jones and Mr. Davis in the administration. The first part of the evening service was conducted by Mr. Davis, and Dr. Klein preached on "The Growth of Spiritual Religion."

The text was Romans viii. 14, "As many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God"—words, said the preacher, which contain the whole essence of spiritual religion. The word "led" conveyed the idea of progress, and of yielding to a directing influence. The progress of nature up to man was traced, always under God's leading. The thought and will of man became more and more a conscious process. To feel himself led, to love to be led, to identify himself with the leading force, was the method of his higher progress. By being consciously, willingly led by the Spirit of God, man became the son of God. It was a mysterious assimilation of his spirit with God's Spirit. There was affinity between the finite spirit and Him who was from everlasting to everlasting. Paul said: "As many as are led." There was no limitation, such as theologians had supposed; and those words stated exactly the faith of their Unitarian Christianity. Their faith was not aggressive, it was tolerant almost beyond the comprehension of some, but they had a distinct testimony to bear, and they opened their church to all who were willing to be led in the way of truth, and by the spiritual affections, that led by the Spirit of God they might be children of God.

The new Ullet-road Church forms one of a group of remarkable churches bordering on Sefton Park. Its nearest neighbour is St. Agnes's, one of the chief Ritualistic churches of Liverpool; while on the other side is a large Roman Catholic church, and close at hand is the Presbyterian Church, of which Dr. Watson (Ian Maclaren) is the minister. The new church, of which Messrs. Thomas Worthington and Son are the architects, is striking in its external appearance, but the effect will probably be more satisfying when the complete range of buildings is finished, in which three sides of an open quadrangle will be seen from Ullet-road; corresponding to the church, a Congregational Hall is to be built, and the two will be united by a cloister, and the vestries and library which are already built. But the great beauty of the church is in its interior. As one enters from the vestibule at the west (by the compass the south) end, the effect is of a noble simplicity, of which every line speaks of reverence, growing in richness of beauty, which culminates in the reredos and the windows of the chancel. Externally the church is built of Runcorn stone and Ruabon brick; the interior is completely lined with Runcorn stone, which gives a warmth of colour with which the woodwork of the chancel and the roof are in complete harmony.

Architecturally the design has been based on the work of the earlier decorated period. Above the entrance at the west end is a rose-window, not gorgeous in its tints, but benignant and beautiful in design and colour (by Messrs. W. Morris and Co.). The nave, in which the whole congregation is accommodated, is lighted from above by large traceried windows, the aisles being simply passages, adding at the same time greatly to the beauty of the effect. There are sittings for 418 persons, with room for a considerable number of extra seats, and the chancel accommodates another 24, so that 500 persons could on occasion find room, without too much crowding, in the church. On either side of the great arch leading to the chancel are the stone pulpit and reading desk, and it was proved on Sunday that the acoustic properties of the building are most admirable. The panelled roof, which is not too lofty, no doubt largely contributes to this. The whole church is dominated by the three windows in the chancel, which are by Messrs. William Morris and Co., from designs by Sir E. Burne-Jones. Rising above the communion-table and the reredos, which contains a very striking reproduction in carved oak of Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper," the richness and the restful harmony of colour leave nothing to be desired. The central window is dedicated by the congregation, "To the glory of God and in memory of the Rev. John Hamilton Thom, minister of Renshaw-street Chapel from 1831 to 1866." It represents the same youthful Christ as the great window in Manchester College Chapel, but he is thorn-crowned, and holds a symbolic cross by his side; in the other divisions of the window on either side are the four evangelists. The background is richer than in the college window, so that the figures seem to stand more naturally amid their surroundings. The window on the left, which is in memory of Mr. George Melly, dedicated by his wife and children, contains an exquisite group of Jesus blessing little children, with the mothers standing by; while the window on the right, in memory of Mr. George Holt, dedicated by his wife and daughter, represents in its two divisions the angel announcing the resurrection, and Mary in the garden kneeling at the feet of the risen Jesus.

The organ, which is in a chamber on the left of the chancel, is separated by an open screen in carved oak from the choir stalls; on the right are the vestries, to which the further buildings are to be added. The floor of the chancel, approached by marble steps, is of tessellated pavement, with the centre in marble; on either side of the communion-table stands a massive chair in carved oak. The church is lighted with electric-light, arranged with great skill. There is nothing in the whole building that strikes one as put there for display, and nothing that has been negligently done. The workmanship is everywhere of the best. The sanctuary appeals to all who come in for reverent quietness, for joy in a beauty which fitly symbolises the beauty of holiness, and for devotion of heart and life consecrated to the highest service.

The very doors are a work of art, in beaten copper, from original designs, by Mr. R. L. B. Rathbone. The west door is the gift of Mr. and Mrs. Rathbone, in memory of the late Mr. T. H. Rathbone. The reredos is the gift of Mrs. Thomas Gee, the carved panel being the work of Mr. H. H. Martyn, of Cheltenham. The communion-table and chairs are the gift of Mrs. Henry Tate. The fittings of the electric-light are by the Birmingham Guild of Handicraft. The oak work of the interior is executed by Messrs. Hatch and Sons, of Lancaster, the carving of the stone work and part of the woodwork by Messrs. Earp and Hobbs, of London and Manchester. The vestries and library are not yet completed, but the ceilings are to be modelled in relief and painted, Sir John Brunner having commissioned Mr. Gerald Moira to carry out this decorative work. The congregational hall, with accommodation for Sunday-schools, which is to complete the group of buildings, is also the gift of Sir John Brunner and Mr. Henry Tate. When the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire meets next year in Liverpool we may hope that the whole of the buildings will be completed, that the members of our churches may rejoice together over a work so worthily conceived, and carried out with such generous faithfulness.

MEN are ruined by the exceptions to their general rules of character. This may seem a mockery, but it is nevertheless a fact to be observed in the records of history as well as in the trivial occurrences of daily life. . . . His first act of extravagance ruins the cautious man. The coward is brave for a moment, and dies; the hero wavers for the first—and the last time.—Sir A. Helps.

NOTES FROM ASSAM.—III.

Jowai, in the Khasi Hills,
Assam, India, May 7, 1899.

THE anniversary of the Khasi Hills Unitarian Union began on Saturday evening, April 22, with a Welcome meeting and closed on the following Monday evening with Addresses by the Rev. David Edwards and your Correspondent, on a subject which shows how problems long familiar to us in the West are beginning to agitate this young community of Unitarians in the North-east of India—namely, “Is Unitarianism Calculated to Foster a Spirit of Enthusiasm?” The numbers present were a glad surprise. By friends in England it will be seen that even in this day of small things the adherents of Unitarianism in these Hills are by no means to be despised as a mere handful. To what extent has this movement grown since a small congregation was formed at Nongtalang some ten years ago, and another at Jowai, in August, 1893? The attendances at the services at each place are carefully counted and registered. On this anniversary occasion representatives from the several congregations were present. At the morning service on Sunday, April 23, when two sermons were preached in Khasi, the chapel was filled to overflowing, and not a few were compelled to stand outside. There were present 104 adults, 111 children—215. At the afternoon service, when Mr. Kissor Singh and the Rev. David Edwards admitted two young men into membership, when your Correspondent baptised five children and three adults, and gave a discourse translated into Khasi, by Mr. Kissor Singh, there were present 147 adults, 110 children—257.

At these and at all the other services noticeable features were the devout and reverent manner of the people, the readiness and heartiness with which they took their part in the responsive service, and the brightness and intelligence of the singing. The Hymn-book used was not the one only already referred to as printed in America, but a smaller one recently compiled by Mr. Kissor Singh. It contains translations of hymns from well-known English and American hymnologists, compositions from the editor's own pen, responsive services, a Gloria, and some chants. The congregation and the school children have been trained by Mr. Kissor Singh and the head-teacher of the day-school in the tonic sol-fa system, which they have picked up with alertness, and in which they sing with excellent intonation. I was much moved and “felt a lump in my throat” as I heard these people sing in Khasi, in this far-off region, the familiar hymns, “Nearer my God to Thee,” “One holy Church of God appears,” “There's a Hope that is fairer than day,” “Take my life and let it be,” “O the Father's hands are helping,” “Ring the bells of heaven,” “There were ninety-and-nine that safely lay,” “Lord, dismiss us with Thy blessing,” and singing them to tunes Sunday by Sunday heard in our churches in England. These are the influences that make the spiritual life one all the world over, whatever the creed, complexion, dress, or social customs. Realising how hymns learnt in our own childhood constantly recur and prove sources of divine help and strength, I could not but thank God that these hundred children, most of whom sang without book, were storing up in their memories and hearts resources of power and treasures of inspiration for the experiences of their years to come.

It is worth noting that of the two men admitted to membership, one gave what was reported to me as an intelligent statement of his reasons for becoming a Unitarian, and the other expressed his agreement with his friend's declarations.

At a business meeting statistics of the movement were given for the year 1898. The facts thus stated appear to me valuable as affording to friends in England data for forming a judgment on what is going on. I make no apology for presenting them in a little detail.

At Jowai there is a membership of eighty-six—forty men and forty-six women—with an average attendance of seventy at the Sunday services. In 1898 the people contributed for ordinary purposes 120 rupees. There is a Sunday-school, a day-school, to which I shall presently refer; and a number of weekly meetings—Mothers' Meeting, Members' Meeting for devotion and conversation, Home Prayer Meetings (held at the houses of members in rotation, and said to be prized as most helpful), Prayer Meeting in the Chapel on Saturday evenings, and a fortnightly meeting of young people and children, at which Mr. Kissor Singh gives expositions of liberal religion with a view of grounding the rising generation in the faith, and of preparing them for their relation to the Church in the future.

At Nongtalang there was a membership of twenty-eight in 1898—eighteen men, ten women. The number was increased to thirty-two by May 1 in the present year. The average attendance is twenty-eight. Here also there are week-evening meetings of the same kind as those at Jowai. The people here contributed ninety-eight rupees towards the cost of their present chapel, which is now sadly in need of repair. They are raising funds for that purpose. The estimated cost of what is practically necessary reconstruction is 250 rupees. At the suggestion of Mr. Kissor Singh, who made the proposal in order to promote the spirit of co-operative helpfulness, each congregation in the Union has consented to make a collection towards this object.

At Raliang, where the Rev. David Edwards is minister, there is a membership of twenty-seven, with an average attendance of fifteen. In 1898 the Raliang people subscribed for ordinary purposes 4½ rupees. On week-evenings there are here Members' Meeting and Prayer Meeting. I was sorry to hear it reported by Mr. Edwards that his congregation is somewhat lukewarm, and of all the societies the least energetic in the missionary spirit. For this reason he considers that the aim of his ministry should be the vitalising of his own people with the religious life rather than propaganda.

At Laitbyngkot there is a membership of twenty-nine men and eleven women. Their Sunday and week-day meetings are conducted by themselves. In 1898 they subscribed for ordinary purposes 19 rupees. They are an earnest and enthusiastic band of Unitarians and are eager for a resident lay-worker.

At Shillong Mission station, where Mr. Mar Singh is the lay-worker, there is no organised church. There are said to be sixteen Unitarians in Shillong. The average attendance at the Sunday services, inclusive of children, is twenty-five. The present little chapel was opened in July, 1898, the former one having been destroyed by the earthquake in June, 1897. Towards the cost of the new building Mr. Robin Roy contributed 50 rupees, Mr. Durga Singh 25 rupees, and the Jowai friends 40 rupees. Since July, 1898, the Shillong friends have subscribed for ordinary purposes 8 rupees. Formerly Mr. Mar Singh paid an occasional visit to Laitbyngkot, but some time ago he opened a daily morning school, which keeps him regularly in Shillong. At present there are only nine pupils, but Mr. Mar Singh is hopeful that the numbers will gradually grow. The Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Missions are powerful among the natives in Shillong. There is also a strong Roman Catholic Mission there. The Episcopal Church is the church of those Europeans who go anywhere; a good many of them, I am told, are buttresses rather than pillars.

Besides the congregations named, there are Unitarians in several villages in these hills, where there are no regular meetings. There are two in Padu, seven in Nortiang, five in Mulang, four in Syndai, two in Shilmintang, and ten in Darang. These have been “converted” to Unitarianism by visits paid by the preachers and lay-workers of the Union, who preached and distributed literature on the village roadsides.

In addition to the subscriptions mentioned for ordinary purposes, 39 rupees have been contributed to the Permanent Mission Fund since January, 1899: Jowai, 21 rupees; Nongtalang, 9 rupees; Raliang, 3 rupees; Laitbyngkot, 3 rupees; Shillong, 3 rupees=39 rupees. With the sums previously subscribed, and with £5 sent by Mr. F. Nettlefold, of London, the Permanent Mission Fund now amounts to 178 rupees. This sum is not at present used, but is invested in the Post Office Savings' Bank. It is practically an endowment; and as it grows the income of it will be devoted to Mission purposes, and to relieving the grant of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

Is not this, on the whole, a creditable record? Does it not show that the people are being trained in the spirit of self-help? Does it not indicate sincerity and zeal? Here are people who have broken away from the demon-worship of their fathers and ancestors, many of whom were then brought under the influence of the Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Mission, but not meeting there what they craved for, have sought and found salvation in Unitarianism, and upon whom now all kinds of influence are used by the Trinitarians to induce them to recant. No one attending their services and living amongst them can doubt their heartiness; and in their devotional week-evening meetings—I speak of those I have attended at Jowai—when they pray and speak together, their simple piety appears, perhaps, more manifest than in their formal Sunday services. Of course, they have their lapses. What Church or denomination even amongst civilised and Christianised Westerns has not? But I am assured by an independent authority—I wish I were at liberty to mention the name—that, as a whole, the members of these little Unitarian congregations are examples of life and conduct to their neighbour.

At Jowai a Unitarian Day-school has been in existence since August, 1893. On Tuesday, April 25, the number on the roll was forty-four, the number of pupils present thirty—1st Class three, 2nd Class two, 3rd Class three, 4th Class (infants) twenty-two. As Mr. Sunderland and Mr. Harwood had done, I put Classes 1, 2, and 3 through a brief examination in various subjects. Generally speaking, the answers were much more satisfactory than I expected. I noticed that the younger boys and girls read English more fluently and accurately than the elder ones. The physical drill, conducted by Mr. Kissor Singh, was remarkably well done. The whole school was put by the head-teacher through the tonic sol-fa scale, and sang several songs in excellent tone. Some needle, knitting, and crochet work done by the 4th Class seemed to me—though I am no better judge of these things than are many of H.M.'s Inspectors in England—to be exceedingly neat. Two years ago two boys from this school passed the Government Primary Examination. At the last inspection four boys went in for this examination. The results have recently—not a bad proportion out of classes which number only eight or ten pupils—been announced. The four boys have passed. One of them stands at the head of all the passes from the whole of the schools in the Khasi and Jaintia Hills, and has won a small scholarship. Bravo! This is a feather in the cap of the Jowai Unitarian School. These successes reflect great credit on the head-teacher. Our friends are naturally and justifiably elated. To Unitarians in England it would seem but a very trifling affair; but here it is an event of importance, and will have weight in the community.

While I am on the subject of day-schools, I may mention that a few days ago a deputation from the village of Kafa—three days' journey from here—came to Jowai, having been told that an English minister was there, to plead for the institution of a school on the same basis as the Jowai Unitarian School. There is a school in Mulapur, their market town, but it is too far away for the Kafa children to attend. In Kafa, they stated, there are between fifty and sixty families, and the children are growing up in ignorance. Their parents want them trained, and they had sent some of their number to beseech me to have a school opened, they being willing to provide a building. Their appeal, interpreted to me, was earnest and pathetic. Here is an open door. I have no doubt whatever but such opportunities as this will multiply.

I visited Nongtalang, Mr. Kissor Singh and other friends accompanying me. Nongtalang is twenty-three miles from Jowai, and the journey takes two days for a European in consequence of the steep gradients. No European has been known to make it since Mr. Sunderland was there in the spring of 1896. It is made by Westerns in a Thappa. A Thappa is a bamboo chair in which the traveller is carried on the back of a coolie. Several coolies are required, as the road to Jarain is up and down hill, and from Jarain onward it is a rocky bridle-path with precipitous ascents and descents, perilous to any one not native and to the manner born. There was a Welcome Meeting on Saturday evening, April 29.

At the services on the Sunday there were excellent congregations. Mr. Kissor Singh admitted three into membership. I baptised three children and delivered a discourse. My appearance and brief residence in Nongtalang were a phenomenon. From the hour of my arrival to the hour of my departure, with the exception of the two nights, the house where I stayed was surrounded by children and adults, whose curiosity to see a white man and his ways seemed insatiable. But I was soon on good terms with all of them (although I could not speak to them in Khasi) and received scores of "Khublei's"—a word which combines an expression of goodwill with the wish, God bless you! From the way the youngsters presently began to crowd around one to be shaken by the hand and patted on the cheek I flattered myself that I had speedily become a general favourite! Our Unitarian friends at Nongtalang have proved their fidelity and steadfastness. I was glad to be amongst them, on the spot where the sound of the Unitarian gospel was first heard in these hills—a spot consecrated by the life of the first Unitarian of Nongtalang, the late U. Heb Poblong, described by all who knew him as one of God's saints, and in his day a light in a dark place. His brother is one of the devoted company of Nongtalang Unitarians.

By the way, it is often said that the temperature of these hill-stations offers an agreeable relief to the overwhelming heat of the plains. But there is no rule without an exception. For example, on the return journey from Nongtalang to Jarain on Monday, May 1, the thermometer in the shade—fixed in the inside of a covered hamper—registered 110 Fah.! Refreshingly cool! On the same day and on several days before and since even Shillong was said to be like a Turkish bath.

It is interesting to note that among the Khasi publications in use in these congregations, and in constant use among the young people of Jowai, is a Catechism, compiled by Mr. Robin Roy with a preface by Mr. Kissor Singh. Mr. Roy gathered his material from the late Dr. Crosskey's "First Lessons in Religion," Channing's "Catechism," Dr. A. D. Tyssen's "Reformed Catechism," Minot J. Savage's "Unitarian Catechism," and Mr. C. F. Dole's "Catechism." I am told that Mr. Robin Roy's compilation is very well done. The fact that the literature he has used has found its way to these hills is itself significant of much.

What is to be the future of Unitarianism in this mountainous region, and among people the great mass of whom are still children of nature? All these congregations are unanimous that the great need is that of an English minister to superintend and guide the movement. At present it is controlled, and necessarily controlled, by a man of marked individuality and strong force of character, who throws his whole heart and soul, his leisure time and ability, into it; but he cannot go on for ever; and, besides that, circumstances may arise which would compel a considerable curtailing of the work he now does in religious reforms. In view of future possibilities, a man is wanted capable physically, mentally, and in business habits, of undertaking the management of the mission. It is the opinion of all the Unitarians, and of some of trustworthy judgment who are not Unitarians, that such a man must come from England. He need not be a man of great mental powers, but he should have a big, loving heart, should be patient, tactful, forbearing, sympathetic. The people are still in a backward condition, and it requires an infinite amount of patience, forbearance, and long-suffering to deal with them. But such a man would touch responsive chords in the heart of these hill-folk, and would bind them to him with cords of love. Is there no young man at Manchester College, Oxford, or at the Home Missionary College, Manchester, no young man like the late martyr-missionary of our London Domestic Mission, the Rev. A. H. Wilson (I forbear to mention our living Domestic Missionaries), who would give himself, for the love of God and man, to this work? It is not an easy work; it is a toilsome, laborious work, demanding an inexhaustible treasure of kindness and affection; but it is a noble work, and he who would consecrate himself to it would receive an abundant reward in the outflowing of the love of the people, and in seeing them gradually rising, under his influence, to a higher plane of life. May God inspire the heart of some young man amongst us to undertake this Christ-like mission!

S. FLETCHER WILLIAMS.

HENRY VAUGHAN, SILURIST.

II.

WHAT turned Henry Vaughan's mind in the direction of medicine we do not know. It may well have been the temporary sojourn of his brother Thomas in his neighbourhood; for we find among the mass of Henry's translations, which range from his earliest effort in Juvenal, through Boethius (by the way, his renderings of the Metres of this author strike me as far the best of his verse-translations), Paulinus, and Anselm, to contemporary foreign writers, one of a work by H. Nollius on "Hermetical Physick"; and it can hardly be mere coincidence that Thomas translated, about the same time a work of the same author, entitled "The Chymists' Key to Shut and to Open." But happily for Henry, he developed his own "medicinal geny," not so much in the direction of physical mysticism, as in that of the practical work of a country doctor. He pursued his studies at home, and never took a medical degree. The ordinary qualification of the provincial practitioner, before his date and after, was a bishop's licence; but there were now no bishops, and Vaughan did without it. Thenceforth we think of him as, for fifty years, the constant minister to the needs of others throughout a wide country district, till his death in 1695.

His poems arrange themselves at once under two heads, secular and sacred. On the secular side, the early volume had two successors, "Olor Iscanus" (The Swan of Usk) 1651; and long after the Restoration, "Thalia Rediviva," 1678, the collected scraps of many years, epistles to friends, playful verses to a lady (Etesia, this time, not Amoret), written as if to remind a younger generation that all the gallantry does not belong to the Sedleys, Dorsets, and Rochesters. But in the whole of Vaughan's secular poems there is hardly one that is worth learning by heart, or deserving of a place in a "Golden Treasury." They are vers d'occasion, full of forced conceits and artificial quips and cranks. And, strange to say, they bear hardly a trace of that observation of, and sympathy with, nature, which keeps an evergreen spot in even the most lugubrious of the religious poems. Precisely when Henry Vaughan found his true soul, of which the religious poems are the issue; how he arrived at a higher plane, on which the natural and the spiritual are mutually interpretative; what personal experience it was that made the scholarly versifier into a poet, and lifted the good churchman from the letter into the spirit, I suppose we shall never know. We pick up a circumstance here and there. His "Flores Solitudinis" (1654) are "collected in his sickness and retirement": he speaks of his "peevish inconstant state of health": in his poems, are unmistakable allusions to sorrows, partings, and bereavements. And at some time when he was desolate and stricken dumb, he found speech in the word, and new life in the spirit, of a brother poet, George Herbert, so he says; and what a happy providence it was! Herberts' "Temple," published in 1633, had reached a sixth edition by 1641. Herbert represents everything that Vaughan, by tradition and education, held to be essential in religion and worship: he always finds something in nature responsive to his mood, and opens his readers eyes to see it, in keen unmistakable ways; and further, there is in Herbert just that which gave expression to the soul of Vaughan at a time of solitude and depression—a contrition with regard to the past, and a sense of divine chastening, which seems to us, as we look back upon those sweet and innocuous lives, somewhat morbid and unnatural.

Herbert writes, while waiting to know the meaning of pains and losses and disappointments, in one of his "Afflictions":—

At first thou gav'st me milk and sweetnesses,

I had my wish and way;

My days were straved with flowers and happinesses;

There was no moneth but May.

But with my years sorrow did twist and grow,

And made a party unawares for wo.

My flesh began unto my soul in pain,

Sicknesses cleave my bones,

Consuming agues dwell in ev'ry vein,

And tune my breath to grones.

Sorrow was all my soul: I scarce believed,

Till grief did tell me roundly, that I lived.

When I got health, thou took'st away my life,

And more; for my friends die:

My mirth and edge was lost; a blunted knife

Was of more use then I.

Thus thinne and lean without a fence or friend,

I was blown through with ev'ry storm and winde.

Whereas my birth and spirit rather took

The way that takes the town;

Thou didst betray me to a lingering book,

And wrap me in a gown.

I was entangled in the world of strife,

Before I had the power to change my life.

Vaughan looks back upon the past with stronger self-condemnation, and sees it through the medium of the experiences of a particular period of conversion; thus in his "Garland":—

When first my youthfull, sinfull age

Grew master of my wayes,

Appointing error for my page,

And darknesse for my dayes;

I flung away, and with full crie
Of wild affections, rid
In post for pleasures; bent to trie
All gamesters that would bid.
I played with fire, did counsell spurn,
Made life my common stake;
But never thought that fire would burn,
Or that a soul could ake.

* * * * *

I sought choice bowres, haunted the spring,
Cull'd flowres and made me posies;
Gave my fond humurs their full wing;
And crown'd my head with roses.
But at the height of this careire
I met with a dead man,
Who noting well my vain abear,
Thus unto me began:
Desist, fond fool, be not undone;
What thou hast cut to-day
Will fade at night, and with this sun
Quite vanish and decay.

Flowres gather'd in this world, die here; if thou
Wouldst have a wreath that fades not, let them grow,
And grow for thee. Who spares them here, shall find
A garland, where comes neither rain nor wind.

Thanks to Izaak Walton, we know the story of the saddening and renewing of Herbert. The story of Vaughan's outward lot and inward struggles, during his long days of retired life by the "chrystal Usk," we only dimly gather from his sacred poems.

"Silex Scintillans: or Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations, by Henry Vaughan, Silurist," was published in 1650, and re-appeared in a second edition in 1655; this edition being a re-issue of the first, with the addition of a Preface and a second part. This volume is the source of all the poems which represent Vaughan in modern selections. Dr. Martineau's "Hymns of Praise and Prayer" contains no less than eight*—and certainly eight of the best—which I shall assume to be within my reader's reach and therefore refrain from quoting. One of them, however, "They are all gone into the world of light"—surely one of the most pathetic memorials of bereavement and loneliness in our language—reminds us how little we know of the author's personal history. At the age of thirty-three, at most, he speaks as if he were sitting alone among the ashes of all he has loved. Dr. Grosart thinks, and justly, that there are in the poems indications of two great sorrows occurring about the same time, and interprets them as the loss of a young wife, and the death of a young brother. As to the first, we can hardly doubt the application of such lines as the following:—

O calm and sacred bed, where lies

In death's dark mysteries

A beauty far more bright

Than the noon's cloudless light . . .

Sleep, happy ashes! blessed sleep!

While haplesse I still weep;

Weep that I have out-liv'd

My life, and unreliev'd

Must, soul-lesse shadow, so live on,

Though life be dead, and my joys gone.

As to the second, I think we may discern allusions to the death of more than one child of his own. There is the infant—

Whose blossome-life

Did only look about, and fall,

Wearyed out in a harmless strife

Of tears, and milk, the food of all!

And another, surely, from whom the poet gained his deep interests in children's life and thoughts, "those white designs which children drive," who "by meer playing go to Heaven." And this one died too, leaving just those little relics which the parent cannot touch without a tear.

Yet have I known thy slightest things,

A Feather or a Shell

A Stick, a Rod, which some chance brings,
The best of us excell.

Yea, I have known these shreds outlast

A faire-compacted frame—

"The Heaven that lies about us in our infancy" found its first poet in Vaughan; and the analogy which has often been noted between his thought, as expressed in such lines as—

Dear, harmless age! the short, swift span
When weeping virtue parts with man;—
An age of mysteries! which he Must live twice that would God's face
see. . . .

and the theme of Wordsworth's noble ode (Intimations of Immortality, &c.) receives further illustration in

THE RETREAT.

Happy those early dayes, when I
Shin'd in my Angell-infancy!
Before I understood this place
Appointed for my second race,
Or taught my soul to fancy ought
But a white, celestial thought;
When yet I had not walked above
A mile or two from my first Love,
And looking back, at that short space,
Could see a glimpse of his bright face;
When on some gilded Cloud or Flowre
My gazing soul would dwell an houre,
And in those weaker glories spy
Some shadows of eternity;
Before I taught my tongue to wound
My conscience with a sinfull sound,
Or had the black art to dispence
A sev'rall sinne to ev'ry sence,
And felt through all this fleshly dresse
Bright shootes of everlastingnesse.
O how I long to travel back
And tread again that ancient track!
That I might once more reach that plaine
Where first I left my glorious traine;
From whence th' enlightened spirit sees
That shady City of Palme trees.

Would that the soul of Vaughan had often found such wings! But it was seldom that he could "fly away, and be at peace." Restlessness, and a passionate sense of his own inconstancy and moodiness, seem to himself to be always keeping him at a low spiritual level. His heart is the flint, from which may be struck an occasional spark, but even this, perhaps, only by process of affliction.

Lord! thou didst put a soul here. If I must Be broke again, for flints will give no fire
Without a steel, O let thy power cleer
Thy gift once more, and grind this flint to dust!

The sweet content which Herbert found in his brief ministry as a country parson, the feeling of being stayed upon order, and calmed by routine, does not lay its healing touch upon Vaughan. His happiness is shortlived; ecstasy is succeeded by self-accusation; his devotion is but the work of the unprofitable servant: open the book at random, and these are the complaints that meet the eye—

How rich, O Lord, how fresh thy visits are!

I flourish, and once more

Breathe all perfumes and spice;

I smell a dew like Myrrh, and all the day

Wear in my bosome a full Sun; such store

Hath one beame from thy eyes.

But, ah, my God! what fruit hast thou of this?

What one poor leaf did ever I let fall

To wait upon thy wreath?

* Nos. 226, 295, 344, 426, 443, 540, 781, 785.

Thus thou all day a thankless weed dost dress,
And when th' hast done, a stench or fog is all
The odour I bequeath.

We have the same thing more fully expressed in the fine poem entitled "The Showre"; and the note rises to a wail at the end of "Anguish."

O! 'tis an easie thing
To write and sing;
But to write true, unfeigned verse
Is very hard! O God, disperse
These weights, and give my spirit leave
To act as well as to conceive!
O my God, hear my cry:
Or let me dye!

The reader who seeks further acquaintance with Vaughan will find, I think, that it was given him to write "true, unfeigned verse," redeemed, if by nothing else, by his knowledge of childhood and of nature, from the condemnation which has often been pronounced upon it as morbid in sentiment, and hard in style, even beyond "the inferior order of the school of conceit."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEALS.

London: Rhyl-street Domestic Mission.—The time has come when I again wish to ask the numerous friends of the poor for that kindly help on behalf of some of the poorest children, which are connected with our missions at Rhyl-street and Litcham-street. There are upwards of 800 in attendance. Many are sick, delicate children, and many of us this fine weather are, no doubt, reminded that the holiday time is drawing near when we look forward for the train to carry us to some country or seaside place, and much more do our poor children look forward to their annual excursion and the country from their dismal homes and surroundings. On behalf of the poor children of my Sunday-schools, I appeal to all those interested in the work of the missions to help me with contributions towards giving them their anticipated yearly treats.—JOSEPH POLLARD. Subscriptions or donations will be thankfully received by Miss Anna Sharpe, The Grove, Hampstead, N.W., or the Rev. Joseph Pollard, 21, Willes-road, N.W.

London: Bell-street.—Mr. Gray wishes to thank all the friends who kindly sent him goods for the rummage sale. He has not been able to send a personal acknowledgement in all cases, because some parcels came without a name on them, and in many cases the name was covered up by the label of the delivery company.

London: Wood Green.—On Sunday were held the Sunday-school anniversary and flower services—large and appreciative congregations on each occasion. Dr. Mummery discoursed in the morning on "Leaves" and on "Sacred Flowers" in the evening. In the afternoon a most interesting service was conducted by Miss Sudbery and Mr. Skelt.

Newbury.—Attention is called to the advertisement of the special meeting to be held here July 7; visitors are assured of a very cordial welcome.

Newcastle: Byker.—On the 15th inst. a meeting was held to introduce to the members Mr. Alex. Peaston, who has undertaken the duties of lay-worker here. The chair was occupied by the Rev. Frank Walters, who cordially welcomed Mr. Peaston on behalf of the members. He could not help thinking that the appointment of such workers as Mr. Peaston had proved himself to be would be beneficial to many of our small congregations. Who, he asked, was so likely to enter into the joys and sorrows of the working man's home than one who worked at the bench for his daily bread? Mr. Peaston had undertaken the superintendence of the Sunday-school, and would conduct the Sunday evening services, doing such visiting and organising work as time would permit. Addresses were also delivered by Mr. Robert Elliott, of Gateshead; Mr. Fred. C. Slater, secretary of the N. and D.U.C.A.; and Mr.

J. Duncan Donald. Mr. Peaston responded in an address full of hope and enthusiasm. Letters were read from the Rev. Arthur Harvie and Mr. George G. Laidler, both of whom were unable to be present.

Rotherham.—On June 11, after morning service a presentation portrait of himself was given to Mr. Henry Leadbeater, who has for a long time been treasurer of the church, and who resigned a few months ago. Mr. George Housley made the presentation, the Rev. W. Stephens presided, and the Rev. W. Blazey sent a letter to be read. All testified warmly to the excellent services rendered by Mr. Leadbeater. In his reply, Mr. Leadbeater said he attended the old church in Down's-row when Her Majesty was crowned, and in the course of his remarks recalled many names cherished and honoured by the congregation.

BI-CENTENARY RESTORATION FUND.

The roof and ceiling of the Ancient Chapel (1700) are now dangerous. The architects recommend entirely new ones. Much dilapidated in other respects, renovation is urgently needed. The cost of these restorations will be £750, or more. Towards this sum the congregation and trustees, with some old members and friends, have subscribed £320, which may be increased. The British and Foreign Unitarian Association has given £50.

v.

The Trustees and Committee of
St. Saviourgate Chapel,
York, England.

The Presbyterian cause in York dates from about 1663, and the Meetinghouse was built in 1692. It was conveyed by the Subscribers to certain Trustees to the end that it "shall be used and employed as a meeting place for religious worship or what other use or uses the said.....(Trustees),..... their heirs or successors, shall think most convenient."

The original Congregation and Ministers were, of course, Trinitarian.

The Rev. Newcome Cappe, who was appointed in 1755, is recorded to have been the first preacher of Unitarian Doctrines in the Chapel, and the subsequent ministers, the Revs. Charles Wellbeloved, G. Vance Smith, Charles H. Wellbeloved, F. Sydney Morris, and William Mellor, were all ministers of the Unitarian Body. There has never been any creed formulated on behalf of the congregation, but from time to time, occupying ministers have published statements of their views. The Trustees have never interfered nor been asked to interfere with any minister nor with the occupying congregation, on the ground that he or they were not fulfilling the conditions of the Trust.

Nevertheless, in May, 1897, an action in the Court of Chancery was commenced, the expenses of which are being borne by a London lady, who has no connection with the congregation. It is brought against the Trustees of the Chapel and the then Members of its Committee at the instigation, it is understood, of the late Rev. Robert Spears, Editor of the Christian Life, and claims

1. "An injunction to restrain the Defendants, the Fabric Trustees, from permitting the said Meeting house to be used for the propagation of Agnostic or Secularist or Atheistic Principles, Opinions or Doctrines, or otherwise than as a Meeting place for religious and well-disposed Christian people called Protestant Dissenters."

3. "That such of the Fabric Trustees as hold opinions inconsistent with the trusts and purposes expressed in the indentures of 1692 and 1719 may be removed from the Trusteeship and fit and proper persons appointed Trustees in their stead."

3. "An injunction to restrain the Defendants, the members of the said Committee from appointing or permitting any person to preach or conduct service in the said Meetinghouse who holds opinions or views antagonistic to those expressed in the indentures of 1692 and 1719."

4. "That the Defendants or some of them may be ordered to pay the cost of this action."

It must be noted that this action does not include the Trustees of the various endowments which the chapel enjoys, who would have had money with which to resist the interference, but is only brought against those Trustees who hold the Chapel Fabric, who have not at their command even sufficient funds to maintain that fabric, and who are known to be persons whom an expensive lawsuit would certainly ruin.

It is impossible to enter here fully into the various statements made in support of the above claims, it is sufficient to state shortly that the object of the action is to prevent the use of the Chapel for the purposes of teaching the doctrines of Unitarianism as held by the majority of the Trustees and Congregation. Copies of the statement of

Claim and Defence are deposited with Messrs. Munby and Scott, Solicitors, 3, Blake Street, York; their London Agents, Messrs. Leesmith and Munby, 12, Great Swan Alley, Moorgate Street, London, E.C.; the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the American Unitarian Association, and may be inspected; also copies of the final reply of the Plaintiffs which includes their submission "that particular religious doctrines or opinions or a particular mode of regulating worship are on the face of the deeds and instruments declaring the trusts of the said Meeting-house required to be taught or observed therein."

Generally the position of the Defendants is—that the congregation for over 100 years have been on terms of fellowship with and affiliated to the other Congregations of the Unitarian body—that the views at present held by them are those of the broader or more extreme members of that body, and are the logical outcome of the spirit of progressive thought, which is the basis of Unitarianism—they are convinced that the success of the Plaintiffs would involve the definition by a court of law of the terms "Worship," "Religious," "Christian," "Unitarian doctrines," and others, and that such definitions would establish for all time a creed, enjoined by law on the one Dissenting Body which has always refused to formulate a creed—they see that if the open trust of the York Chapel is held to contain "particular religious doctrines" so also will the other open Presbyterian, Baptist and Independent Trusts in England, and in such cases that the Dissenters' Chapels Act will be no protection, and all these Chapels that are now Unitarian, or Free, or Free Christian, will be liable to be reclaimed by Trinitarian Dissenters.

For these reasons, as well as for those more immediate to themselves, the Defendants are prepared to defend the action brought against them, leaving to their opponents the onus of engaging in a persecution for opinion's sake, but they hold that this matter concerns every Unitarian and other lover of progressive religious thought all over the world, and they confidently appeal for contributions, both large and small, towards the expenses.

An account, entitled—York Saint Saviourgate Chapel Defence Account, has been opened at the York Branch of the National Provincial Bank of England, and contributions to the Defence Fund can either be paid direct to that account or remitted by cheque to the undersigned, E. F. Lewin, Castlegate, York.

We, the undersigned Defendants, undertake that all contributions so made shall be applied to secure a fair trial of the points at issue, and if by reason of the action being dismissed, with costs or otherwise, the amount subscribed shall be more than sufficient or not required, to return the contributions pro rata.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association have been applied to and a deputation from their Executive Committee was sent to York to meet the Congregation and report. As a result of that report the Plaintiffs have been approached by the Association Committee with a view to secure a peaceable settlement, but without producing the smallest effect.

The action, commenced as stated in 1897, has been postponed for some time owing to the endeavours of T. Grosvenor Lee, Esq. (President of the B. and F.U.A. 1897-98), but his mediation has now been finally rejected by the Plaintiffs and the case will probably come on for hearing in the Trinity term, before which time the Defendants should be put into a position to meet the considerable expense of preparing for trial and briefing Counsel. Having regard to the eminent Counsel retained by the Plaintiffs it is thought expedient for the Defendants to attain the services of equally eminent Counsel which will involve large outlays for Counsel's fees alone.

Through Nature to God.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 208 pp. 3s. 6d.

"A single purpose runs throughout this book, though different aspects of it are treated in the three several parts. The first part, 'The Mystery of Evil,' written soon after 'The Idea of God,' was designed to supply some considerations which for the sake of conciseness had been omitted from that book. Its close kinship with the second part, 'The Cosmic Roots of Love and Self-Sacrifice,' will be at once apparent to the reader. In the third part, 'The Everlasting Reality of Religion,' my aim is to show that 'that other influence,' that inward conviction, the craving for a final cause, the theistic assumption, is itself one of the master facts of the universe, and as much entitled to respect as any fact in physical nature can possibly be."—AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Summer session for Sunday-school teachers, which is being held this week and next at Manchester College, Oxford, under the happiest auspices, cannot fail to be a help and encouragement to the work of our schools, as well as affording opportunity for a delightful gathering of friends from different parts of the country. Considerably more than a hundred teachers are met together, for lectures and conferences, of which we shall give some account next week, while ample opportunity is left for enjoyment of the country, and of the wonderful fascination of the Oxford colleges. Even apart from the lectures, such a visit to the ancient University city may prove an education to many teachers.

MR. BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, one of the most interesting, capable, and intelligent coloured men living, is now enjoying a brief holiday in England. He is the founder and principal of the far-famed Normal and Industrial Institute, or Training College, at Tuskegee, Alabama. Upwards of a thousand students are working at the college, about two-thirds males and one-third females, the average age being eighteen. Mr. Booker Washington, with the aid of eighty-eight officers and teachers, presides over and directs the whole institution. Twenty-six different industries are taught, and every student has to learn some trade or other in addition to the studies of the class-room. The coloured students come from upwards of twenty states and territories. Two thousand graduates and ex-students are now at work in the Southern States of America as school-teachers, farmers, mechanics, housekeepers, and at other vocations. There are upwards of forty buildings upon the grounds of the college, including a chapel built by the students themselves. The bulk of the pupils and teachers belong to the Baptist and Methodist denominations, but the institution is unsectarian, the present chaplain being a Congregationalist. There will be an opportunity of seeing and hearing Mr. Booker Washington at Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, on Monday afternoon, July 3, at half-past four. His Excellency the Hon. J. H. Choate, the American Ambassador, will take the chair, and Mr. Booker Washington will give an address on "The Condition and Prospects of the Coloured Race in America." Seeing that one-third of the population of the South is of the Negro race, he holds that no enterprise seeking the material, civil, or moral welfare of America can disregard this element of the population, and reach the highest good. The meeting is free and open to all.

AN interesting summer meeting is announced by the Co-operative Holidays Association, in connection with the National Home Reading Union, to be held at Whitby for a week, beginning July 22. In the list of lecturers we notice the names of the Dean of Durham, Dr. John Hunter (who will lecture on Faust and Hamlet), Mr. Hulbert Fulkerson, and others. The topics range from Mediæval builders to choral music and voice production; and what with picnics and biological excursions from this quaint old coast-town of St. Hilda, the meetings are not likely to lack in interest. Circulars can be obtained from the Summer Meeting Secretary, The Abbey House, Whitby.

THE International Congress of Women has met in London during the week, and, in various sections, meeting in the Church House and the Westminster and St. Martin's Town Halls, has been occupied with discussion of the manifold aspects of women's work and social condition. In the Council there are now representatives of ten national Councils, those of the United States, Canada, Germany, Sweden, Great Britain and Ireland, New South Wales, Denmark, Holland, New Zealand and Tasmania, as well as representatives of eight other countries or colonies where women are preparing to join in the movement. Ladies from India, China and Finland were among those present and taking part in the proceedings. Lady Aberdeen, as President, delivered an inaugural address on Monday, in which she pointed out that amid the great variety of nationality and organisation represented in the Congress there was yet a unity to be found "in the common consecration to the service of Humanity, in the spirit of that love which we hail as the greatest thing in the world." The International Council was feeling its way to efficient practical work. One hope was of an International Bureau of Information regarding all that affects women, their education, work, position, and opportunities in all countries.

WHILE rejoicing in the progress of women's efforts in many directions, Lady Aberdeen's address contained the following wise and significant passage :—

There are many of us who, whilst rejoicing in the many new opportunities which have year by year been thus won for women, and in the increased sense of responsibility regarding public and social life amongst women which must effect so much for the country, yet have always felt that the banding together of ourselves, apart from men, for various objects must be regarded in most cases as a temporary expedient to meet a temporary need, and that it must not be allowed to crystallise into a permanent element in social life. Man was not meant to live alone—but still less was woman. Are not all these societies confined to one sex or the other, dividing the life of the race in a way not intended by nature or by God? It may be well and desirable at the present time to have our women's clubs and councils, and let us put our best effort into them to make them produce their best fruit, but let us also remember that they are but a means to an end, and that the redemption of the race can only be compassed by men and women joining hands, and making common cause in every department of life—not both necessarily doing the same work but combining to do each their own part of the whole together. It is often taken for granted that a Congress of women will occupy itself in devising plans whereby women may be emancipated from the cares and duties of home. I think I may assert without fear of contradiction that this is not the ideal of this Congress; that we hold fast to the belief that woman's first mission must be her home, and that by it she will ever be judged, and by its home life every country also which is represented here to-day will stand or fall.

ON the evening of June 20, by invitation of the vicar, a special service, attended by Churchmen and Nonconformists, was held in the Eccles Parish Church to celebrate the anniversary of the Queen's Accession. The first lesson was read by the Rev. P. M. Higginson, of Monton Church, and the second lesson by the Rev. W. E. Codling, of the Eccles Wesleyan Church. Both lessons were read from the Revised Version. The Rev. J. H. Dingle, of Patricroft Congregational Church, was also present. A sermon, as broad in its sympathies as the conception of the whole service, was preached by the vicar, the Rev. F. D. Cremer, the National Anthem was sung, and also the hymns "All people that on earth do dwell," and "O God, our help in ages past." The service, which lasted a little over an hour, was felt to be extremely helpful, and was an admirable instance what may be done in a parish church where the vicar is animated by a truly Catholic spirit.

THE following note on "the last word of a great surgeon" we have received from Miss Frances Power Cobbe (the President) and Mrs. W. Roscoe (the Hon. Secretary of the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection, 20, Triangle, Bristol):—

"Permit us to call the attention of your readers to the testimony given by the late most eminent surgeon, Mr. Lawson Tait, to the validity of our contention, even on purely scientific grounds, against the practice of Vivisection. In the Medical Press Circular of May 10, page 498, Mr. Tait wrote as follows to the Editor:—'You seem to think that my conversion to anti-Vivisection views is of recent date, but it is a matter of nearly thirty years old. . . . Some day I shall have a tombstone put over me and an inscription upon it. I want only one thing recorded on it, and that is to the effect "that he laboured to divert his profession from the blundering which has resulted from the performance of experiments on the sub-human groups of animal life, in the hope that they would shed light on the aberrant physiology of the human groups." Such experiments never have succeeded and never can; and they have, as in the cases of Koch, Pasteur, and Lister, not only hindered true progress, but have covered our profession with ridicule.'"

Some of our readers are impatient that we should ever call attention to this subject, but it is to us a question of vital moral importance, and such testimony as Mr. Lawson Tait's, on the scientific side, ought not to be disregarded.

THE June number of The Young Man contained a forcible article by Mr. William Clarke, M.A., on "Is Britain on the Down Grade?" Signs of degradation were noted in the growth of the gambling spirit and the dominating power of wealth, while the people remain with no commanding vision.

Business and amusement absorb most of the time of men, things material weigh down the mind, cynical indifference to every subject save money, and then the keenest eagerness—such is the tone of society, whether we are in London or Berlin or New York. The generous faith in great causes which has redeemed life from emptiness and triviality is not conspicuous at the close of our century.

Yet the future may have surprises of nobler life in store for us, and no nation can now live or die to itself alone. The federation of the nations is to come, and our people may be purged of their corrupting vices. The article concludes with Blake's lines as a motto—

"I will not cease from mental fight
Nor shall my sword rest in my hand,
Till we have built Jerusalem
In England's green and pleasant land."

In the July number of the same magazine, a series of comments on Mr. Clarke's article by well-known writers is published. Among others, Miss Frances Power Cobbe writes with confidence and hope for the future. At the same time she agrees in the strong condemnation of the passion for gambling.

It is the meanness of the fashion for perpetual gambling and betting which renders it a public peril. The continued indulgence of a sordid passion cannot fail to leave slimy traces. I never understood the meaning of the common phrase, "as ugly as sin," till I once went, without any preconceived expectations, into a great gaming-room abroad, and saw the Vice of Avarice absolutely written on the faces of the men and women round the table.

The evils of extended empire do not frighten me as they do Mr. Clarke. They are great, indeed, but they have their compensations. I knew Egypt before it was taken under the wing of England, and I think that the good we have done in that ancient land and the relief we have brought to the miserable downtrodden fellaheen may well be placed to the balance of our national account, against many faults elsewhere. It seems to me that our calling here, as in every other department of life, is to "do justice and love mercy," and to "deliver him that is oppressed from the hand of the adversary," and that we should rather send forth our soldiers and our civil servants with that grand old programme, to "bear the white man's burden," through the world, than shudder because a necessity seems laid on our race to roll onward over all shores like a mighty tide.

SOME little time ago we called attention to the admirable series of articles appearing in Young Days, entitled "Talks about our Unitarian Faith" (with stories and pictures of its leaders), from the pen of the Editor, the Rev. J. J. Wright. The article in the June number opens with a touching account of an old teacher in a Manchester Sunday-school twenty-five years ago, who had received his inspiration from the Rev. John James Tayler. Of that revered teacher an interesting account is given, with a good portrait; but there are two slips which should be noted. The date of Dr. Martineau's birth is given as 1807 instead of 1805, and in the heading of the "Words" at the end Mr. Tayler's name is misspelt. For the July "Talk" Mr. Wright has been fortunate in obtaining a very attractive account of the late Dr. James Freeman Clarke, written from intimate knowledge by his daughter, Miss Lilian Freeman Clarke.

PROFESSOR BRACCIFORTI, of Milan, sent us last week the following note:—

"In the last issue of Gerolamo Savonarola, my friend Miraglia's Sunday paper, the mouth-piece of Catholic Reform in Italy and Italian Switzerland, it is said:—'The Mass ought to be not a vain liturgy, but a Biblical school, according to the intention of the truly Catholic Church. The Missal is, indeed, a collection of passages from the Bible, which the Church makes us to read every day, selecting them from the Old Testament and the New (Epistles, Gospels, &c.), and proposing models for our imitation, in the Lives of the Saints. The Missal should, accordingly, be translated into the different living languages, as it is actually translated into Italian in the Oratorio San Paolo, at Piacenza.' The following is an extract from the Eco del Tevere of Rome:—'Who is don Paolo Miraglia? He went, unknown as yet, to Piacenza; called there to preach during the Mese Mariano (the month of May, dedicated to Mary, the mother of Jesus) of 1895 in the Church of San Savino. Such was the enthusiasm raised by him, that an immense multitude crowded every day to hear his preaching, and the church of San Savino became at once the resort of the most distinguished and intelligent people of Piacenza. Inde ire! One evening, at about the middle of May, don Miraglia hinted from the pulpit at his receiving anonymous letters, wounding his holiest feelings of tenderness for his mother, and the preacher could not help breaking into a vehement invective against the envious and cowardly fellow-priests thus insulting his mother. Hence the beginning of his deadly struggle against the Vatican. Interdicted, he rebelled against his bishop; excommunicated, he became a rebel to the Pope. Being prevented from ministering in the existing churches of Piacenza, he opened there a new one—the Oratorio di San Paolo—and while all the others are half deserted, the church of don Miraglia is always crowded with earnest and devout congregations. His successful struggle against the Vatican, after his late preaching in Rome, cannot help widening more and more throughout Italy. It is a phenomenon well worth being studied. Miraglia's success cannot certainly be arrested by absurd and illiberal police measures. It is the beginning of a religious schism, likely to bring forth the National Church of Italy, which were the best means of ending the quarrel between the Church and the State."

THE STEADFAST WARRIOR.

Nor to be idle, but by works of love,
And serviceable acts my soul to prove,
Not shirking duty's least congenial task,
This is my chief desire—no more I ask.

For all unvalued were the happiness
That heart might win, which knew not sorrow's stress;
And, lull'd by easeful periods, shunning strife,
Had slumbered on the lowest plane of life.

O better far to suffer pain, and die,
Than waste an hour in soulless lethargy!
Far better to be stung by whip and goad,
Than fare, unrecking, on a flower-strewn road.

O best of all it is to staunchly fight
For God and truth—to be a loyal knight;
Eager in labour, patient to endure,
And with a heart divinely brave and pure.

L. G. ACKROYD.

WE need not assist in the administration of the universe. If in the place God put us, and faithful to Him, we shall assist in the administration of the universe far more effectually than if we run hither and thither, anxious and distressed, and thereby weakened. In the present state of society, is there any way of doing good so sure as being good oneself, and doing the work assigned to one patiently, perseveringly, faithfully? Have faith; good influences radiate though not a word be spoken."—Journal of Practical Metaphysics.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

THE annual proceedings in connection with the close of the Session took place in the College on Thursday and Friday, June 22 and 23. Thursday afternoon was occupied with the reading of selections from the students' essays and examination papers, and with sermons preached in the chapel by the two retiring students, Mr. Alfred Hall, B.A., and the Rev. Charles Travers. Mr. Hall is going abroad as a Hibbert scholar, for a term of further study at the University of Jena. Mr. Travers returns to the charge of his congregation at Carlisle. At five o'clock the Visitor's Address to the students was delivered by the Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE.

THE VISITOR'S ADDRESS.

The Address dealt with the worth of the acquisition of knowledge, and particularly of theological knowledge. The College existed, Mr. Hargrove said, quoting the words of the Prospectus, "for the purpose of promoting the study of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy." It was "to establish a plan affording a full and systematic course of education for divines" that it was founded. "Piety alone," said its first Principal, in the discourse delivered at its opening, "however sincere, however fervent, will not insure to a minister of religion respectability or success. It must be regulated and assisted by knowledge." The present revered Principal at the opening of the College at Oxford re-affirmed that its objects were "the acquisition of theological knowledge, the exercise of theological thought, the attainment of theological truth." The teachers in the College were all students, and its students all purposed to be teachers. Divinity, the knowledge of God and of man in his relation to God, that was the object for which it existed, and, as was said at its commencement, "nothing which can illustrate either the perfection of the one or the nature, capacities, and history of the other can be alien to it or entirely unimportant." On this it might seem needless to insist. More than a hundred years ago Dr. Barnes had said, "With those who deny human learning we decline all controversy. Their reason is obvious. Illiterate themselves, why should we wonder if, like the Vandals of old, they endeavour to destroy all the monuments and honours of literature in others?" Yet the race of Vandals was never extinct, and they might even find that there were more in the present day who depreciated learning to exalt piety than when the College had its seat at Manchester. Even among themselves curious remarks were heard about the importance of the heart being in the right place, with allusion to "the head" as of comparatively insignificant importance. But the contrast was as ridiculous literally as figuratively, and those who would support their delusion by analogy of soul and body argued to their own confusion. A heart without a head would be a pump and not a man; a head without a heart an empty boiler: so zeal without knowledge was headlong and full of danger to the zealot and his victims; knowledge without zeal was inoperative.

But there were two objections of another kind and proceeding from quite other than Vandal sources, which if admitted would prove the College to be even worse than useless, to be mischievous and misleading to those who came under its influence.

Is there a Science of Theology?

The first was that there did not as a fact exist any science of theology. Astrology had been industriously taught and studied, while yet it rested on no basis of solid fact, and such it was argued was the case of theology. But to that he was content to reply that religion was as real a fact as any other engaging the attention of students, and of immensely greater importance to humanity than many sciences which agnostics themselves deemed worthy of a life-long devotion. To give all their attention to the physical forces of which our planet was the result, and neglect those moral forces whose outcome was civilised man, was to prefer the lower before the higher, to value the dwelling place above the dweller in it. If it was true, as Pope first wrote, that "The only science of Mankind is Man," and that they saw all things under the colour of human nature, then was the science of man's relation to God one of the noblest as well as the most real of sciences, and they might boldly make for theology the claim it had set up of old to be the Queen under whose rule all other sciences found their place and due relation.

What Profit in such Studies?

But there was another objection, very old indeed, yet born anew of the weariness and doubt and disappointment of the present. What profit, it was asked, is there in any study not concerned with the things of daily life? Public money was cheerfully given for technical education, for schools of design, colleges of science, laboratories and fine art galleries. The common object of these was to make life more comfortable and more refined; but what good purpose was served by philosophy and theology, and many would add history, archaeology, literature, poetry?

The story is told of St. Philip Neri, how once there came to him a young man who was a diligent student of law, hoping thereby some time to gain high office at the Papal Court. The saint received him with all kindness and began to congratulate him on his prospects, holding out great hopes of what he would achieve. But as the young man listened with natural elation, Philip put his arm round his neck and drawing his head towards him said in his ear, "E poi"—"and then?" The words sank into the heart of the hearer, and he turned back home, but his studies failed to engage him as before because of that importunate "E poi," and he let all go, the study of law and the dignities and riches he hoped to gain by it, and gave himself to God.

Of learning, too, as well as of wealth and honour, they might ask, "What then?"

John Stuart Mill had told the world of the desolation of soul which came upon him in the midst of ardent studies begun as a mere infant and carried on despite all the temptations of youth. "Suppose," he asked himself, "that all your objects in life were realised, that all the changes to which you are looking forward could be completely effected at this instant, would this be a great joy and happiness to you?" His was a far nobler ambition than that of St. Philip's young friend, but it was as hopelessly ineffective. An irrepressible self-consciousness distinctly answered, No! and he seemed to have nothing left to live for.

Assuredly knowledge was not an end in itself to which human aspirations might tend, and find in its attainment their rest. Even if there be a knowledge, a true science of God, yet "it shall vanish away." Their highest gain was but as an illumination of candles which made a little circle of uncertain light amid surrounding darkness, and in the rising of the sun were lost to sight.

St. Thomas Aquinas, the great theologian of the Middle Ages, had mastered all that men of his time knew, and what was far more had brought together all results of human learning in one great Summa, which beginning with God as mortal vision could discern Him, dealt with the work of creation, and the nature of angels and of men, and traced the long path by which man by his own acts and the virtue of sacraments and the grace of Christ might return to Him from whom he came, and the grand interlude of time be ended at the Final Judgment. Of him it is told that when the end of the long labour which was to crown his life with lasting fame, and earn for him the not empty title of Doctor Angelicus, was close at hand, and it remained only to treat of the lesser sacraments, and of resurrection and judgment, he left off work, and could not be persuaded to write more at all. Of what did he think during those last months of a life which had been one of incessant mental activity? It might be conjectured that the over-wrought brain had failed; but the account of his last days, when he was taken by fever in crossing the marshes on the way to the Council of Lyons, and expounded the Song of Solomon as he lay dying, lent no support to that theory. It seemed rather that as the day drew near when he should see his task accomplished, and all that could be known of God and man, set down for the first time in complete and ordered fashion, the consciousness grew upon him how small it all was, how little after all the wisest knew or could teach, how pale the light of reason or even of revelation in the open vision which he had taught was the beatitude of heaven!

And they asked themselves, Protestants and Free Thinkers though they were, was not the author of the Imitation right after all, "What availeth a man to reason deep of the mysteries of God? For high and curious reasons make not a man holy nor rightwise, but a good life maketh him beloved of God. If thou knowest all the Bible and the sayings of all philosophers, what should it profit thee without Charity?"

Not Self but Humanity the End.

Such a conclusion as to the evanescent worth of knowledge seemed inevitable, if they accepted the view of life set forth in the old catechisms, and looked upon the present merely as a preparation for the future, regarding the individual as standing alone, his life business with God, his end gained when he reached his own felicity. In such a scheme of life there seemed little room left for study, and small use of knowledge on whose acquirement precious time must be spent. If the end was "To be happy for ever," the more or less of knowledge acquired seemed to matter little, before reaching that vision of God, of which St. Gregory the Great wrote, "What then shall they not know, when they shall know Him who knows all things." But there was another view of human life, taught of old, and slowly gaining ground in the present—that none were individuals, divided from and independent of others, that they were not figuratively but literally parts of a great whole, that none could reach his perfection alone, that the end for which they were made was Humanity and not self. If that were so, then all learning assumed another aspect, and science reasserted its supreme value. For they laboured and learnt not for themselves, but for the race; and when their lips had long been silent, and their rudimentary theories had been superseded, the light they had cherished awhile would shine on and grow brighter and brighter to the final confusion of controversy and the salvation of mankind.

The Building of the Invisible Temple.

They had seen in their day the realm of knowledge extending its bounds, and had believed that revelation was not sealed, but was open to man, depending in its depth and extent only on their ability to receive it, on their having ears to hear God's voice and eyes to discern the open vision of His glory. He stood a few days ago within the shadows of York Minster; far above rose the ancient towers, and dwarfed to insignificance the tiny dwellings men had erected to serve for birth and life and death. In the still sunlight of that summer's day they stood not more serene than mid the storms of five hundred winters which had gathered round them and left them unmoved. How small and frail and short-lived he seemed, who lifted up eyes to wonder from so far beneath. Yet even such men as himself had reared that solemn pile, a multitude of men great and small, forgotten all of them together, but surviving in their glorious work. One, indeed, conceived the thought of it in his mind and drew it on paper, but in vain had been his conception had not very many combined to carry it into effect. There were some to dig the foundations, and some to quarry stones, and there were carmen and labourers and stone masons and builders as well as sculptors and architects and designers. And of each one the part was essential, no single stone but some brother's hand had hewn it out of the rock and fashioned it and fitted it to its place; and none so humble but that his work was essential to the whole. So it was with that invisible Temple which the Divine Architect with infinite patience was long a-building by labour of man, the temple whose foundations they had not yet dug out, for it should stretch far and wide when once completed and rise high to the heavens. It was the temple of Science, with upsoaring towers and long drawn aisles and chapels of secret awe and shrines of the awful Presence of God made known to men; temple within and around whose unfinished walls they wandered, filled with joy and wonder though they could as yet only guess at the plan: temple in which men of the future should walk in sweet communion and experience that true knowledge and worship were all as one.

To the building of that temple they were all called to help, some few to great tasks, all to labour according to their ability. They advanced as a mighty army, a very few going before, scouts and pioneers, but all following. It was the great body that must take possession of what the few discovered, knowledge was given to the individual only for the benefit of the race. None learnt solely to their own advantage.

Therefore be of Good Courage.

In the holy cause of learning, therefore, they must not be discouraged at the apparently small result of great toil, nor be disappointed that the world did not appreciate the worth of even their best work. It was not for themselves nor for a generation they laboured, but for Humanity, and a better future. No true work was lost. Their reward was to leave behind what they had done and learnt, that men might be the richer and nearer to God and truth. They must be faithful to the trust received from the past, and generations yet unborn would be wiser and happier for their labour and patience, and should bless the far-off ancestors, whose very names they might have forgotten, but whose work should abide, the foundation of all they would have achieved.

CONVERSAZIONE AND PRESENTATION TO MR. CARPENTER.

Later in the evening, as there was to be no Valedictory Service, the Principal and Mrs. Drummond held a conversazione in the College, which was largely attended; and the opportunity was taken by a number of old students of the College, through the kindness of their host and hostess, to present an address to the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter.

The chair was taken in the library by the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones, as senior of those who had been students in the College under Mr. Carpenter. Photographs of more than forty past and present students were laid on the table, and these with others yet to be added, will ultimately be placed in an album to be given to Mr. Carpenter.

Mr. LLOYD JONES, having delivered an address full of reminiscences of college days and of grateful acknowledgment of what he owed to the College, and to Mr. Carpenter, called upon the Rev. V. D. DAVIS to read the address, which was as follows:—

To the Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A., Vice-Principal of Manchester College, Oxford:—

Dear Mr. Carpenter,—

Although we are happy to know that your connection with the College is not to be entirely severed at the close of the present session, yet we, who during the past twenty-four years have been students in the College, cannot allow the resignation of your full professorship and of the office of Vice-Principal to take effect without some united expression of our deep sense of the value of your services to the College throughout these years, and an avowal of the affectionate gratitude with which your old students think of you.

When we look back on our College days, amid many thronging memories we cannot forget what we received from companionship with you in our studies. You interpreted for us the fire of the Hebrew prophets and the devotion of the Psalms. You showed to us the spiritual truth hidden in many ancient forms of faith. And it is not only the teaching of the class-room that we now recall, but we prize the memory of words spoken in hours of worship, or in the converse of intimate friendship, in your home, which has been so freely open to us, or in glorious days among the mountains, when the secrets of personal religion, a Christ-like spirit, and the ideal of consecrated service were made clear to us. Words cannot tell of this, but the witness of what we owe to you is in many hearts.

We rejoice that in the fullness of your powers you will be still devoted to the same high service, and that while you have felt obliged to claim freedom from some College duties, the old bonds of friendship remain unbroken, and we may hope from your strenuous leisure to receive works that will enrich the literature of religion, and strengthen the testimony of Manchester College to the power of a spiritual faith.

As we now unite, not only in grateful memories of the past, but in heartfelt wishes for the coming years, we must link Mrs. Carpenter's name with your own, and we beg you to accept in these few words, inadequate as they are, the assurance of what your old students feel towards you at this time.

We are, dear Mr. Carpenter,

Faithfully and affectionately yours,

The Rev. L. P. JACKS, as representing former students, and Mr. ALFRED HALL, as senior of the present students, having spoken in support of the address, the presentation was made by the chairman.

The illumination of the address was the work of Mr. Paul Woodroffe, and it was bound in inlaid morocco, of Oxford blue, beautifully decorated by Messrs. Karslake and Co., of the Hampstead Bindery, and 61, Charing Cross-road, W.C.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, in acknowledging the presentation, said that he might well hesitate to stand before them after the words of generous affection to which they had listened, were it not that he knew they would interpret with kindly good will what had been said. No one could pause, as he did that night, looking back over twenty-four years of work, looking forward, he would not say to another twenty-four years, but at least with hopeful anticipation of service that he might still be permitted to render to the College—without mingled feelings which might well baffle utterance. It was told of one of the ancient Jewish Rabbis that he once said he had learnt much from the Rabbis his teachers, more from the Rabbis his colleagues, but he had learnt most from the Rabbis his disciples. Looking back over the influence to which it was his good fortune to be submitted when he first entered Manchester College as a student in 1860, he might well think that no debt could exceed that which he owed his teachers, the Rev. John James Tayler, Dr. Martineau and his distinguished son, whose loss last winter they all so deeply deplored. The personality of Dr. Martineau was so potent, the sweep of his thought so entrancing, that as a student he was completely carried away by it, and lived for many years in sole devotion and adhesion to that great teacher. But he was free also to confess, without abating one jot of loyalty to him, that as years advanced, and he came to appreciate more and more the qualities of a teacher of the Bible, a student and expounder of the deep things of religion, the influence of Mr. Tayler grew continuously in his mind, and he felt that he owed no less to him than he had owed with a more immediate consciousness of obligation to his great colleague. Of the joy with which he was able to return to the College twenty-four years ago to teach, of the privilege of serving under Dr. Martineau as Principal, and the high delight of studying and dealing in class with a literature so full of the deepest interest as the Old Testament, he need not speak. But at least he might be permitted to say, in the presence of those with whom it had been a continuous joy to be engaged in fellow-work, how much he owed to the present Principal of the College and to Professor Upton. Of Dr. Drummond he must be permitted for once to say in his presence that he had adorned the College not less by the extent and accuracy of his learning than by the splendid grasp which he had always exhibited of the fundamental principles of the College, and further still, by the beauty of a saintly life. From Professor Upton they had all learnt how to harmonise their philosophy with their faith, and how to meet severe personal trial with an exquisite serenity of soul. If, then, he came to speak of thosenineteen-eight (as he believed), though some had passed beyond their reach, who had joined in their work for longer or shorter periods during the twenty-four years which for him terminated that night, how should he speak of the varied advantage of continuous intercourse with students of so many origins, bringing to them the culture of different nations, not only within the four seas, but from Hungary, America and India, bringing also (and that was no mean advantage) the religious teaching of many different communions? It was not possible to overrate the value of the mingled elements that were thus brought together and thrown into natural relations of fellow-work by the adoption of their broad principle of study. And it had been his singular good fortune, through the goodness of his wife and her mother, to be able to carry on the intercourse thus begun in the class-room in their home either in London or in Oxford, and again from time to time away upon the hills. He had no intention whatever of giving up his connection with the College. He was planted there in Oxford, and in Oxford he hoped to stay; and as long as he had a voice to speak with it was likely that in some form or other he would be found discoursing to the students of the College, whether by formal lecture or in more intimate and private converse. For that was too great a joy to be lightly parted with. He laid down the greater part of his work on that day or the next, formally, in the full confidence that it would be taken up by a scholar whose distinction already in Oxford lent great additional weight to the representation of learning in the College. They anticipated much in the future from the advantage of the association of Mr. Addis with their work, and it had been a peculiar joy to him that Mr. Addis has thus been able to consent not only to take up the teaching work he was laying down, but also to initiate an experiment which he personally had very deeply at heart and for the prosperity of which he most ardently prayed. He believed that in the new Hall of Residence, over which Mr. Addis would preside, they would have great additional elements of usefulness for the work of the College, and he trusted that in the coming years the students would be no less closely knit together than in the past, and that they would be enabled still further to profit from the varied advantages which their residence in Oxford afforded. He was free to confess that he had not been without misgiving about the great change which was effected when ten years ago they moved to Oxford. He was free to confess, also, that there were elements in their London work, the loss of which he did not think had been altogether made up, and he thought there were dangers associated with their Oxford life which they had not altogether succeeded in meeting. It was always the privilege of the old to think there were giants in those days, and he believed he had noticed a slight decline in the appetite for lectures consequent on the relaxing atmosphere of Oxford, when compared with the ardour for knowledge displayed in earlier days. He might be tempted to indulge further in the vein of reminiscence which was the privilege of those who were growing old. He would only say that it had always been the happy privilege of the College to command a large amount of devoted service. He could hardly imagine any institution among them on which there had been poured so lavishly, so ungrudgingly, so continuously, the labour, the thought, the toil, the energy of a large body of men. It had been their great privilege to live in the confidence of the Committee and of the body of Trustees of the College. They knew, therefore, something of the service rendered unsought, continuously, often without acknowledgment in their day and for periods far longer than the twenty-four years he could count. He spoke in the presence of men who had given their whole lives to the purposes of the College, and he desired humbly still to tread in their steps. He desired, if the Committee and Trustees of the College would permit, to remain in association with the teaching staff, offering his services from time to time, as occasion might seem fittest, for some modest share in the instruction given in that place. He trusted to be permitted to enter into no less intimate relations of friendship in the future than in the past with the succession of students, which he hoped from year to year would still more largely fill the class-rooms of the College.

He looked forward to a continuously increasing usefulness for that building, which was more and more coming into relation of service with their churches. He looked forward to enlarging prosperity for the College, in the devoted loyalty of its teachers and the effective ministrations of its sons. He thanked them with all his heart for words which must remain in his memory until he died.

THE TRUSTEES' MEETING.

The annual summer meeting of Trustees was held on Friday morning, June 23, in the College library, the President, Mr. David Ainsworth, in the chair. There were also present: The Revs. Dr. Drummond (Principal), J. E. Carpenter (Vice-Principal), C. B. Upton, J. E. Odgers, P. H. Wicksteed (Lecturers), S. A. Steintal and C. Hargrove (Visitors), Messrs. R. D. Darbishire, Harry Rawson, J. H. Brooks, R. Harrop, Russell Scott, G. W. R. Wood, W. Long, J. Arlosh, H. P. Greg, I. S. Lister, the Revs. Dr. Brooke Herford, C. T. Poynting, Lawrence Scott, L. P. Jacks, H. Gow, T. Lloyd Jones, W. G. Tarrant, F. K. Freeston, G. Dawes Hicks, J. Warschauer, U. V. Herford, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, V. D. Davis, Mrs. Buckton, Mrs. Carpenter, Mrs. H. P. Greg, Miss F. Davenport Hill, Miss Anna Sharpe, Miss L. Toulmin Smith (Librarian), Rev. H. E. Dowson and A. H. Worthington (Secretaries), Mr. E. W. Marshall (Assistant Secretary), and others.

The minutes of the annual meeting of trustees in January and the catchwords of the minutes of subsequent committee meetings having been read, a resolution of acknowledgment to the Principal and Professors was moved by Dr. BROOKE HERFORD, and seconded by Mr. R. D. DARBISHIRE, in speeches which showed that no formal resolution could adequately express their sense of the devoted work of the teachers in the College and the eminent services rendered by them to the cause of religion.

Dr. DRUMMOND, in acknowledging the resolution, spoke of the support it was to them to receive that annual assurance of confidence. They found in the work of the College their highest satisfaction, and their trials were not very numerous. The older they grew the more keenly, he thought, they felt the pleasure of association with young life. The social intercourse they enjoyed with their students was perhaps even more valuable than the lectures. It brought them more into spiritual touch with one another and into closer sympathy, so that the impressions left were often of a more permanent kind than those received in the more formal instruction of the class-room.

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING then moved, and Mr. I. S. LISTER seconded, a vote of thanks to the visitors, and especially to the Rev. C. Hargrove for his address, with the request that he would allow it to be published. To this Mr. Hargrove responded.

The resolution re-admitting those students who were continuing their course at the College having been passed, the students entered the Library, and certificates were presented to Mr. Alfred Hall and the Rev. Charles Travers on their leaving the College. Essay prizes and grants from Dr. Daniel Jones's Fund were also presented.

RESOLUTION ON MR. CARPENTER'S RETIREMENT.

The PRESIDENT then moved:—

That the Trustees of Manchester College desire to express to the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, M.A., their profound sense of the loss sustained by the College in his retirement from the Vice-Principalship and the chair of History of Religion. That the Trustees recognise the inestimable services rendered by Mr. Carpenter, during the twenty-four years of his tenure of his Professorship, in his conduct of the studies of the College in Hebrew Language and Literature, in Ecclesiastical History and in Comparative Religion. That the Trustees bear their testimony to his high and accurate scholarship, to his untiring devotion to his duties as a teacher, to the constant thought which he gave to the improvement of the methods of the College, to the affectionate interest which he took in the students as their personal friend and counsellor, and to the noble elevation of character by which he exerted on them so powerful a Christian influence. That the Trustees are rejoiced to know that Mr. Carpenter will not sever his connection with the College, but that, as Hibbert lecturer on Comparative Theology, he will continue on the staff. That they look forward with confident hope to the fruits of his increased leisure in the enrichment by him of religious literature and the advance of the cause of truth; and that they wish to him and to Mrs. Carpenter long and happy lives in the service of God and man.

In making that motion, the PRESIDENT said he could not add anything to the terms of the resolution, but he looked back with the greatest of pleasure on his own association with Mr. Carpenter, which had begun in their school days, when they were in the same classes in University College School. Then they had been together as students in Manchester New College, and since then he had always been more or less intimately and pleasantly associated with Mr. Carpenter. With regard to the work Mr. Carpenter had done in the College, they were specially indebted to him for the attention he had given to the social life of the students. He had not even allowed the vacations to interrupt this, but had done much in holidays at the Lakes and elsewhere in bringing the students and other friends together. While they regretted the severance of any ties between Mr. Carpenter and the College, they were glad that the connection was only to be somewhat slackened, and not lost.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL said that it was a privilege to second that resolution, expressive of their gratitude to Mr. Carpenter. Although they could not all speak as the old students had spoken on the previous evening, and had not been personal recipients of all that they acknowledged, yet they had all been under Mr. Carpenter's influence and had felt the power of his life. Far beyond the mere intellectual instruction and the high aims of intellectual work he always put before his students, the one thing that impressed them was, that Mr. Carpenter had given himself to his work. For three generations they had known and honoured members of his family, and knew how greatly the churches had benefited by their services. Mr. Carpenter, by the loving spirit he and his had shown in all matters connected with the College, was bound to them by such ties, that they rejoiced indeed that they would still receive his help, and that their students would still benefit by that influence exercised with such power and winning grace.

Dr. DRUMMOND, in supporting the resolution, said that from his position it might be that he could estimate, even more thoroughly than the old students, the self-devotion with which Mr. Carpenter had given himself to the interests of the generations of young men who had passed through the College. He had always been planning out fresh arrangements by which the interests of the College could be promoted, and spared no thought and care and labour in carrying them out. His own earliest recollection of Mr. Carpenter was while at College, when he had very occasionally passed him on the stairs of University Hall. From the face of the boy as he then saw him, he had cherished expectations of the man, which had not been disappointed. And when Mr. Carpenter was invited to become professor at the College, he welcomed him with all his heart. From that time they had worked together in perfect unbroken harmony. They had constantly consulted together on the work of the College. Mr. Carpenter had clear views, sound judgment, strong convictions earnestly expressed, but never imperiously enforced. On him he could rely in any difficulty; and when Mr. Carpenter had confided to him his partial retirement, he had listened with a feeling of dismay. But he was thankful that he was still to be associated with their work, that he would remain close at hand for consultation, and he was sure that Mr. Carpenter would not be able to refrain from that intercourse with the students of the future, which had been of such inestimable value in the past. He was glad of that opportunity to express the full feelings of their hearts towards Mr. Carpenter, and the high appreciation they always felt in regard to his work with them as a colleague.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED also spoke in support of the resolution. He would gladly spare Mr. Carpenter, he said, more of what he knew must be a painful ordeal to him, for "few love to hear the deeds they love to do." Yet, warmly as they had responded to every word said in recognition of what Mr. Carpenter had been to the College, they felt it to be inadequate. The reason was that when they looked back over twenty-four years of a man's life, what was in his mind was his ideals and his failures to carry them out; but the world was so ordained that when a man had honestly set ideals before himself, and stuck to them, he had conveyed those ideals, not perhaps as he intended, but he had conveyed them without embodiment to the minds of others. Everyone associated with him read, not what he did, but what he meant. The spirit was the essential thing. What was in his heart, God enabled him to convey to others. Mr. Carpenter must accept what was said as evidence, that to mean a thing was to get passage for it to every one's mind. Looking back upon his work, as distinguished from that of other strong personalities, he seemed to be distinguished by having had no imitators and no disciples. But every one who had passed through Mr. Carpenter's hands had his own personality brought out in richer and cleaner features; and who would not prefer to enable a man to express himself rather than carry away the impress of his teacher? If they asked what were the special qualities brought to Mr. Carpenter's work and developed in it, they might put first his love for the subjects he had to teach. It was said that the best a man could teach was himself; but he must not know it, he must care for the things he is teaching. Mr. Carpenter had always had a genuine love and enthusiasm for the things he taught, and he called others to share the life he lived in them. And he cared for his students, not as the unworthy physician cared for patients as so much clinical material, and the unworthy teacher for his distinguished pupils as honour winners, but as men. He cared for them every one. Pursued by a relentless sense of the obligation incurred by entering into personal relations with the men, he had given himself to them in a way not easy to understand. Put there as a young man into a place demanding a great deal of honest journeyman work, with half a dozen subjects to teach, he had to choose between gratifying his own student instincts, and doing the work to which he was set. That he did the latter was not the least of his acts of self-abnegation. Those were the notes of his work in the College, and that abnegation had followed him into other branches of work.

The Rev. J. E. CARPENTER, in responding, said that it had been difficult on the previous evening, but it was still more impossible for him then, to acknowledge adequately the words in which they had recorded their appreciation of his conduct in the College. More than a year ago the Committee placed on record an affectionate estimate of his endeavours in their service, and he felt then that the language of their good will was so far more than commensurate with anything he had even hoped to do, that he trusted to be permitted to pass into comparative retirement and continued service without further words. He accepted with all his heart the good will which shone through the language of the resolution and the speakers' words. He knew them to be absolutely sincere, and if at the same time he almost felt as if he could sink into the ground before them, he accepted with humble gratitude the appreciation they expressed, and the interpretation Mr. Wicksteed out of an unbroken friendship of forty years had been able to supply.

Twenty-four years ago the Committee of the College did him the honour of asking him to accept a lectureship. He was young and in that field untried. The chief secretary of the College at that time, the late Charles Beard, told him he was called to the College service in the hope that he might qualify himself to be an effective teacher. He endeavoured to fulfil that call to the best of his ability. But when he measured his own knowledge by the side of that of the Principal or other of the great scholars Oxford produced, he knew how far he had failed. He endeavoured to throw himself as far as possible into the life of the College. He made experiments in teaching, and often failed. He made experiments with different men. Sometimes he misunderstood them, and sometimes they misunderstood him. But every cloud in time passed away and left nothing but affectionate good will on either side: of that, last night, he had the sincerest possible proof. As he looked over the long list of names there came into his mind the saying of an African explorer that had often cheered him in weariness and depression:—

Interest yourself chiefly in the progress of your journey, and do not look forward to the end with too great eagerness; in that way, if you advance only slowly, say three miles a day, at the end of a year you will have completed a thousand, which is a very considerable exploration.

At the end of twenty-four years he found the number of his students reached ninety-eight. To have been permitted more or less closely to influence the lives of nearly 100 men was no small privilege, and he counted it one of the greatest blessings of his life. To the Committee who had honoured him with unbroken confidence, to his colleagues, and to Dr. Drummond in particular, he was bound by ties of affection which he trusted would last his life. He hoped to be permitted to continue in the service of the College and to give as much time and strength to its work as he could spare from other tasks, which he still hoped to fulfil. He counted that moment a time not of loss but of gain to the College, because it marked the addition of Mr. Addis's services to their strength, and he had high hopes that the functions of the College would be more and more efficiently discharged.

On the motion of Mr. J. ARLOSH, seconded by Mr. RUSSELL SCOTT, a cordial vote of thanks to the President was passed, and the PRINCIPAL having announced that the students would re-assemble for the new session on Saturday, Oct. 14, the meeting was brought to a close.

VENI, SANCTE SPIRITUS.

Come, Holy Spirit! from above
Shed thy bright ray;
Spread, Source of good! Thy sacred gifts
Upon our way,
And fill with joy each saddened heart,
O come to-day!

Come, Friend divine! who art the rest
The weary know;
Thou art the coolness of the shade
Mid noontide glow;
The solace of our woes, when deep
Our griefs o'erflow.

Come Holy Light! inspire these hearts;
Dwell in each breast:
Where Thou art not, no freedom is,
Nor peace, nor rest;
With love and joy dispel our night,
And make us blest.

Uplift us from our low desires,
And be our stay;
O heal our wounds, and wash the stains
Of guilt away;
Melt frozen hearts, and turn to Thee
All steps that stray.

Come, Thou Almighty Spirit! come,
In love descend;
Give Thy blest gifts to all, for all
On Thee depend;
Fill Thou all souls, and give them joys
That never end.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I SPOKE to you last of what children might do for their parents, and I have a story to tell you now. It is only a very simple every-day story; but children like true stories, and this is a true one.

Meg is one of the "nice good children" of whom I spoke to you; one of the best and nicest girls I know. Her mother is a widow, and they have only very small means to live on; and the mother makes all the frocks and all the clothes that her two girls want, and is most clever and ingenious, and the girls always look specially nice.

The girls love and admire their mother beyond everyone; and they are always eager for her to get a holiday and a good rest, which she often sorely needs.

Alice is away at school, and in holiday times the mother is busy often all day long getting the clothes mended and made for her to be neat and nice when she goes back to school.

Well, what would you think the natural thing for the girls to do? Would it not be to help with the clothes, and sit and work with their mother? Alice does a little sometimes, but not much; but Meg reads a book, and occasionally looks up and gives advice.

"Why don't you come and help, Meg?" asked a friend who was present.

"Oh, I can't sew well enough."

"But is not that a shameful confession for a big girl like you?"

"Oh, mother does it so nicely; besides, I hate sewing."

And that was a good reason? Were there not times when the mother hated sewing? Did she never long to read a book?

Meg was thoughtless; she did not consider. Perhaps she would say, "Mother never asks us." Perhaps not; may-be it would be better if she did. But that is only half the matter. Did they ever ask her? What if Meg had said, "Mother, I am sorry I can't work well enough to do the best parts, but do let me try and do some that are not too difficult." See what would happen then.

1.—Mother would be pleased to be asked.

2.—Every little helps.

3.—More than the quantity that Meg did would be the mother's pleasure in the sense of help and companionship.

4.—Meg would be learning to work better.

5.—She would be trying to be useful.

6.—She would be giving up something for the sake of the mother whom she really loved so well, though she never thought it necessary to show her love in a way she liked so little.

At least six good things would have come out of Meg's little sentence "Let me try."

But this is all imagination, for Meg did not do it; the mother worked on alone, and Meg read on.

Another time Meg was putting on her gloves to go home after lessons, and she said, "Oh dear, my gloves are full of holes. Mother, can't you find time to mend my gloves?"

"Oh, Meg!" said her teacher, "how can you ask her? why don't you mend them yourself—and your mother's too?"

"Oh, I can't. Mother does it much better."

"Well, said the teacher, "I should be ashamed to ask her if I were you—a big girl like you, and a busy mother?"

Meg smiled, said good-bye, and went away. I do wonder whether she mended her gloves! It is so easy to want mother to have a rest—to have more time to herself. But where is it to come from? Fancy being able to help her to get it and not doing it!

As I said, Meg is as delightful a girl as you could find. Truly, even nice good children do not "requite their parents" always.

Alice and Meg's father was beyond their reach to do such little things as these for. Why should we lay up a store of all that the unmended gloves and stockings stand for, against the time when we can do no more of these things to help those whom we love best in all the world?

Children, dear children, awake! and let it not be so with you.

OBITUARY.

MRS. HAIGH (LIVERPOOL).

In the prime of life a beautiful and lovable personality has just passed away, leaving behind her memories fragrant with the very aroma of simple goodness. As the wife of the Rev. J. L. Haigh, for many years one of the zealous Domestic Missionaries of Liverpool, she was in every way a true helpmeet. Long before her marriage, however, she had identified herself with the North End Mission, and was beloved by children and parents alike—teaching large classes of elder girls; helping, with a store of favourite songs, in the Temperance meetings, and ever ready for usefulness in any direction. Her marriage gave her enlarged opportunities, and she seized them all. There was in her an unfailing fund of ready and cheerful sympathy, of direct, homely common-sense, and of high moral purpose which was everywhere recognised and responded to.

When Hamilton-road Church became part of the work of the North End Mission, it was amazing how rapidly and completely she won the same love and respect as in the old mission; so much so that when it became known that she had passed away early on Sunday, the morning service had to be curtailed because of the outbursts of grief. At Bond-street, also, in the evening, the largest congregation which had gathered of late years was a spontaneous tribute of affection, many who had not attended service for months coming—drawn by a common sorrow.

At the funeral on Wednesday not far from a hundred and fifty mourners attended in drenching rain, including members of the Mothers' Meeting, old Sunday scholars, and many others. There were also present the Revs. W. H. Drummond, W. L. Schroeder, J. Morgan Whitman, and H. W. Hawkes, all fellow-missionaries, with Mr. Haigh, past or present, while Mr. J. H. Burroughs represented the Committee of the Mission.

Genuine sorrow was evinced on all sides, and the scene at the close of the service was a wonderful testimony to the power of unaffected goodness.

GIVING OF OUR BEST.

THE opening of the Ullet-road Church in Liverpool has furnished a fresh instance, deepening the conviction which fills us with renewed thankfulness every time we enter Manchester College at Oxford, that our people are capable of worthy giving, and do not hold back from the giving of their best either in means or in devoted personal service, if only they are thoroughly convinced of the goodness of the cause. We think with unmingled satisfaction of the beauty of the new church in Liverpool. The great appeal of our cathedrals, on which the faith and loving devotion of past ages lavished so much wealth and care, may be repeated, in however humble measure, yet with the same unerring tone, in the smallest churches built for our present needs. In them, also, the forms of beauty may speak of reverence and faith, and may be eloquent of that care which aims at perfection even in little things, and in hidden places, no less than in the most apparent, insists that the same true spirit shall have unbroken sway. It is a happy augury for the future that such has been the aim of the builders of the Ullet-road Church, and that their aim has been not unworthily fulfilled. The building itself appeals to the worshippers who enter, to bring an offering of sincere and humble reverence, and unstinted devotion of the best they have, and the best they are, to the service of the Highest, both in worship and in that prayer which is the labour of an earnest and beneficent life. We rejoice that it should be so fully recognised that beauty ministers to the joy of worship, and that in the service of Him who is the Giver of all good and the Fountain of all beauty and all pure joy no offering can be too beautiful, and no standard too high for the measure of that which should be given both for the sanctuary and for that other building of which it is but the type—the perfected Kingdom of God.

Such a church in its measure, as Manchester College in its own special place, stands as a token of what faith demands and love desires. The College, with its noble buildings and its manifold equipment for efficient service, declares what, in the estimation of faithful men, should be the measure of the training given to a minister of religion. And the proceedings at the close of the past session, of which we publish a report this week, furnish abundant testimony to the thoroughness and devoted faithfulness with which, on the side of the teachers, those means have been employed. The retirement of Mr. CARPENTER from his office of Vice-Principal and his full professorship afforded to his old students an opportunity, which they eagerly embraced, of rendering articulate for once the honour and gratitude and affection in which he is held. And had a like opportunity arisen, we cannot here refrain from saying, that recognition no less heartfelt and abundant would have been offered to the Principal of the College, who, for a yet longer period, with single-hearted devotion and the grace of a true humility, has given his life to the same service. The College has indeed been fortunate from the first in its teachers, maintaining in their person, as in the laymen who in other ways have had its interests in charge, a lofty ideal, and never lowering the standard of what is required of those who are called to the ministry of religion.

And this leads us to a further thought, which demands the most earnest consideration of our whole community. We have seen how, for the building of a church, and for the building and maintenance of the College, our people have given of their best. Are they now giving of the best of their manhood worthily to maintain the ministry of religion in our churches? It has often been regretted that the number of students in Manchester College, with its great resources, is so small; and it has been still more regretted that so few of the sons of our older families, for generations honourably associated with the life of our churches and eminent in social service, are now found devoting themselves to the ministry. The gravity of this defect was urged by Mr. CARPENTER on the occasion of the opening of Manchester College at Oxford, when at the soirée in the library he reminded his hearers of the obligation resting on the churches to furnish students to the College, who should be trained to carry on the work and maintain the high tradition of the ministry. And both before and since, this matter has engaged the attention of those who have the welfare of our churches most at heart.

Why is it, we must ask, that the ministry of our Free Churches has proved in these latter days so little attractive to those in whom we look for the noblest enthusiasms and the most capable and unselfish service? The same difficulty is being felt in the Church of England and elsewhere, but we will confine the question and its answer here to our immediate connection. We have on this subject a very clear conviction, both as to the cause of what is so deplored and its only possible remedy.

We do not believe that it is merely because the career of a minister is not from the worldly point of view a lucrative one, and that a man of culture and ability with a University education can make a far better position for himself in some other profession. This, no doubt, is true, and where no higher considerations carry weight, will have its naturally deterring effect. But even the prudential motives of right-minded parents, planning for the prosperity of their sons, would give way before the insistence of an overmastering devotion. The reason of what we deplore is to be found in the fact that the work of the ministry in our churches does not make the appeal which cannot be resisted, as being in itself the noblest, and demanding the noblest and the best that can be given for its fulfilment. We are far from saying that the attraction of this ideal is never felt; but we think it must be admitted that the life of our churches is not so maintained that through their needs the appeal makes itself heard, before which considerations of worldly career and prosperity are as nothing, and it is felt that in such service the loftiest human joy and the purest and completest satisfaction would be found.

The great need is that we should make our common religious life, in the fellowship of our churches and in their ministry to the world's needs, truer and more worthy, that our people should have a deeper sense of the sacredness of their calling, of the service they themselves must render as members of living Churches, that so they shall demand more of their ministers by the contagion of their own higher life, and, demanding more, hold them in higher honour. If thus they made the work of the ministry actually more arduous and nobler in the highest sense, it would be felt to be more honourable, and exercise a greater attractive force. This is not an end to be achieved at once; it is not gained immediately on recognising its existence; but it is that for which we must all work and pray. We do not plead that the position of a minister should be made easier or more attractive in a worldly sense. What may be rightly done to ease the burden of poverty, which often presses so grievously, must have its source in other motives. But we plead that the office should be exalted through the lifting up to a higher level of the religious life of our churches as a whole. Then, as they command of our best in other ways, the best of our manhood will be given to meet the supreme demand.

LITERATURE.

THE WORDS OF JESUS.*

It is a curious fact that the critical study of the Gospels has been the work of scholars who for the most part have known very little of the Semitic element involved in them. Biblical Hebrew, which no doubt most of the scholars referred to were well acquainted with, is of but little use in this study. What is needed is a thorough knowledge of Aramaic, the Aramaic not only of the Targums but of the Gemaras, and especially that of Palestine. The work cannot be done on a knowledge of Greek, even that of the LXX. Very few, indeed, of those who are best known as scholars of the New Testament are familiar with the post-canonical Jewish literature, and for the most part they content themselves with scanty references not always at first hand. Hence, as the writer of the book before us points out, the unsatisfactory results of attempts to set forth the Jewish doctrine of the Messiah, or to prove the existence of an Aramaic Gospel, by men who are not at home in the Rabbinical literature. It is as if a botanist should write a monograph on the potato plant without reference to its roots. Equally unsatisfactory must be attempts to expound fully the words of Jesus, without adequate knowledge of and reference to the Semitic dialect in which those words were spoken, and more generally the usage of such words in Jewish speech and thought. Not, of course, that the words of Jesus can be fully explained from such usage, as if he were no original thinker but a borrower of other men's thoughts; but, nevertheless, that the meaning of his words cannot be fully understood unless and until we understand their relation to the speech and thought of those who heard him. Such knowledge has hitherto been almost entirely wanting, and the book before us is the beginning of an attempt to supply it in a complete and scientific manner. Professor Dalman is known to students as a thorough Rabbinical scholar—a rara avis amongst Christians—and this book will add to his reputation. He has previously published an excellent grammar of the Jewish-Palestinian Aramaic, a book which I know from frequent use to be very well done. It forms a kind of preparation for the present work, and a very necessary one. The present work itself is only introductory to the study of the words of Jesus, and the detailed examination of the separate utterances in order is reserved for a forthcoming volume. But even this introductory volume is full of interest, and abundant critical material never before, so far as I know, collected together. It falls into two parts; first, prolegomena, containing chapters on "Aramaic as the Language of the Jews,"

"Literary use of Hebrew," "The Semitisms of the Synoptic Gospels," "Alleged Evidence for a Hebrew Original Gospel," "Evidence for an Aramaic Gospel," "Statement of the Subject," and "Choice of Dialect." The second part, which amounts to nearly two-thirds of the book, deals with such general conceptions as "The Kingdom of God," "The World to Come," "Eternal Life," "The World," "The Lord," as applied to God, "The Father in Heaven," "The Son of Man," "The Son of God," "Christ," "The Son of David," "The Lord," as applied to Jesus, "Master," as applied to Jesus. An appendix contains some dozen or so of Messianic texts from the post-canonical Jewish literature, Greek and Aramaic and New Hebrew. A good table of contents, a full list of authorities used, and indices of Greek and Aramaic words, and of synoptic texts quoted, complete the work.

It is not easy to give an account of the varied contents of this book without quotations from Jewish texts that might prove a difficulty to the compositor; and, on that account, if on no other, to the reader also. I shall therefore merely notice one of the more general points of interest, leaving to the experts, who will readily understand the value of the book, to make acquaintance with it in detail for themselves.

The question has often been discussed whether there was not an original Semitic Gospel, from which the synoptics have all obtained material, and whose existence will explain both the frequent identity of passages common to two or to three of the synoptics, and will also explain the Semitic colouring, so to speak, of many synoptic phrases. Between the unquestionably Aramaic speech of Jesus himself, and the visible fact of the present Greek text of the Gospels, what is the connection?

Dalman answers that question by saying that there was no primitive Semitic Gospel, whether Hebrew or Aramaic; but that the Synoptic Gospels—whether in their present form or not—were written in Greek, and represent an oral tradition which was also Greek. Thus the translation of the Aramaic of Jesus into Greek would be the work of those who first preached the Gospel as his apostles. Dalman examines the arguments which have been put forward, notably by Resch, for the existence of a primitive Hebrew Gospel, and dismisses them on the ground that they would, if valid, equally well establish the existence of an Aramaic or even Arabic Gospel. He shows that there was no obvious reason why Hebrew should have been chosen as the language of a primitive Gospel, and also that the real Hebraisms of the synoptics can be explained from the Greek of the LXX.

For an Aramaic Gospel there is more to be said; at least there is the probability that Aramaic rather than Hebrew would be chosen for the language of such a Gospel. There is also the statement of Eusebius that Matthew left a Gospel written in the mother tongue of those "Hebrews" to whom he preached. But so far as the evidence of language is concerned, the comparison of variants in otherwise parallel passages in the synoptics shows no more trace of an Aramaic than it does of a Hebrew original. For it is not sufficient to show that one Aramaic word could be rendered (correctly or by mistake) by each of two or more variants in the Greek text; it has to be shown that those variants can be explained in no other way, and also, in some of the instances cited, that the alleged Aramaic word or phrase is really such. Here is where the defective knowledge of Aramaic possessed by some of the champions of the Aramaic Gospel shows itself, and leads to the breakdown of their case. Dalman's conclusion is that the existence of an Aramaic primitive Gospel is not confirmed by the linguistic evidence, whatever other support it may have. He maintains that Greek was sufficiently well known, even amongst Jews in Palestine, that the original Gospel (if there was one) might quite well have been written in Greek. That is doubtless true, so far as the writing of a Gospel is concerned. That the oral teaching from which the written Gospels must in some way have arisen, was also, and from the beginning in Greek, does not seem to me to be proved or even probable. It is certain that the Jewish Christians—or many of them—kept very close to the usages and language of the synagogue, long after the time of Jesus; and amongst these the oral tradition must almost certainly have been taught in Aramaic, at least for a time. However this may be, the reader will find the linguistic material for the solution of this question dealt with in this book by one who knows the languages concerned as few scholars know them. Whether his conclusions be accepted or not, his arguments cannot be neglected in any future study of the synoptic problem, or of the interpretation of the words of Jesus; and scholars will recognise in his work an attempt to meet a want that has long been sorely felt. The second volume will by such be awaited with an expectation heightened by the excellence of the first.

R. TRAVERS HERFORD.

ECONOMIC FOUNDATIONS OF SOCIETY.*

EVERY preacher may be excused for leaving any volume of sermons unread, since they are likely to weary him if they are no better than his own; or to drive him into the valley of humiliation, if they move on a high level to which he cannot attain. A more serious justification for his neglect may be found in the fact that the sermon almost of necessity gives an incomplete reflection of life. The preacher is concerned with the reality and power of the inner life of the spirit. He selects certain facts and treats them with simplicity for the sake of clearness and emphasis. There is a danger lest he and his hearers come to regard the actual facts as being as clear and simple as the artistic presentation of them.

The volume that lies before us is one that should act as a corrective to this tendency. I cordially recommend it to my fellow-preachers and to hearers of sermons, not because it is altogether true, but because even where the author errs his error is so unlike that which is common in a religious community that his thoughts almost gain in value for the readers of this journal by reason of their exaggeration. M. Loria gives us a serious discussion of some of the chief problems of social philosophy. The title sufficiently indicates the scope of the book in which the influence of economic conditions upon mental and moral knowledge and energy is well illustrated. The equally real influence of ideas upon conditions is not acknowledged. But the facts on which our attention is concentrated are of prime importance.

The theory, stated baldly, is that the moral conceptions and the legal and political institutions of a given society at a given period are determined by the economic interests of the proprietary classes. "A horrible theory," I have been told by a friend. But the question rather is whether and how far it is true. M. Loria assumes that at the dawn of our present civilisation there was a society in which the land was held in common, and law and morality were determined by the mutual interest of the free and equal co-proprietors. He regards this state not as a hypothesis, but as a fact that has been proved once for all by Maurer; and in 1885, when the first edition of this essay appeared, Maurer's theory of the self-governing village community was in high favour. But in the thirteen years that elapsed before the second and greatly enlarged edition of M. Loria's essay the mark theory had been severely criticised, and we are bound to say that the historical evidence in its favour is very weak. However, if we doubt the existence of a state where the cultivators are equal co-proprietors, we are all familiar with the state consisting of proprietors and non-proprietors. And to this we now come, for the chief interest of the book lies in what it has to tell us about the different relations of the state to these classes.

The modern state is the creation of the propertied classes, and exists for the furthering of their economic interests; law and morality are instruments fashioned to increase their power and to keep the lower order in subjection. This supremacy is secured in one age by means of the sword, in another through the teaching of the Church, in a third through the force of public opinion. But public opinion, the morality of the Church, and the thrust of the sword are alike exploited by the proprietors for their own benefit. This, according to M. Loria, is the relation of the state to the disinherited—a relation of tyranny and subjection. And this is one side of the relation of the state to the property owners. The state is the collective force of the owners, and is exercised for their direct economic success.

But in a subtle argument, which is also to a large extent a convincing one, M. Loria develops another phase of the relation of the state to the individual owner. It places restraint upon him. It thwarts his apparent interests, only however to promote the real economic welfare of his class. The argument is drawn from the fact of the unconscious working of the human mind. As is bias in a bowl, so is self-interest in a man; as each one has a "personal equation," so there is a "class equation." M. Loria might not accept this phrase "working of the mind," but it will serve to explain in few words his meaning; nor is he wrong in the weight he attributes to self-interest, only in the narrowing of it to economic benefit.

The property owners are restrained from such oppression of the disinherited workers as would be dangerous to their own supremacy. The owners, e.g., leave off flogging their slaves or serfs just when that stimulus to labour has become wasteful. But some individuals continue the old method of discipline; these must be restrained for the sake of their own real self-interest. The restraint will be exercised in the name of humanity. But that, according to the author, will be an illusion.

It is perfectly true that, in the course of the evolution of society, the owners of property are more and more restrained from conduct that is oppressive to the victims of property, and this in their own interest, even for their own economic good. That is fact, but it is not the whole fact. The pursuit of material advantage is one of the dominating forces in society; but there are other forces. It is a fault in M. Loria's work that he does not, or does not sufficiently allow for this. His great merit consists in the unflinching severity with which he traces the far-reaching effects of economic greed, and shows how it often spoils what seems to be pure philanthropy. Thus we are bound to admit some truth in this sentence quoted from an official New York report: "Capitalistic charity does not spring from sympathy, but from the presence of a common danger" (p. 64). It is very necessary to unmask mean motives that masquerade in a dress of noble sentiment, and we are indebted to M. Loria for doing it. It is not less necessary but more so if, as I believe, some of the present-day movements of reform are not mean in motive. If there is a real and honourable effort of humanity, it is essential that we should distinguish it from the many insincere schemes that would withdraw our energies from the need for a moral and social revolution, which must, indeed, be peaceful, but will on that account be the more thorough.

My space is full. The central thought of this book seemed to demand discussion; but its pages are packed with facts and reflections which are valuable and interesting. Among these may be instanced the analysis of revolutions and the attempt to show under what circumstances they must be abortive, and how they may be successful; the theory of the function of the professional classes in modern society; the paragraphs on the growth of a proletarian army; and the forecast of a future society founded on co-operation rather than on competition. This last is not an Utopian picture, but a sober exercise of the historical imagination. B. KIRKMAN GRAY.

THE PREACHING OF UNITARIANISM.*

It must always be interesting to the preachers of a fluid and unformulated faith to observe the methods and gauge the achievement of their co-workers. When one of us, therefore, ventures to print, the rest ought to be grateful to him, although they may not feel moved exactly to emulate his useful frankness. These sermons of Mr. Balmforth, preached at Cape Town, are, distinctly representative of a "method" which is equally removed from the stately, austere beautiful manner which drew its inspiration from Martineau, and from the ordinary tract-and-pamphlet militarism of our propaganda. They form a single course of lecture-sermons "with the object of popularising the principles of Liberal Religion"; and, going through the usual list of subjects—the Bible, "Was Jesus Man or God?" Doctrine of the Atonement, the Church, the Reformation—Mr. Balmforth gives the clear impression of a man who has come to the preaching of Unitarianism by a special road, and now delivers a peculiarly modern message in a manner which suggests a certain set of implications and associations, a certain view of the world and its problems, belonging specially to the present decade. The book has the advantages and disadvantages of being a production of the day: ephemeral, in that good sense in which a good sermon must nearly always be ephemeral—fitted to present purposes, not looking for literary immortality. The lectures have certainly nothing of the college-essay style. They are just the thing to give to the inquirer whom you meet in orthodox quarters, who has not much time for reading, who wants a straight answer to his straight question "Is the Bible true?" and who, above all, wants to see "Liberal Religion" placed in its proper relation to the great movements of past time, especially to the "Middle Age and the Re-awakening," and the Protestant Reformation. The style (there is a little too much "style" at times, for reading purposes) is swift, discursive, impressionist, oratorical, and positive. Exhaustive treatment, of course, is nowhere attempted. It is easy to see who the leaders are whom the preacher has followed. He has gleaned industriously, it is true, among the "higher" biblical critics; but his real prophets are Ruskin, M. Arnold, Mazzini, J. A. Symonds—and, perhaps, Huxley. Here we have ordinary Unitarian teaching, but given with the peculiar modern passion for thought, for literature, and for social results. We miss the inwardness, the spiritual suggestiveness of those teachers whom we most value for our religious life; but this is partly explained by the nature of the subjects treated; partly also by the preacher's general view of Unitarianism as a present-day movement, rather than as a permanent force in the world's life equivalent to "essential religion."

There is one note in these lectures which preachers ought at present to appreciate. Having been trained in other fields of thought and practice far removed from Unitarianism, Mr. Balmforth has brought with him a love of clear statement which is shocked at the ease with which so many of us conjure with the old-fashioned words of a theology we have discarded. "The mass of mankind rightly resent such an elastic use of words" (p. 12). The protest is right; but Mr. Balmforth, perhaps, scarcely sees the other side of the question, and as he eschews metaphysics he has, alas! no helpful word to say to us on this fundamental question of symbolical ideas in religion. The book, of course, is not for that purpose. Even "Free Will" does not draw him out:—Free Will, "we all assume it," he says, then hurries on! (p. 68)

Some slips might have been avoided:— "When the Bible was translated into Greek, this word Messiah was translated Christus, and the Greek Christus becomes our English Christ" (p. 31). Also a

THE FREE CHURCH CATECHISM.

THE Annual report on public questions presented to the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, at Warrington, on June 15, contained the following passage on the Free Church Catechism:—

"Your Committee do not think it necessary in this report to discuss the exclusion of our congregations from the 'National Council of Evangelical Free Churches.' But the recently published 'Evangelical Free Church Catechism,' issued by the Committee of the Council, calls for some notice. The Catechism has been enthusiastically welcomed in many quarters, only a voice here and there being raised against it within the wide circle of the Churches which it is meant to serve. Your Committee feel that, for Religion's sake, we may all rejoice when men who have hitherto been more or less sharply divided, and who still retain their separate denominational organisations, seek for common ground. Had there always been a similar desire in the past, existing divisions would have been less strongly marked, in some cases would have disappeared altogether. And though we are excluded from this new fellowship, it does not seem too much to hope that, as years go by, and the thoughts of men continue to widen, the sympathies which have been strong enough to overleap some denominational barriers will take a yet wider range, and that all earnest souls will find their place in one great company.

"There is no trace in the pages of the Catechism of the old and mighty controversy between Calvinism and Arminianism. John Wesley looked on Calvinism as a doctrine which dishonoured God, and was indeed blasphemous in attributing favouritism and cruelty to Him. On the other hand, the late Charles Spurgeon said of the doctrine of election and predestination, 'It is in the Bible, and no knife that was ever made can cut it out.' Some of the compilers of the Catechism must agree with Mr. Spurgeon, but though they believe that the doctrine is in the Bible, they have been content to 'cut it out' of the Catechism. Where so tremendous a controversy leaves no trace, it is not to be wondered at that minor matters of difference have proved susceptible of adjustment.

"In many points the Catechism seems open to serious criticism. Inasmuch as it is intended specially 'for use in home and school,' there should be both simplicity and consistency in its statements. But in spite of the numbers and the distinguished position of its compilers, it seems to your Committee that no child or young person, taking the Catechism as it stands, could deduce from it a consistent theory, e.g., of the nature either of God or of Jesus Christ. Though in its earlier sections the distinction between God and Christ is clearly marked—as question and answer go on, the young inquirer will, before long, either fail to attach any clear meaning to the words he is instructed to use, or he will think that he is being taught to believe in two Gods—one Higher, the Father; one Lower, the Son. The plain teaching of the Catechism in these portions is di-theistic. What is said, in further answers, of the Holy Spirit and the Trinity, is again difficult to harmonise with what has gone before, the whole effect on the child's mind must be confusing rather than enlightening. As minor instances of want of clearness, the references to 'death eternal,' and to the reasons for keeping the Sabbath, may also be cited.

"Again, while your Committee rejoice that, in days when the recrudescence of sacerdotalism is an appalling fact, the Catechism speaks strongly on behalf of a Spiritual Religion, they feel that the statement as to the nature of a Free Church is open to question. We are told (Answer 36) that 'A Free Church' is 'A Church which acknowledges none but Jesus Christ as Head, and therefore exercises its right to interpret and administer His laws without restraint or control by the State.' This use of the term 'Free' is much too exclusive. The right to interpret spiritual laws without interference from the State is compatible with any amount of dogmatism and narrowness within the Church itself. A truly Free Church is that which is unhampered by the creeds of the past, or by articles of faith agreed upon in the present—which has room to grow, following the divine leading, and being ready to press ever onward to higher truth. A 'free' Church is not that, the majority of whose members are free to impose what terms they please on all the rest, but a Church where the uniting bond is spiritual, not dogmatic, and where each member, while respecting his neighbour's convictions, is at liberty to be true to his own.

"But, though it seems to them to be vulnerable in the points they have named, and in others which might be dwelt upon, your Committee gladly admit how much there is in the Catechism which marks an advance on all similar standards of faith—in spirituality, in moderation of tone, and in the emphasis laid on practical Religion."

THE apparent foolishness of others is but too frequently our own ignorance, or, what is much worse, it is the direct measure of our own tyranny.—Sir A. Helps

ASSOCIATION OF IRISH NON-SUBSCRIBING PRESBYTERIANS.

THE annual meeting of the Association of Irish Non-Subscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians was held on June 21 in the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street, Belfast. Previous to the meeting a service was conducted by the Rev. Douglas Walmsley, B.A., who preached from the text, "And he said unto them, go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature."

The annual meeting having been opened by prayer, the Rev. Douglas Walmsley (out-going President), who occupied the chair, in the course of his retiring address, said religious liberals were a quiet people, but modesty in the service of that Gospel of God's love for which they claimed to stand might be overdone, and at least at the annual meeting of their Association someone should make on their Gospel's behalf clear and earnest pronouncement. For his own part he could never sufficiently lament that the chilling, repelling, ugly, negative name "Non-subscriber" was ever taken by their people and their churches. He did not, indeed, see how it could be otherwise as things fell out. He lamented it, nevertheless, as a very disagreeable necessity. But it had to be. Their people saw the creed-loving spirit encroaching more and more on the older freedom; they saw subscription to man-made creeds more and more demanded as the sine qua non of at least ministerial service in the Church; and what could they do but "stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free?" and what could the world call them but "non-subscribers?" The truth was that when a man refused to pledge himself to a creed, he so refused because he trusted in the living God, and would not vex the Holy Spirit that counselled and led him. Calvinism and Romanism—extreme high and low—stood together against the faith that trusted the free soul of man and the communion of the Holy Spirit of God. So when the Calvinist demanded of him that he must hold his creed or perish—for, as Spurgeon put it, God's universal Fatherhood was "a lie," and would not help him out—and when priests, of whatever school, claimed that, as priests, they possessed some special priestly illumination which the laity knew not, and that some wonderful power was given them—more than human or more than natural—to do things for which they could only find the name of "magic"—to both parties to the controversy they had the same answer—they trusted the living God, who would not turn away from their pleading, nor withdraw His mercy from them. To one who held that true faith in God, he did not know whether the burning question of the day—the priestly claims of certain orders of Protestant priests—should bring a thought of light amusement or of heavy sorrow. To think of those grave Churchmen—scholars of repute, philosophers, men of faith and piety—laying their heads together to consider whether "the gentlemen in the book-markers" might light candles and swing scent-vases, was a thing which "though it might make the unskilful laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve." To say whether their early Protestants protested a little too emphatically—or not quite consistently—against these and other etceteras of priestcraft, was a matter chiefly of antiquarian curiosity.

The Rev. A. B. Hamilton, who was nominated by the Presbyteries of Templepatrick and Armagh, was then elected President for the ensuing year; the Rev. James Kennedy, secretary, and the Rev. J. A. Kelly, treasurer, were re-elected.

Votes of thanks were accorded the Rev. J. A. Kelly, treasurer, and Mr. R. M. Kennedy, honorary auditor, for their services.

On the motion of the Rev. JAMES KENNEDY, seconded by the Rev. ALEXANDER ASHWORTH, the report of the general purposes committee was adopted. The Rev. J. A. Kelly submitted a very favourable financial statement, which was also adopted.

The report of the Orphan Society in connection with the Association was passed, on the motion of the Rev. ALFRED TURNER, seconded by the Rev. J. J. MAGILL.

Votes of thanks having been accorded the minister and committee of the First Presbyterian Church for the use of the church, and the organist and choir for their services, the proceedings terminated.

REMONSTRANT SYNOD OF ULSTER.

THE seventieth annual meeting of the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster was held in the church of the First Congregation, Rosemary-street, Belfast, on June 20. The outgoing Moderator (the Rev. T. W. Scott) having preached from John viii. 37, the Court was duly constituted by prayer.

The Rev. A. TURNER (Clerk) then called the roll, after which the retiring Moderator requested the Synod to appoint his successor. The nominations were—Presbyteries of Armagh and Bangor, the Rev. Alexander Gordon, M.A.; Templepatrick Presbytery, the Rev. J. A. Miskimmin, B.A. On the motion of the Rev. THOMAS DUNKERLEY, the Rev. A. Gordon was unanimously appointed, and after the address of the outgoing Moderator, thanked them for the honour they had conferred upon him in electing him to that high and important position. He then proceeded to deal with the history of their Church, which, he held, stood for fellowship and for truth as far as they could see it. At the close of an able address the business was continued.

The Rev. Alfred Turner was unanimously elected to continue in the office of Clerk, and the Rev. James Hall (Crumlin) was appointed assistant clerk.

The report of the Finance Committee was submitted by the Rev. J. A. KELLY, Convener. It showed the Sustentation Fund income for the year to be £603 0s. 7d., expenditure £600 13s. 10d., leaving a balance in hand of £2 6s. 9d., which was considered highly satisfactory. It was agreed unanimously that the trustees of the Sustentation Fund Committee be recommended to pay the sum of £60 each to the several congregations receiving aid from the fund.

Reports from the Presbyteries of Bangor, Armagh, and Templepatrick having been read, resolutions of regret for the loss sustained by the death of the Revs. Moore Getty and J. A. Crozier were passed.

Other reports were read, and it was agreed to hold the next annual meeting in the First Presbyterian Church, Rosemary-street, Belfast, on the third Tuesday in June, 1900. The congregation of the First Church was thanked for the use of the meeting-house and vestry for various meetings during the year.

On the motion of the Rev. T. W. SCOTT, seconded by the Rev. W. E. MELLONE, the following resolution was also adopted:—"That this Synod expresses its sense of the loss which the Unitarian denomination has sustained in the death of the Rev. Robert Spears. They appreciated the zeal and energy he threw into every cause which he supported, and the high character he exhibited during his long connection with the Unitarian Churches."

This concluded the business, and the Moderator pronounced the benediction.

THE SOUTH WALES UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

THE annual meetings of this Association were held at Capel-Fadfa, near Llandyssul, on Wednesday and Thursday, June 21 and 22, and were very largely attended by both ministers and laymen of the district. Three ladies from the Far West, now on a visit to the land of their fathers, were also welcomed to the meetings—the Misses Lloyd-Jones and Miss Lloyd Wright, of Hillside, Wisconsin, descendants of a steadfast Unitarian family which emigrated to the Western Continent in 1845, and which has given to that continent one of the most noted and powerful preachers of Liberal religion in the person of the Rev. Jenkin Lloyd-Jones, of All Souls' Church, Chicago. Through them the isolated and obscure Unitarianism of South Wales was brought into touch and strengthened by association with a community beyond the sea of wider extent and more vigorous growth.

Another noteworthy feature was that the friends at Capel-Fadfa, influenced by the almost certain prospect of fine weather, and the still more certain prospect of a very large attendance, measured on the Unitarian scale, decided to hold the meetings on Thursday in the open air. With that object a commodious stage was improvised at one end of a piece of ground adjoining the chapel under the skilful superintendence of Captain Davies, Rhydownfach. The plan was justified by the issue. The day turned out to be delightful, and at the most popular service in the afternoon not less than 500 persons were present. Another pleasing incident was the brotherly feeling shown by the neighbouring Congregational church at Pishah. Their minister, the Rev. T. C. Benjamin, not only took part in one of the services and addressed the Sunday-school Conference, but two of our ministers, Revs. L. Williams and John Davies, were invited to conduct a service on Wednesday evening at the Congregational chapel.

The address of the President, the Rev. R. C. JONES, Lampeter, on "The Nature and Claims of Jesus Christ," and the Association sermon by the Rev. T. J. Jenkins, Gellionen, on "The Function of the Prophet in Religion," were much appreciated. There were altogether four services held during the two days, and in addition to those already mentioned, the following ministers took part:—W. Evans, Wick;

J. E. Jones, Cwmbach; J. E. Jenkins, Dowlais; W. J. Phillips, Nottage; R. J. Jones, M.A., Aberdare; and D. Rees, Pentre, Rhonda.

At 9.30 on Thursday morning the business meeting was held, the President in the chair, when the reports of the Secretary and Treasurer were read and adopted. Grants were made to the Young Men's Education Fund, the Missionary Station under the Rev. J. Davies at Sychbant, towards extra services at Caeronen and Allt-y-placca, to the Building Fund at Trebanos, and towards the augmentation of ministers' stipends at Wick and Rhonda Valley. Officers for the new year were appointed as follows:—President, the Rev. Jenkin Thomas, Pendleton; Vice-President, Mr. L. N. Williams, Aberdare; Secretary, the Rev. W. James, B.A., J.P., Llandyssul; Treasurer, Mr. J. Evans, solicitor, Llandyssul.

At 1.30 a Sunday-school Conference was held, and several suggestions were made by successive speakers, aiming especially at the improvement of the scheme of annual examinations which has been found so useful.

At 5.30 the respective ministerial unions of Cardiganshire and Glamorganshire met separately and drew their plans of annual pulpit exchanges.

The meetings were altogether highly successful and inspiring.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

THE aggregate service for elder scholars of the schools affiliated to this society was held at Essex Hall on Sunday afternoon last, June 24. The service, which was conducted by the Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, of Hackney, attracted a considerably larger number of adult friends than usual, it being estimated that over 100 were present, in addition to 300 children, representing the following thirteen schools:—Avondale-road, Brixton, Clarence-road, Essex Church, Hackney, Highgate, Limehouse, Newington Green, Mansford-street, Portland-street, Stamford-street, Stepney and Unity.

The absence of some of the schools that are generally represented, such as Croydon, George's-row, Wandsworth, and Wood Green, was much regretted.

A Sunday-school anniversary service, composed and arranged by Miss Maud E. Turner, was admirably rendered by the children, the choirs of Newington Green, Brixton, and Highgate leading the singing, which was conducted by Mr. F. W. Turner. It is only fair, however, to record that the children as a whole sang extremely well, showing that the service had been carefully practised in most of the schools. The service consists of an opening anthem "Praise ye the Lord," the Lord's Prayer (set to music), hymn "Father who lovest us," psalm and response, reading, hymn "With happy voices ringing," prayer, anthem "The Lord is my Shepherd," reading, hymn "Lord of our Life," address, closing hymn "Now thank we all our God," and benediction.

The service appeared in The Helper last year, and the attention with which it was followed, noticeably the prayers and readings (which are printed), was most marked, and we strongly recommend all superintendents of Sunday-schools to adopt this service for their anniversaries.

The Rev. R. H. U. Bloor, who was supported on the platform by Mr. F. W. Lawrence, M.A. (president of the Society), Miss Pritchard, Mr. Ion Pritchard, Mr. F. W. Turner, and Mr. H. Wade (hon. sec.), gave an earnest and interesting address from the line "Man has forever" of Browning's poem "A Grammarian's Funeral," urging upon his audience to keep on learning, that learning has its heroic side, reminding them, however, that its only value is that it may be of use in life.

The weather fortunately kept fine, and not being too hot the children were perhaps more than usually attentive, which, however, was mainly due to the manifest interest they took in the service and address.

We again have to thank the kind friends who for so many years supplied refreshment in the form of a glass of milk to each child on arrival.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Thursday Morning.]

APPEAL.

London: College Chapel, Stepney Green, E.—The superintendent and teachers of the Sunday-school appeal for contributions to their excursion fund. They are hoping this year to take the children in brakes to High Beech on July 13. This being more expensive than a train excursion, the teachers hope that their appeal will be liberally responded to. Contributions will be thankfully received by Amy C. Reed, Edgeworth House, Pembury-road, Bruce-grove, Tottenham; or, Lucking Tavenor, 435, Mile End-road, E.

Brighton.—The annual flower services were held in the Free Christian Church, on Sunday, June 18, the plants and flowers being afterwards sent to the Union Infirmary. On Friday, the 23rd, the Sunday-school annual outing took place at Victoria Gardens, Burgess-hill. Just over 100 children, and between 30 and 40 adult friends, were present, and a very enjoyable day was spent by all.

Cardiff.—The Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held on Sunday, June 18. At the children's service in the afternoon, short addresses were given by Mr. W. A. Moore, Mr. Charles, and the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis. Special hymns were sung by the children, who each carried a beautiful bunch of flowers, which were afterwards used to decorate the church for the evening service. In the evening the scholars again attended and sang special hymns and solos. A short address was given by Mr. R. Waters, and the Rev. J. Tyssul Davis preached upon "Come, let us live for the children." The children's floral offerings were taken the next day to the Cardiff Infirmary. The annual treat took place on Wednesday, June 21, at Barry Island, where a delightful time was spent upon the sands. A large number of parents and friends accompanied the children, there being altogether over 170 persons present.

Chowbent.—On Saturday afternoon, June 17, under the leadership of Mr. T. H. Hope, a large party of young men and young women, together with some older members of the congregation, visited several places of interest, historically associated with Chowbent Chapel. Starting out on foot from Atherton, Mr. Hope and the young men stopped at various points en route, where the leader, out of his large stores of antiquarian knowledge, instructed, and, in some cases, by curious incidents and anecdotes, amused his followers. The rest of the party, starting from Atherton later in waggonettes, met Mr. Hope and his contingent again at Wharton Chapel (now orthodox Presbyterianism), so closely connected in its history, and in friendly relationships, with Chowbent Chapel. In the Wharton Chapel yard, Mr. Hope further gave some most interesting information about the past days, with zest, vividness, and enjoyment, as if he himself had actually lived in them. By the ready kindness of the Presbyterian minister, the Rev. Mr. Franks, who himself was present at the time, the whole party sang within the old chapel, which this year is to come down, "All people that on earth do dwell." Wharton Hall was also visited, this being the house in which the Rev. James Wood, of Chowbent, found shelter when, like others, he was "silenced" in 1662, and the then resident in Wharton Hall more than once suffered the fine imposed for allowing Mr. Wood to conduct Divine service therein. Kenyon Peel Hall was next visited, and with much surprise and delight the whole party passed through the well-kept rooms, rich with old carved oak furniture and other appointments of this charming Elizabethan dwelling. Calling attention to the portraits of the Kenyon family, Mr. Hope happily showed the connection between this hall and family and the Chowbent congregation. After a vote of thanks to Lord Kenyon, the party proceeded to Monton, where an excellent tea had been provided, and a kindly welcome by Monton friends, including the Rev. P. M. Higginson, awaited them. After examining and greatly admiring the Monton schools, with their ample and first-class accommodation, not only for Sunday and day-school purposes, but also for congregational needs, the grand church was then visited. Here some hymns were sung, and the Rev. J. J. Wright expressed, on behalf of the party, their indebtedness to the Monton friends, but especially to Mr. Hope, who, at the request of the young men, had enabled them not only to see such places of interest as they had visited that afternoon, but had made them feel how much and how vitally their life at Chowbent was woven into the history of those places. He (the speaker) knew that Mr. Hope's aim at all times was to make the rising generation feel that they were associated with a religious society which had a history worth knowing, because he (Mr. Hope) believed that by knowing the history the young people were more likely to be worthy of it in their day and generation. And he (the speaker) was certain that he only acted as the mouthpiece of all present in saying that Mr. Hope had truly succeeded in the desire of his heart that afternoon.

Clifton.—A very successful excursion to Oxford was undertaken on June 21 by twenty-two members and friends of Oakfield-road Church. Favoured by perfect weather, they inspected under the minister's guidance a goodly number of the chief buildings and other sights, including Manchester College, where by Dr. Drummond's kind permission the dining hall was placed at their disposal for tea. General satisfaction was expressed with the day's outing, a memorial of which, in the form of a photographic group taken in the "quad," of Manchester College, will shortly be available.

Croft.—The School Sermons were preached on June 18 by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, of Leigh. Unfortunately there was a break in the fine weather about noon. The rain fell all the rest of the afternoon and evening, and many friends from Warrington, Leigh, Atherton, and Astley who had intended to be with us were prevented from making the journey to Croft. Still, the little chapel was well packed in the afternoon, and in the evening there did not seem to be a seat unoccupied. The organist and choir from Cairo-street Chapel, Warrington, took charge of the singing, two anthems being included in the services. Between the services more than 100 friends were served with tea in a hayshed, kindly lent by Mr. Thos. Welsby, farmer. The collection amounted to £12.

Glossop.—The anniversary services were held on June 18, the preacher afternoon and evening being the Rev. John Fox, of Leeds. There were good congregations at both services, but the unpropitious weather prevented so large an attendance as on previous occasions. Prior to the afternoon service the usual procession through the town took place, and hymns were sung in the square to the accompaniment of a capable string band. The discourses were able and the music and singing exceptionally good. The collections amounted to over £50, being £10 in advance of the record of last year.

Gorton.—On Saturday last the memorial stones of new schools in connection with Brookfield Church were laid by Mr. Robert Clay and Captain F. W. Peacock. For many years the Sunday-schools at the rear of the church have afforded very inadequate accommodation, and from a statement made by Mr. Thomas Grundy, the school secretary, it appeared that there are at present on the books 455 scholars and 36 teachers, with an average attendance in the morning of 188, and in the afternoon of 314. In 1892 a canvass of the congregation resulted in generous promises being made towards the fund for building new schools, and the bequest of £2,000 made by the late Mr. Alderman Clay in 1896 warranted the trustees in proceeding with the scheme to which the family of the late Mr. Peacock, M.P., have largely contributed. With the efforts put forth by the teachers and members of the congregation, with the financial help already named, a sum of £5,690 has already been raised, and as the estimated cost of the new buildings is £7,300, it is hoped that the balance of £1,609 will be obtained by a bazaar, entertainments, and additional subscriptions. Messrs. T. Worthington and Son are the architects for the new buildings, the design being domestic Gothic. The schools are in line with and in close proximity to the church. There will be a large central hall for meetings and entertainments, surrounded by eight classrooms. Saturday's proceedings commenced with a procession through the township of the scholars, teachers, congregation, and friends, headed by the Manchester Pioneer Band and augmented by a number of the scholars from Wilton-street, Denton. At the stone-laying there was a very large assembly, including the Revs. George Evans (minister of the church), T. B. Evans, Charles Roper, P. M. Higginson, L. Scott, C. E. Oliver, W. C. Hall, S. Stanton (Congregationalist), Dendy Agate, G. Knight, W. Harrison, Jenkins Thomas, Captain Peacock, Messrs. Robert Clay, S. Taylor, Pollitt, T. Grundy, S. Rider, G. H. Barnes, E. Woodhouse, C. Broadhurst, T. Mort (Chairman of the Gorton District Council), W. Henley. Mr. Joseph Burnford presided, and Mr. Clay and Captain Peacock were each presented with an inscribed silver trowel with which to perform the ceremony of stone-laying. A great gathering was present, the scholars being arranged nearest the platform, so as to lead in the singing. After the ceremony the scholars were marched off to a field and regaled with buns and milk, spending the rest of the day in all sorts of suitable games. For the adults tea was provided in the old schoolroom, after which the Pioneer Band played selections in an adjoining field for nearly an hour. Then a public meeting was held in the church, presided over by the Rev. George Evans, who stated that the present school was formally opened in 1863, and that for a number of years past it was felt to be very inadequate for the work in hand. The people were in good hope that kind and generous friends would help them to open the new school a year hence free from debt. Short speeches were made by the Revs. P. M. Higginson, A. Gordon, G. Knight, and C. Roper, and the choir sang several anthems. It was a red-letter day at Gorton, and will be long remembered by those who were present.

Guildford.—On Wednesday week a recognition of the Rev. E. S. Lang Buckland, as minister of the Ward-street Chapel, took place, the Revs. J. Page Hopps, W. G. Tarrant, Hubert Clarke, J. J. Martin, E. A. Voysey, and H. Webb Ellis joining in the proceedings.

Hinckley.—On Sunday last, June 25, the anniversary Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. Dr. Drummond, Principal of Manchester College, Oxford. Large congregations attended both in the afternoon and evening. The collections were larger than usual. The Chapel Committee are most grateful to Dr. Drummond for so eminent a service, so kindly rendered. Special music was given by children and choir, and the chapel was gayly decorated with flowers.

Kilbarchan.—At the request of many of the members of the old congregation at Kilbarchan, the Rev. Matthew R. Scott, before leaving Scotland for his new charge at Ainsworth, conducted a religious service last Sunday evening. The Templar's Hall was taken, and there was a congregation of over 200. This was the first service held by the members of the former congregation since Mr. Scott left for Kilmarnock five years ago, and it was highly appreciated.

Lancaster.—On Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, June 21-23, a very successful bazaar was held in the Co-operative Hall by the members of the St. Nicholas-street congregation, to provide a fund for an organ, and for the installation of electric light and other improvements of the chapel. A great deal of hard work had been done, and friendly help had been received from members of other denominations. Mr. David Ainsworth, and Mrs. Crompton, of Rivington, who were to have opened the bazaar on the first two days, were unfortunately unable to be present, but their places were well filled by Mr. Albert Greg and the Mayor of Lancaster (Alderman Bell), the chair being taken on the two occasions by Mr. Edward Lamport, and the Rev. J. C. Pollard. On Thursday Mr. Pollard was supported by the Rev. J. F. Cowley, Congregational minister, and the Rev. H. W. Smith, another Congregational minister, was also present. On Friday the bazaar was opened by Mr. S. Lee, of Preston, the chair being taken by Mr. Alderman Kitchen. The result was eminently satisfactory, £330 being realised.

Lewes.—The Westgate Chapel on Tuesday

June 15, presented a very festive appearance on the occasion of the wedding of the Rev. T. A. Gorton, minister of the chapel, and Miss Kate Langridge. The service, which was choral, was conducted by the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards. The chapel had been tastefully decorated with cut flowers and plants lent by Mr. Every, and was crowded with guests and friends, including many from the Brighton congregation. The bride and bridegroom were the recipients of a large number of handsome presents, including a purse of gold from the members of the congregation and the Young Peoples' Guild.

London: Stamford-street.—On Sunday, June 18, Mr. W. H. Abraham, who has been connected with the Sunday-school for twenty-seven years, and had recently resigned the office of Superintendent, was presented with a handsome mahogany stationery cabinet by the teachers and members of the minister's class. The presentation was made by the Rev. Frederic Allen, and Mr. S. S. Tayler, Hon. Sec. Mr. Abraham cordially acknowledged the gift. — On Monday evening an entertainment was given by the "46th London Company of the Boys' Brigade," to which were invited the parents and friends of the boys and others interested in the work. A fair number of visitors were present, including Miss Pritchard ("Aunt Amy"), Rev. F. Allen (Chaplain of the Company) and Mrs. Allen, Rev. W. G. Tarrant and Messrs. I. S. Lister, and A. H. Biggs. After an opening hymn and prayer the Company (two officers and about twenty-five boys) gave various displays of "company drill," manual exercises, dumbbell and musical drill. The Chaplain then gave a short address to the parents and friends, endeavouring to disabuse their minds of the idea that the "Boys' Brigade" is, in effect, a "training ground for the army," and appealing, on behalf of the officers, for more help—personal and financial—in the work. "Aunt Amy" then addressed the boys in a little speech, which will long be remembered by all who heard it, on the "Object of the Boys' Brigade," which is described as "the advancement of Christ's kingdom among boys, and the promotion of habits of obedience, reverence, discipline, self-respect and all that tends towards a true Christian manliness." "Aunt Amy" closed by complimenting the boys on their drill and expressing herself very much pleased with all she had seen. The Rev. W. G. Tarrant also addressed the boys. Prizes for the past session (kindly given by Miss B. Ballantyne, Mr. A. H. Biggs and others) were then presented, and the meeting closed with a distribution of flowers.

London: Welsh Services.—The annual meeting of this movement was held at Essex Hall on Sunday evening, June 18, after the service. Mr. D. Delta Evans was voted to the chair, and there was a fairly good attendance of members and friends. The balance-sheet and accounts for the year 1898-99, which showed a small deficit, were read by the secretary, Mr. Joseph Davies. Mr. D. D. Evans was appointed president for the ensuing year, and the secretary and treasurer were re-elected, as was also the committee, but several new names, including those of five or six lady members, were added to it. Votes of thanks were also passed to the energetic secretary and to those members who conduct the services, for their work during the year. A healthy and encouraging tone pervaded the meeting, which bodes well for the future success of the movement.
